In the ring the work is divided according to well-established rules. At a signal from the president—the waving of a pocket-handkerchief—the toreros march in from a door to the right of his box. The procession is opened by two alguaciles on horseback dressed in handsome black costumes of the sixteenth century. Then come the two espadas walking side by side, as magnificent as silk, satin, gold lace, or jet can make them, each man with a cloak of the same colour as his dress carefully arranged over his left shoulder and round his waist. It is held in its place by the left hand, the arm being placed akimbo, while the right hangs gravely down by the side. The banderilleros and capeadores march in order after their chiefs in the same attitude and in soberer versions of the same dress. Behind ride the four picadores in a line abreast. The president throws the key of the toril to one of the alguaciles, who should catch it neatly in his hat, gallop across the ring with it, and hand it to the doorkeeper. As they are indifferent horsemen, they generally bungle their work; and great is the delight of the spectators if one of these officers of the law gets spilt, particularly if that happens when the bull is already in the plaza. When the key is delivered, the alguaciles take themselves off without standing on the order of their going. Meanwhile the toreros have taken up their positions. Even if two cuadrillas are employed, all the men except the espadas are in the plaza at once, and act together. The espadas relieve one another. If, for instance, the two hired for a night are Lagartijo and Chicorro, and the former is to kill the first bull, he withdraws inside the barrier as soon as the key is thrown to the alguazil there to wait till his work begins. Meanwhile Chicorro acts as captain of the team. He posts his men on either side of the door leading to the toril. Two picadores are put on each side, while the banderilleros and capeadores are posted near them, cloak in hand, ready for an emergency. When a picador is down, he must be saved and the bull drawn off. It will be Chicorro's business to see that this is done promptly and without confusion. When the picadores have done enough, the president again shakes his handkerchief, and the bugle sounds. Then the ring is cleared of riders and their horses (those which can move), and the banderillero does his feats of skill, aided by the capeadores under the direction of Chicorro. Once or twice in the course of a night the directing espada is expected to do some feat of skill himself, but that will be in the middle or towards the end. At the beginning he husbands his strength. When the second act has lasted long enough, there is another waving of the pocket-handkerchief, and another bugle call. In an instant the toreros retire to the barrier, and Lagartijo comes out. Gravely he takes his place facing the president, with his sword and flag, the blood-red bandeja in his left hand. With the right he gracefully takes off his hat. Then in a loud voice he pronounces perhaps the only oath, not being one of vengeance, which is piously observed in Spain. He swears to do his duty, and he does it. His hat is thrown behind him with a gay toss. Holding the bandeja in the left hand, the sword in the right, with one trusty capeador at his back, he stands forth to fight his duel with the bull. Like the picador, he is bound by strict rules. He must keep on his ground in front of his enemy. No blow can be struck from the left side or from behind. If the bull rushes away, it must be tempted back to below the president's box. An espada must show a certain amount of graceful play with his flag before giving the final thrust. When he has done that for a sufficient time, he gives his blow. It is delivered in front of the bull's right shoulder, as the animal charges, and with the hands down. The commonest blow is the volapié, when the espada springs to meet the bull, but a recibido—a thrust given with the feet firm—is perhaps more honourable. It shows less skill, and is not so graceful, but it is more risky, and requires a strong wrist and steady eye. The sword must enter up to the hilt. If the blow is properly given the bull stops at once, and soon falls. Then the cachetero finishes him. The carcass is dragged out at a gallop by the mules, and the ring is raked and watered. Lagartijo enjoys his applause, and places the men for the second bull. He directs until Chicorro is called on to kill him, and then takes his turn of rest. Chicorro then swears his oath, disposes of his bull, and acts as captain till Lagartijo's turn comes round again. Each man, be it observed, swears once only. It is also well to do the toreros the justice of saying that, although they are divided by jealousies of a truly theatrical rancour, they are never known to foul one another in the ring. Indeed any one of them who played another a base trick would soon find that, between the rage of the spectators, the universal contempt of society, and the knives of his rivals' friends, the coldest corner in the Guadarrama would soon be too hot to hold him.

What we have described here is a fully organized fiesta. The various inferior forms are too numerous to detail, and they are increasing. It is sometimes said that a public opinion against the amusement is forming in Spain, and that the bull-fight is destined to disappear. No sane man will prophesy what will happen in the twentieth century, but there are reasons and reasons for thinking that the toreros will not find themselves short of work in our time. In the first place, there have always been people who thought the game barbarous, and at one time all who attended it were excommunicated by the Church. Yet the mass of Spaniards, including churchmen, went. In our own time the spread of civilization in the shape of railways has given it a great impetus. Fights now take place in towns where they were unknown when the bulls could only be brought by the road. The attitude of the Spanish mind towards the bull-fight is indeed well described in a popular apologue told to illustrate the stiffneckedness of the Arragonese. "Erase que se era," as Sancho Panza would have said, once upon a time it happened that the Archangel Gabriel was going his round of inspection on earth in the kingdom of Arragon, and he met a native trudging along the road. "Where are you going, my friend?" asked the Archangel. "I am going to see the bull-fight at Tudela," answered the Arragonese. "Si Dios quiere—please God," added the Archangel with pious gravity. But the Arragonese solidly repeated his assertion. "Say if God pleases," said Gabriel, intent on improving his morals; but it was no use. Then, in great wrath, the Archangel turned him into a frog, and left him croaking in a puddle. After many years the celestial inspector came to those parts again. As he walked along the frogs croaked from the puddle, and his attendant angel said, "How loud do those frogs keep saying 'Coax, coax' in the puddle!" "My son," answered Gabriel, "you remind me of a duty." Then he went to the water, and summoned forth a frog, which at his word took human shape, and again became the Arragonese. No sooner was he on his feet than he started off along the road. "Now then," shouted Gabriel, "where are you going?" All the answer he got was, "I am going to Tudela to see the bull-fight." Now the whole Spanish nation might be turned into frogs, if there be water enough in their dried-up land to hold them, and soak and croak there for many years, and yet would their love of the "fiesta de toros" not depart from them.

MR. HAYWARD.

MR. HAYWARD'S death has left vacant a place in society which will perhaps not be soon filled. If he had chosen his own lot in life, his aspirations would probably have extended beyond the success which he actually achieved: nor is there any doubt that he would have done credit to a considerable rank either in his own profession or in political life; but in such a competition he would have had many equals, while in his social career he had scarcely a rival. There can be few survivors who remember his entrance into the London world more than fifty years ago; but without any external advantages of birth, fortune, or connexion he at once occupied a position which he never lost. He acquired by his prose translation of Faust a literary reputation which seems disproportionate to the most scholarlike execution of such a task; and for several years he kept up his connexion with the Bar by occasional practice and as editor of the Law Magazine. His promotion to the rank of Queen's Counsel through the favour of Lord Lyndhurst would probably have been fatal to his prospect of professional employment if he had not soon afterwards practically retired from the Bar. He had rendered valuable service to his patron in his opposition to Lord Brougham's County Courts Bill; and on one occasion Lord Lyndhurst told the representatives of the solicitors that the gratitude which they had professed to himself was really due to Mr. Hayward. His legal knowledge and his general ability would perhaps have qualified him for a silk gown; but he had little experience in the conduct of cases, and he had not the physical gifts of an effective advocate. It is not now known whether he intended to pursue his profession, or to take the opportunity of an ornamental retreat. He would in the ordinary course have become a Bencher of his inn; but he had unluckily incurred the implacable resentment of Mr. Roebuck, who had the anomalous power of excluding him by his single vote. The rule of admission was consequently altered; but it was thought that the original decision could not be reversed. Although the vote was nominally secret, Mr. Roebuck always avowed his act. The cause of offence was Mr. Hayward's repetition in print of a story which reflected, as Mr. Roebuck thought, on his moral character. The use of a power which Mr. Roebuck possessed in an official character to gratify private revenge, however just, was wholly indefensible.

Many years afterwards Mr. Hayward lost by singular ill-fortune his only chance of suitable official employment. He was appointed by an outgoing Government to the post of Assistant Poor Law Secretary, but the successor of the head of the department asserted his right of patronage; and the claim was allowed. The disappointment must have been the more mortifying because the candidate who was ultimately preferred was, like himself, a well-known member of fashionable society. Mr. Fleming performed the duties of his office creditably; but he could scarcely be compared with Mr. Hayward in general ability. It is strange that an active, though cool-headed partisan, the friend and associate of several Ministers, a lawyer and a man of business, should neither before nor after that solitary occasion have been invited to enter the public service. Mr. Hayward, as he showed in his writings, was scrupulously accurate, and he had an inborn love of minute detail. It is possible that he may sometimes have thought that he was treated with undue neglect; but his loyalty to the statesmen to whom at different times he attached himself was never shaken. His political opinions never underwent any violent change. Originally by connexion and inclination a Tory, he was wholly exempt from bigotry; and when Sir Robert Peel began to modify the policy of the party, Mr. Hayward gladly followed his lead. He had formed relations of intimacy with the younger members of the Government, including Mr. Gladstone, the Duke of Newcastle, and Mr. Sidney Herbert, and it was in connexion with some of the number that he took for a short time an active part in the composition of the Morning Chronicle. He had a showy associate in Mr. George Smythe, afterwards Lord Strangford; but it was soon found that Mr. Smythe had exhausted all his resources in a dozen or a dozen and a half of articles. Mr. Hayward was more fertile and much better informed, but he perhaps found the task of daily journalism uncongenial. His literary habits had accustomed him to careful finish and to minute investigation of facts; and daily newspapers must always be written in a hurry. After a year or two he also retired from the paper, which was from that time conducted by writers who afterwards formed the original staff of a more prosperous and permanent undertaking.

After the close of his brief connexion with the Morning Chronicle Mr. Hayward never again took an active part in political controversy. His relation to parties was almost entirely personal, and it was because they were his friends and associates, rather than from devotion to their novel opinions, that he adhered to the seceders of 1846. He even exposed himself to some inconvenience for the purpose of asserting the unpopular doctrine that the followers of Sir Robert Peel were still the true representatives of Conservative principles. For this purpose he continued to frequent the Carlton Club when it had been practically appropriated by the followers of Lord George Bentinck and Mr. Disraeli. It was not until he had been exposed to some personal discourtesy, which nearly resulted in a duel, that he abandoned his laudable but paradoxical enterprise. It was natural that he should continue his allegiance to the same political section through all its subsequent changes. He was probably neither more nor less Conservative or Liberal in theory at the end of his life than in the days when Sir Robert Peel led the Tory party. It is as improbable that he should have shared Mr. Gladstone's enthusiasm for the Irish Church as that he should afterwards have wished to disestablish it. Revolutionary projects and democratic agitation were alien from his tastes and habits of thought; but it was enough for him that the present Prime Minister was the same person to whom he had attached himself forty years ago. The comparatively mild political antagonism of modern times fortunately allows of friendly intercourse with members of contending parties. At the beginning of the century the most unprejudiced member of society must have confined himself to Whig or Tory houses. Mr. Hayward was welcomed among all political denominations; and he had no disposition to shock the prejudices of opponents or to engage in unseasonable controversies. The subjects in which he was principally interested had nothing to do with party. Literary criticism of the lighter sort, biographical anecdote, and social gossip supplied him with his favourite subjects. His command of French, which he spoke with confident fluency, though not with perfect accent or faultless accuracy, proved in his case, as in that of many others, one of the most valuable of social accomplishments. It is sometimes difficult to provide for the entertainment of foreign guests, for even good linguists often hesitate to talk French across a London dinner-table. Acquaintance with eminent strangers, afterwards renewed in their own country, furnishes new sources of information and interest. Mr. Hayward was always full of the latest news of Paris as well as of London.

Although Mr. Hayward never composed an elaborate work, his contributions to literature were voluminous in amount, and for the most part excellent in quality. More than one series of selected essays fairly represents the character of his numerous articles published in the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews. The best of his writings contain a large proportion of personal reminiscences; but he was also a diligent student of those branches of literature which relate to manners and character. His industry in the collection of details and his accurate memory were equally remarkable. In the course of his long career he had enjoyed unusual opportunities of accumulating the kind of experience which he required. It is to be regretted that he never wrote formal biographies of any of the interesting personages whom he had known in their later years, and more especially of Lord Melbourne; but he perhaps knew better than others the nature and limits of his own capacity: and his writings are always good in their kind, except when he attempts purely literary criticism. He disliked novelty, eccentricity, and perhaps originality, and his taste in poetry scarcely extended beyond a resolute admiration of Byron. For the literary puzzles which demand a kind of forensic sagacity he had a wholesome relish, though his judgment was not infallible. He took an active part in the Junius controversy when it was revived ten or twelve years ago, with a result scarcely worthy of his industry and ingenuity. He retained throughout the discussion his original prejudice against the claim of Sir Philip Francis, and he stood almost alone in his belief that Junius was Lord George Germaine. If he was not happy in his attempted solution of a standing problem, he exposed at various times many prevailing fallacies. His Pearls and Mock Pearls of History is a good example of the assiduous ingenuity with which he investigated received traditions.

Whatever may be his fate hereafter, Mr. Hayward was still better known to his own contemporaries as a member of society than as a man of letters. A word is wanted to express without invidious associations the function which he discharged with general acceptance to the great advantage of a wide and conspicuous circle. A "diner-out," besides that the term is awkward and ungraceful, suggests to unfriendly commentators the notion of a parasite. The welcome guest in the best houses gave more than he received, and he maintained without effort or question absolute independence. That he shared with those around him habitual interest in the private history of the moment merely proved that even in exalted spheres there is a great deal of human nature, including curiosity as to the affairs of neighbours. The typical philanthropist in Terence who thought that nothing which concerned man was foreign to himself, must have included in his lawful objects of interest gossip and scandal. It may be admitted that benevolent sympathies of this kind account in some degree for a certain amount of detraction to which Mr. Hayward was exposed. On the other hand, it must be remembered that reputed unpopularity tends to augment its own volume by echo and reverberation. A successful man is often disliked by those whom he has never offended, merely because he is supposed to be disliked by others. Casual observers fear that, if they fail to notice anticipated defects, they may be accused of dulness of perception. The best proof of Mr. Hayward's merits is that during half a century of unfriendly remarks, which were not always without foundation, his social position was never impaired. Thirty or forty years ago fashionable novelists sometimes introduced under a thin disguise caricatures which were intended to render him ridiculous; but he probably cared little for additional notoriety; and the attacks of his enemies can seldom have cost him the loss of a friend. It is remarkable that, notwithstanding his ability and his social aptitudes, Mr. Hayward was not a brilliant talker. In the rapid interchange of thought which forms the best conversation he scarcely pretended to excel. His special gift was that of a narrator, for no one had a greater store of anecdotes or told them better. It was not without the exercise of labour and of skill that he became a master of modern mythology. Among the various versions in which good stories are commonly circulated he selected not the most closely accordant with facts, which might indeed be difficult to ascertain, but the most pointed and most amusing. If necessary he had no hesitation in pruning excrescences or in adding needful amplifications. If story-telling is not the highest form of talk, it is the most uniformly available, especially as, unlike good conversation, it requires no second performer. If Mr. Hayward made friends by his ability, he kept them by higher qualities, and especially by his own fidelity. No man was more tenacious of attachment or less capricious, and his loss is deeply and widely regretted.

DETECTIVES.

WHEN it came out, not long ago, that eleven of the jurymen who tried Bondurand and Woolf for conspiring to blow up the German Embassy were for acquitting the accused, and that the only juror who was for condemning them based his decision, not on evidence of guilt, but on the broad generalization that all foreigners are naturally rascals, there was but one course to be adopted. It was hopeless to try the case again; so the Attorney-General entered a nolle prosequi, the Recorder duly discharged the prisoners, and the police, who had cut such a ridiculous figure in the business, doubtless hoped that we should all dismiss the matter from our minds as soon as possible. That is unfortunately not in our power; for their lack of success in tracing crime has been so marked of late that they have, so to speak, forced the hand of censure. Mr. Howard Vincent lately told us that, as regards life and property, London under his guardianship has become the "safest capital in the world." In saying this he was as modest as one of his predecessors, Mr. Jacob Townsend—an illustrious Director of Criminal Investigation of whom Mr. Vincent may possibly have heard, or read—who used to poke Home Secretaries in the ribs, and, when they affected to ignore his importance, playfully remind them that "the business of the State couldn't go on without the help of us as knows the tricks of the town." Could he have foreseen the recent revival of garotting, and the pitiful failures of the police, not only to detect the murderer of the woman in Artillery Square, Westminster, but to unravel the mystery which shrouds the "plot" against the German Embassy, might he not have slightly qualified his boast? As for Townsend, he of course was a vulgar, underbred, uneducated thief-taker. Mr. Vincent, on the contrary, is, as we all know, a cultured and courteous gentleman, animated with the best intentions, and it is in no way our desire even to suggest the remotest comparison between them. In fact, if by some process his self-sufficiency could be kept in just proportion to his intelligence, Mr. Vincent's public performances would not provoke our criticism at all. But as things go, they do; and, when grave measures affecting the future management of the Metropolitan Police Force are being canvassed—when, on one hand, we have people demanding that it be governed by the new Municipality of London, and, on the other, that its control shall still be vested in the Home Secretary—it may be not amiss to draw attention to one branch of its administration of the failure of which we are reminded by late events, and concerning which many wrong views prevail. That branch is not the keeping of order, but the detecting of crime, and it is interesting to observe that failure in this has been utilized as an argument from analogy in favour of putting the police under the "Municipality of the Future." The recent detection of the Fenian dynamitards both in Birmingham and Glasgow, we are told, proves that a police, ruled by local authority, can be effective. Therefore it is argued, the London police force, if ruled by the new metropolitan local authority, will also be made efficient for detective duty. We are quite willing to admit that the discovery of the plots in Birmingham was a piece of legitimate detection, such as we have little right to look for in London. But it does not at all follow that the London detective force would be a bit sharper under a Municipal Government than they are now under the rule of the Home Office. It is not at all likely that the system in accordance with which the force is organized would be changed, and it is the system, not the rule, which is at fault.

For that it is at fault is not now to be concealed, even by Mr. Vincent's gushing reports and speeches. It is absurd to take a city like Paris, and compare the numbers of crimes detected there with those for London, and then draw the inference that, because more are discovered here than in Paris, our detective force is superior to that of the French capital. There is the greatest difference in the world between the two cases. When Mr. Vincent talks of London being "the safest capital in the world," he not only forgets that it is a comparatively easy business to make it safe, our criminal classes being of a low type of intellect; but he also forgets that the precincts of the Savoy and the Thames Embankment are not even now, with all his precautions, much safer than Hounslow Heath in the days of Jonathan Wild, or Kent Street in the time of Jerry Abbershaw. Does he not also ignore the 124 persons who disappeared in London last year, of whom all traces are lost? What allowance does he make for the number of dead bodies in the river, technically known to Rogue Riderhood and his fellow-fishermen as "stiff uns," which these toilers of the Thames bring to land every week, usually bearing marks of violence? The plain truth is that the business of detecting crime is very badly done in London, save when the criminal is a dull-witted brutal rough or a reckless dissipated rogue "so loose of soul" that in his cups he will talk incautiously about his affairs in the hearing of associates, especially female associates, who can betray him at will. But if he is a clever fellow, a man of brains and pluck, and some degree of education, if, above all things, he lives "respectably," haunts no thieves' tavern, takes no woman into his confidence, and limits his partnership in crime to one or two men as wary and secretive as himself, he can go on for years committing all manner of misdeeds in defiance of Mr. Howard Vincent and all his works. Low-class crime can be dealt with fairly well by our London detectives; but as for high-class crime, that is quite another affair. In attempting to discover a murder or a burglary committed by an intelligent person, Mr. Howard Vincent's "staff" are pretty nearly impotent. Since the time of the late Inspector Field there has been but one man known to fame at Scotland Yard who could even make a pretence of tackling a crime committed by a person of high skill and intelligence, and that was the luckless Druscowitch, who ruined a great career by permitting himself to be inveigled into the De Goncourt betting frauds. Of course we know that the popular idea of the Scotland Yard detective is very much like that which Mrs. Gamp had about "young Bailey." To him "all wickedness is print." The secrets of the dark side of life are all open to him. In virtue of an almost occult power, he can follow up the thinnest "clue" and track the most tortuous villany to its source. He is supposed to be a being of preternaturally sharp wits, who devotes his superhuman intelligence to the discovery of hidden crime, all for the modest salary of three or four guineas a week. Another and probably a better founded belief, however, is that detectives have no occult power of divining criminal mysteries, and no mysterious sources of information. They are as a rule only promoted constables, and have, according to this view, simply a large and varied acquaintance with the lower order of criminals, with whom they converse amicably when they meet, with whom they even hobnob in pot-houses, and who regard them with superstitious awe. They have a still closer acquaintanceship with the women with whom these persons associate, and who usually possess themselves of their secrets. Our omniscient detective, in fact, rarely knows more than can be got by the treachery of one knave to another, or, failing that, can be wormed out of some woman in the knave's secret, her tongue having been first of all loosened either by jealousy or drink. And it is certainly a curious—one might almost say it was also a corroborating—fact that, when murder or outrage is committed by people who either do not keep company with men or women "known to the police" as likely to "peach," or who confide their plans and their secrets to nobody likely to divulge either, it is apt to remain a secret for ever, and hold a permanent place in the long list of "undiscovered crimes."

There is a strange story told in the life of Munden the actor which will illustrate the strength and weakness of our system of criminal investigation. Munden one day complained to his friend, Sir William Parsons, the magistrate at Bow Street, that his house in Kentish Town was robbed. He was advised to say nothing about it, because the sum lost was less than the reward usually given (40*l.*) for discovering a burglary; but, by way of compensation, Sir William told him he might, if he chose, see the man who did the deed. Munden agreed. The magistrate then asked him to go to the "Brown Bear" tavern "over the way" next day at noon, where he would meet Jacob Townsend the "runner" entertaining a company of thieves and burglars. Townsend would invite him to sit down, and, when he did, the man on his (Munden's) right hand would be the burglar who had "cracked his crib" in Kentish Town. The actor followed his instructions. At the appointed hour he saw Townsend at the head of the table in the "Brown Bear" carving a round of beef for a most villanous-looking gang of guests. The officer asked one he called "Jemmy" to "sit up and make room for Mr. Munden," who, as soon as he took his seat, knew that he had his man on his right. For the moment he turned to look at him, all the other thieves broke into guffaws of laughter, and "Jemmy" himself showed signs of distress. A good deal of "chaff" was spent on him—showing that everybody, from the detective downwards, knew what had happened and how the affair had been taken—and then Munden, who enjoyed amazingly the joke of lunching with his own burglar in company of a Bow Street runner, bowed to the company and left the room, much edified by his odd experience. But the same kind of thing goes on now, for the traditions of old Bow Street are to a great extent still maintained in Scotland Yard. Now, as in the old time, the detectives associate with the criminals, though not so blatantly or openly as did the famous triumvirate—Townsend, Macmanus, and Jealous—"delightful company, delicious fellows," Peter Pindar ironically calls them in his ode satirizing the "Shields of Kings." It is true that we have no such shameful arrangement as that in accordance with which a thief was let alone provided he did not steal 40*l.* worth of property. That being a hanging matter, and entitling the police to "blood money," he could not well be let alone. But there is now, it is said, an informal understanding between the police and the criminal classes that the minor crimes will not be gone into hotly, when those who commit them can make themselves useful as spies. The person termed the "policeman's nose" is, in London, a minor criminal, who has a certain amount of indulgence extended to him, so long as he does nothing very desperate, and serves the detectives well with hints and suggestions which may help them to trace out that mysterious "clue" they always follow nowhere, when they are flying at game which soars beyond the scent of their humble coadjutor. But the keenness of the scent depends on the keenness of the "nose," and, unhappily, that is not keen when the scent is left by one not of the creature's own kind. It must not be supposed that we are blaming the authorities only for acting on the old principle of setting a thief to catch a thief. This has been adopted in the best of detective services, such as that organized by the famous, or infamous, Vidocq, in Paris during 1812-27. Our complaint is that it has always been applied badly in London, and that it has never been applied so badly as it is now by Mr. Howard Vincent. It has always been applied badly because we have never engaged the services of cassiniers of a superior grade, and we have never enlisted in the detective force men of real ability and fair education, who should devote themselves to working out attenuated "clues" in difficult cases. What we have done has been to try to bring hidden crime to light by means of the "policeman's nose" and the promoted constable—by a thief who is, as a rule, a blockhead, and a constable who is seldom a match for a criminal with more than the average intelligence of his class.

But we have of late done something even more foolish than this. The system of detecting crime by means of "the policeman's nose" was one which depended for its efficiency on its localization. At each police-court there is usually a local detective, who knows the district, as he himself will tell you, "like a book." He knows every thieves' den and "leaving shop" in it. He knows the history, private and public, the life, prison and domestic, of every male and female criminal practising in his neighbourhood. He is on familiar terms with them all, and it is through him that the "nose" is put on the scent. He and his "nose" having between them worked up a case, in the old time he got some credit by it, for he often made the arrest, and appeared in court to give evidence, where he was sometimes complimented by the newspapers as "the active and intelligent officer attached to such and such a district." Now that is all changed. Mr. Howard Vincent has centralized the detective work of the London police. The local men have still to ferret out the case on to which they are put. But they are puppets pulled from headquarters, and all they do is buried in "reports" which they send to Scotland Yard, where their chiefs sit at ease and read them. Then, it would seem, when they have got all the rough work done for them by the local man and his "nose," these great personages appear on the scene, make the arrest "from information received," and amid the plaudits of the press give their evidence at the Old Bailey. Mr. Howard Vincent and his principal subordinates in Scotland Yard are, by their local confrères, technically termed "the swaggerers," and the very mention of their names to a district detective fills his heart with exceeding bitterness. Thus it comes to pass that since the mania for centralization began to affect Scotland Yard, the system of working through local detectives, who in turn worked through spies and informers of the criminal class, has not been improving in efficiency, for the simple reason that when the local officer sees the fruits of his labour seized at their ripest by the person he styles "a swaggerer from headquarters," his zeal is apt to slacken and his enthusiasm to abate. No doubt Mr. Vincent hoped, by separating the people in Scotland Yard as much as possible from direct contact with the criminal classes, to obviate the recurrence of such scandals as that which doomed the unfortunate Druscowitch to ruin. We have always believed Mr. Vincent's intentions to be excellent; but our point is that the carrying of them out has led to the results we have now mentioned. Then another change was to be made about which Mr. Howard Vincent is always suspiciously silent. We were to have brought into the detective force a superior class of spies and detectives, men who were not to be taken from the ranks of the ordinary criminal class and the ordinary policemen. What has been the result of that experiment? Have the lawyers' clerks, the led captains, the broken-down gentlemen, the Irish generals, the Argentine admirals, the Servian brigadiers, and all the motley crowd who usually serve the French Prefect of Police as mouchards been a success when employed by Mr. Howard Vincent in England? Then, have any of the new order of detectives been tried—men, that is to say, taken from that branch of the legal profession devoted more especially to Old Bailey practice, and from the curious class of newspaper reporters who have a monomania for ferreting out crimes, and who, if the truth were told, have given the police nearly all the best suggestions they ever got, in cases where they were pitted against high-class criminals? Or, if they have been tried, have they been found wanting? Some people, who ought to know, say that both experiments have been made, but with discouraging results. Others say that they were made in such a way that the results were certain to be discouraging; and this might well be the case. The whole strength of Scotland Yard is put forth against the introduction of any but promoted constables to the higher grades of the detective force; indeed, the feelings of the local officers to the "swaggerer" are reproduced in "the swaggerer" himself when the person he terms "the outsider" threatens to invade his domain. But the result of it all is that, as compared with the French police de sûreté, our detective force is a feeble sham.

MR. JOHN HENRY PARKER.

A LONG and laborious life cheerfully and usefully devoted to the development of learning, art, and piety among his contemporaries, is the phrase by which the career of Mr. John Henry Parker can be most aptly summed up, and it is a record well deserving of a grateful and sympathetic commemoration. Mr. Parker's social position was admirably suited to bring out his characteristic qualities; for he was both a publisher and a bookseller in a University town, and was so identified with one of those select forms of the lesser "commerce" which directly minister to culture. One book was not like another to him, for he had a strong predilection for archæology and architecture, and especially those of the middle ages, and was born at a happy moment for persons who felt that preference to make themselves both useful and famous, when pioneers like Rickman, Thomas Hope, the first Pugin, Britton, and Willis had cleared the way for architectural and ecclesiological societies and for that brilliant bevy of writers, architects, and architect-like amateurs whose works have been so grateful to Mr. Parker and his compeers in their official character of publishers. So there appeared years ago from his pen The Glossary of Architecture, profusely but wisely illustrated, as octavos in those days were less commonly issued than in this age. Successive editions, always enlarged and improved, have long testified to its popularity and to the patient love of the compiler. The classical styles could claim but a subordinate position in its contents, and it was after a due interval followed by the Manual of Gothic Architecture, which has also been frequently republished; while at a much later date Mr. Parker brought out a new edition of Rickman's standard treatise on Gothic Architecture, with additions which quite transformed it. Of the early instituted Oxford Society for the Study of Gothic Architecture he was from the first an active member; and his cheerful presence and copious and much-tried powers of explanation were till a very late period an indispensable feature at the annual Congresses of the Archæological Institute. Church architecture, of course, was copiously handled by Mr. Parker in his various books, lectures, and papers; but he never would call himself an ecclesiologist. Indeed, the quiet good man's inbred caution was often a source of half-humorous annoyance to his younger and more ardent ecclesiological friends, who felt that he might have safely spread with a more extended arm the ægis of his unimpeachable respectability over their own much heckled selves. But to him they were boys, and forward boys, whom he kept in order because he really loved them. He had in due time the opportunity of showing how much he knew of and cared for the domestic side of mediæval architecture, by taking up and completing, after the death of the original writer, the unfinished work of Mr. Hudson Turner, which, with its double authorship, is a standard authority on its subject.

Mr. Parker's position towards the "Oxford" movement in the Church of England was that of publishing largely for it, and although his habitual caution prevented his saying much, his sympathies were clearly with its more moderate developments. He was a constant publisher for Dr. Pusey, and he brought out the Libraries of the Fathers and of Anglo-Catholic Theology.

In his old age Mr. Parker appeared in quite a new and unexpected character. His health was enfeebled, and he was ordered to spend his winters in Rome. He had already made his mark in the investigation of mediæval French architecture. But Old Rome was very different from France or England, yet the spirit of the veteran archæologist was unquenched, and the necessity of working imperative with him. The times were propitious for one of his temperament, for people were beginning to sicken of the negative and destructive archæology of theorists, and to welcome those minute investigations which have transformed the science, as in Italy, Greece, and Asia Minor, so in Egypt and on the plain of the Euphrates and the Tigris. The Rome which Mr. Parker set himself to decipher was that of the Kings no less than of the Republic and the Empire. He had much to contend against in Italian jealousy, but he plodded on cheerfully. His friends might occasionally smile in good-humour at his eagerness in unearthing fossways. But it is certain that the honest indefatigable Englishman has had no contemptible share in the great work of discovering the forgotten remnants of old Rome.

"PRECEPT" AND PRACTICE.

THE London School Board has decided to issue precepts for the sum of 948,745*l.* to meet the expenses of the next year. In order to satisfy this demand, a rate of eightpence in the pound must be imposed, and the public (with a fair amount of reason) are becoming somewhat alarmed. In 1870 Mr. Forster named threepence as the outside limit of the rate, and any one who ventured to say that the figure would probably be exceeded was instantly set down as a purblind foe of education. Yet in five years the rate had passed threepence, and it has gone on steadily rising in spite of yearly assurances that no further increase was possible. Excepting a few desperate apologists, nobody now fails to see that a shilling rate will be levied in a very short time. When that amount is named in the annual budget, there will probably be a violent reaction against even rational expenditure on education, and the blundering of amateurs and unpractical crotcheteers will have deplorable results. When the new precepts have been collected and spent, the Board will have succeeded in getting rid of 12,949,312*l.* in fifteen years, which is a very tolerable sum for one body of experimentalists to command and apply. A few plain words, showing how the money has been spent and what has been gained by spending it, may have good effects. The total amount borrowed by the Board up to the autumn of 1882 was 4,800,000*l.*, and this sum was wholly expended on building. In addition to the money paid for bricks and mortar, 3,780,000*l.* was spent on paying the teachers and on buying school materials. For 1883 the expenditure was 821,000*l.*; so that 9,381,000*l.* has been directly paid for elementary schools alone. Offices, clerks, visitors (who enforce the compulsory clauses of the Act), industrial schools, and legal expenses will, by the end of another year, have raised the total to nearly 13,000,000*l.*; and the annual outlay is expected to become greater. We have thus set up a huge public department in our midst, and this department has received powers which are practically unlimited; for the veto of the Education Department need hardly be taken into account. Let us now see what we have got for our money, and how far the promises made ten years ago have been fulfilled. We were told that poor and lowly children would be forced into school, and the majority of people really believed that the new Act mainly aimed at benefiting the classes that had hitherto been neglected. The Board has provided school places for 286,276 children at a cost of over 5,000,000*l.* Scrutinizing the returns, we try to hit on a way of discovering how far the Arab class has been considered in disposing of this heavy sum, and the result of our examination is very startling and very disappointing. We may take for granted that the Arabs are not required to pay more than the minimum fee of one penny. For boys and girls above seven years of age 27,245 places have been provided in penny schools; for infants under seven years of age a total number of 30,327 places have been provided. But, of the infants who pay one penny, 20,000 attend schools which are meant for children of the more "respectable" class, so that we are quite safe in saying that for the residuum about 37,000 school places have been provided. After all the flourishes about lifting the lowly, it is most melancholy to learn that the lowly have been left almost out of the reckoning. There are 300,000 children on the rolls of the Board schools, and of that number less than 30,000 belong to the class in whose interest our pence and our pity were to be bestowed. The accommodation for children who pay a sixpenny fee is 6,016; fourpence, 14,723; threepence, 66,034; twopence, 140,760; from which figures it becomes very evident that the poor Arab's untutored mind has not been very heavily remembered. The children of artisans, clerks, and small tradesmen have been well cared for; but the voters who were so enthusiastic about education in 1868 and 1869 scarcely imagined that the provisions of the great reforming measure were to be stretched so far; certainly none of them thought that nearly 100,000 school places would be provided for people who could afford to pay from threepence to sixpence per week for each child. The difference between promise and performance is very strikingly marked here.

Pass to another item of expenditure and observe the gain. We used to be informed that no children would remain uneducated in future. Sir Edmund Hay Currie, a most vigorous enthusiast, now says:—"I will venture to say that there are as many poor children now in the streets who do not go to school as there were eight years ago." The honesty of this confession certainly shows how little mere personal considerations influence the best of the men who have worked on the Board, but at present we have nothing to do with sentiment; we are balancing promises and performances. The average attendance in London schools during 1874 was 270,466; it has now risen to more than 400,000. Allowing for the normal increase of population, it does not appear that the Board's action has been productive of much result, and this conclusion is strengthened when we observe that in 1877 it was customary for 80·2 of every hundred children in Board schools to attend daily, while in 1882 the percentage was 80·5. Now the sum of 30,000*l.* per year is paid for enforcing compulsion; so in five years the ratepayers paid 150,000*l.* to produce an improvement of 0·3 per cent. in the attendance. A corps of 250 visitors and 10 superintendents is employed in the work of compulsion; the Vice-Chairman of the Board states that, when the visitors are taken off, the attendance, in some districts, becomes better; yet this useless and superfluous staff is kept on at heavy cost. About 6,000 parents are summoned to the police-court every year, and about 45,000 are warned on account of their children's irregularity; and this is about all that is done for the money. The Chairman of the Bye-Laws Committee reports that, "for the real work of compulsion, the Board are not spending more than ten thousand pounds." But, if the real work costs ten thousand, why pay thirty? The question is simple, and should be practically answered.

We turn to another item. The Architect's Department for the Board costs 6,200*l.* per year; but the head of this rather expensive office does not give his whole time to the service of the ratepayers, and the results are remarkable. When 3,000,000*l.* had been spent on building schools it was suddenly discovered that every one of the costly buildings had been, so far as the floors were concerned, built upon a wrong principle. The floors of all the schools in London were torn up and altered at a sweep, and the cost of this operation was enormous; in short, three millions were paid for an experiment which turned out to have been made in a wrong direction. The average cost per annum of alterations in schools is 15,000*l.*; yet the officials whose architectural conceptions need such expensive modification receive more than 6,000*l.* per year. This does not look like economy. Another and more trifling matter may be mentioned, not because of the magnitude of the expenditure involved, but because it illustrates the Board's methods. In 1877 the Industrial Schools Committee reported that it was desirable to obtain a school-ship. The Committee declared that a vessel to accommodate 500 boys might be bought and fitted for 15,000*l.*, and the Board resolved that 15,000*l.* should not be exceeded. This was in October. In April 1878 the Board resolved that the cost should not exceed 22,000*l.*; in July 1878 they resolved that 40,000*l.* should be paid. A superintendent was appointed in October 1877, at a salary of 350*l.*, with unfurnished apartments; in April 1878 a bill for 390*l.* was paid for furnishing these "unfurnished" rooms. The officers' quarters cost 646*l.*; the manager's rooms, 274*l.*; the deck-house, 55*l.*; and then, what with the Daghestan rugs for the carpenters, Caspian rugs for the stokers, Sournach carpets for the officers, and Kurd rugs for the lampmen and night-watchmen, the bill for upholstery ran to near 2,000*l.* It now turns out that the first cost of the ship was 50,000*l.*, and much of this amount was spent without any authority whatever. We now learn that 450 boys are maintained on board at an average gross cost of 30*l.* per boy per annum; so that up to the present date the vessel and her crew have cost more than 100,000*l.* For what? The Home Secretary, on May 4th, 1877, issued a definite command that all the boys should be trained as seamen. But the boys do not become seamen; nothing of the sort. They go back to a shore life as a rule. It will scarcely be believed that every merchant sailor who has been trained by the Shaftesbury has cost the ratepayers three thousand pounds: the rest of the boys have gone to employments for which the costly vessel was never intended to educate them. This interesting muddle is a typical example of the way in which the deep pocket of the ratepayers has been drained. At every step we see want of foresight, want of consideration, want of practical ability, and an utter and almost inconceivable lack of system.

Continuing with another instance of what we may term minor extravagance, we may notice the body of instructors and inspectors who are now kept in the Board's service. After a staff of teachers had been appointed at salaries sufficient to tempt the best men in the country, the Board proceeded to assume that these teachers were incompetent. The teaching staff costs half a million per year; but, besides paying these officials to teach the children, the Board employs a perfect army of costly instructors to teach the teachers. A commonplace man might ask, If the school staff are incompetent, why appoint them? If they are not incompetent, why pay a corps of instructors to teach them their business? The commonplace person would get no solution to his problem; but we think that a solution should be demanded in a very peremptory way by the ratepayers. The few instances which we have named may help outsiders to understand how it is that the rate has gone up to eightpence, but we have not as yet done more than touch the fringe of the subject. Our examples are rather illustrative than exhaustive; yet they are sufficient to show the financial and administrative methods by which a gigantic sum has been "melted." So far as we have gone we see that five millions have been paid for buildings, most of which are in many essential respects very faulty, and that three of the five millions were laid out on schools which had to be radically altered. We also see that, out of a school accommodation of 286,000, only about ten per cent. of the places are prepared for the very class for whose good the Act was passed; the other ninety per cent. are devoted to classes which were not thought of when the Act was passed. We also see that the persons who were abused and laughed at for saying that the rate must rise above threepence were right to a melancholy degree. We also see that about half a million has been spent on a staff of visitors and clerks, with the result that "as many children are in the streets who have never been to school as there were eight years ago." The minor eccentricities of expenditure speak for themselves. People who inquire "Where have the thirteen millions gone?" now possess a few data which may guide them. Should we return to the subject we trust to explain the disappearance of the millions with still more emphatic proofs and interesting details. We do not know any more bitter warning against the folly of trusting good intentions than is furnished by the career of the School Board. No men ever meant better; few men ever worked half so hard, and few men ever rode crotchets and encouraged benevolent whims with more unhappy results to the public.

COMFORT IN RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

AFTER having hitherto adhered almost entirely to the type of railway carriage originally constructed by the earliest Companies, the managers of some of our great lines have shown a tendency to abandon it for new forms. These are not merely improvements produced by a greater perfection of detail; but they are so different from the old type that their advocates must believe that hitherto the world, or at least the first-class world, has paid for an altogether wrong kind of comfort. At any rate, acting as if this were their belief, the managers have announced that they intend to substitute Pullman cars for first-class carriages on some of their trains. Now, we must suppose that railway directors know their business, and that these changes would not be made unless it was evident that the public seemed to prefer the American pattern of carriage. But, at the same time, it may be well worth while to consider in what genuine comfort in railway travelling consists, and how far such comfort is supplied by the different forms of carriage which the public have now had ample opportunities of trying. We all know the fable of the Emperor's new clothes. And it may be noticed that their invisible glories must have compensated through many a winter's day for their chilliness, until it was discovered by a child, gifted with a habit of independent observation, that neither the glories nor the clothes existed. Have we not assumed that Pullman cars (like the German army organization) are suited to our needs because they are suited to the needs of those who invented them? And is it not the novelty and reputation which they still possess, rather than their real comfort, which induces English passengers to regard them as desirable? It may be that we are becoming Americanized, and that this is one of the signs of the process. But, if this be the real explanation, it is rather unfortunate that we cannot Americanize the mileage of our railways simultaneously with the polish of our manners.

Amongst the inventions of the present century one of the most modest, but at the same time one of the most important, is that of the armchair. A careful distinction should be made between a chair with arms and an armchair. Chairs with arms were no doubt common during the earlier civilization of the world. The remains which we possess of Egyptian art abound with examples of them, and they were equally common in classical and mediæval times. But the armchair is of an entirely different character. It is not merely a different variety, it is a different species. Its introduction is so recent that many old-fashioned people regard it as the effeminate production of an over-luxurious age. It is essentially an English product, and is seldom to be met with on the Continent. But, like the works of educational authors, it came into the world "to supply a want that had been felt"—by the schoolmasters. Now one of the chief merits of a genuine armchair is that it gives repose not only in one position but in many. One can sit up in it, one can almost lie down in it; the head can nestle into its corners, the cushioned arms may serve as supports for the body, for the elbows, or even for a book. It is not adapted for the exercise of social intercourse. A drawing-room furnished entirely with lounging-chairs would no doubt be comfortable. But the hostess who was rash enough to venture on the innovation would probably find that her guests preferred enjoying their luxury in silence. It is, however, well adapted for the support of the human frame under all circumstances when men are required neither to talk nor to write.

Now these seem to be exactly the circumstances which a man finds himself in when travelling. A few people, it is true, are able to keep up conversation in a train. But such people must be gifted with very remarkable powers both of voice and ear to find the occupation anything but excessively tiring. And they little know the torture they inflict on their less favourably-endowed neighbours by refusing to take the many hints which these latter, as a rule, so freely give in order to stop the ceaseless flow. Most men in a railway carriage divide their time between reading, looking out of the window, and sleeping. They wish, as far as possible, to make the period of their journey, whether it is long or short, a period of repose. With this view, an Englishman will always do his best to choose the most empty compartment he can find, so as not only to be able to give himself ample space for his person and his smaller luggage, but also to ensure as much quiet as possible. He will usually place himself next a window, so as to be able to see the country he is passing through to the greatest advantage with the least effort. And he will often go the length of spending half-a-crown, if his journey is long, in order to retain the advantages he thinks he has secured. He must then clearly desire to lounge during his journey in the nearest approach to an armchair that can be furnished him. Our ordinary first-class compartments furnish him with this to a good degree. They are not yet perfect, but on some of our great lines they have so improved of late years as to be nearly so. The managers in many cases deserve the greatest credit for having realized in this matter the true direction of advance. They have borrowed from the American car all its best features, and have adopted them without the sacrifice of privacy or repose. There are two or three English lines which have introduced carriages which retain the comforts we have always enjoyed and add to them new luxuries. The general principle of these is always the same, although they solve the problem in rather different fashions. The subdivision into isolated compartments is retained, and the privacy of the occupants is as great as before; but, instead of opening directly to the outside, each group of seats communicates with a through passage, which passes from end to end of the whole carriage, and from which access is gained to a lavatory. The sleeping-carriage which the East Coast Railway provides on its Scotch trains is a very perfect development of this principle. The number of passengers in each compartment is reduced to two, and the abominable system of berths placed one above the other is discarded. But there still, no doubt, remain a certain number of improvements to be made. The lighting is still disgraceful. Companies may be waiting for the further perfecting of electric light. But they should notice that in electricity we have already attained to the certainty of a relatively better apparatus than the ordinary carriage-lamp. The heating arrangements are still very clumsy. Each compartment should be warmed by steam or water, capable of being turned on to or off from that compartment by its occupants at will. A separate stove in each carriage should be most carefully avoided, since American experience shows that the danger of fire from these is very great. Many people, having been jammed after collision amongst the wooden débris which have caught fire from the scattered coals of the stove, have been burned to death, calling out for help to those who, standing but a few yards off, have been unable to move a finger to assist them, owing to the heat of the burning wreck. Other little matters will no doubt suggest themselves to many travellers. With what advantage, for instance, might we borrow the always freshly washed "antimacassar" of the Italian carriage. It is the careful consideration of all these small improvements in detail, and not by any violent and crude change, that the perfection of comfort will be reached.

But in turning to the more showy structures that have come from America one is really puzzled to guess why what is pompously termed a drawing-room palace car should ever be used twice by the same passenger. It is decorated in a style which leaves the mind of the beholder blank to all other thoughts but the question what grudge the designer can have borne to travellers that he wished to consign them to an early lunatic asylum; while it suggests to the bad sailor associations which he would prefer keeping absent from his mind. Railway carriages are no fit place for decoration or art in any form. They should merely look clean, neat and negative. Then the unfortunate passenger finds that, instead of an armchair to sit in, he has only a chair with arms. There is no corner to get his head back into for a quiet sleep, and he cannot settle himself into an easy position for reading. Presently, if the train is going fast, he finds that the car is actually rolling from side to side. True, there is little of the jolting motion which is the only annoyance in the ordinary carriage; he could even write with comfort. But this rolling begins to produce the feelings which that of a ship will do under similar circumstances. He looks around for a way out of his difficulty, and thinks that perhaps if there were a little more air he might be better. He orders a window to be opened. But, alas, he has no longer the control of the window as he used to have in his first-class carriage. The open window would produce a draught at the back of some passenger's neck who is sitting at the other end of the car. He has no resource but to devote his energies to struggling against the feeling of nausea until the express train arrives at the next station—a long time perhaps. Meanwhile he congratulates himself that at least he has not to talk. But this delusion does not last long. An acquaintance has espied him from the other end of the car. And he brings and introduces three more acquaintances. And the traveller, almost overcome by his nausea, has to invent civil speeches and to keep up the conversation and to strain his ears to hear the voices of the others above the noise of the rolling wheels and the rattling lamps. Few arrive at Dover Pier with a greater sense of satisfaction than he feels when he steps out of the drawing-room palace car into an ordinary first-class carriage, vowing within himself that he will never pass its portals again.

However well Pullman cars may be adapted for the climate, the country, and the people for which they were invented, it seems clear that they will not suit either our habits or our railways. In America the pace of the trains is slow compared with that of our great expresses, and, owing partly to the enormous length of the lines, and partly to the action of the frost on the road in winter, the permanent way is not maintained with that almost microscopic accuracy to which we have become accustomed. The arrangement of springs under the car is calculated, as far as possible, to neutralize the jolting that would be produced by the roughness of the tracks. But this very arrangement renders the whole structure liable to that rolling motion which produces feelings of sickness in so many people when the train is running at a high rate of speed. It becomes absolutely necessary also to warm the car artificially when the travellers have to remain in it for a week, during part of which the thermometer may stand at many degrees below zero. This can easily be done by a stove placed at one end of the car and watched by the attendant. Americans often live in rooms which Englishmen would regard as intolerably stuffy, so that they feel no necessity for open windows. The sense of quiet seems a thing unknown to them. They are largely consumed with a desire to learn all about the private affairs of the stranger who sits next them, and have but little delicacy in attempting to satisfy their curiosity by the most abrupt questions of the most personal kind—a process which, it must be observed, is not resented amongst themselves. All these things make the Pullman car, if not a perfect, at least a fairly suitable means of conveyance for Transatlantic purposes; but they make it an intolerable one here. It came here with a reputation as glittering as its own gilding, and there are many people who are so entirely ignorant of the meaning of the word comfort that there seems to be some danger of its being sufficiently patronized to induce the managers of railways to continue it in some cases even to the exclusion of the first-class carriage. So long as the two are used in conjunction no harm can be done. But it will be a very serious matter for the comfort-loving portion of the public if the drawing-room palace car is ever allowed entirely to exclude any other form of compartment.

LEO XIII. AND HIS CARDINALS.

THE death of Cardinal Bilio, at a comparatively early age, will have something more than a personal significance for all who watch with interest the present fortunes and future prospects of the Papacy. That it should have so closely synchronized with the death of one of the most widely known of foreign Protestant theologians, the Danish Bishop Martensen, whose treatise on Dogma has been translated into more languages than one, and has justly attained a European celebrity—is a curious coincidence, but nothing more. The special point to be noted here is the position held by the late Cardinal in the Sacred College and the destiny anticipated for him by a large party in the Curia and the Roman Catholic Church. As he was only born in 1826, and raised to the purple in 1866 at the age of forty, he was still a junior member of the body to which he had belonged for eighteen years, and Cardinals are apt to be longlived. At the last Conclave in 1878 he received the largest number of votes next to the present Pope, and his name would pretty certainly have been put forward by the reactionary party among the electors at the next vacancy, and with a reasonable prospect of success. That his election would have meant, so far as it is possible to predict the conduct of a future Sovereign from the actions of an heir presumptive, a reversal of the policy of the present pontificate and a return to the spirit at least of the régime of Pius IX., need not be said. We have no intention of writing an obituary of Cardinal Bilio, nor would his life in itself have any particular claim on the attention of our readers. But he was far the ablest as well as the youngest of the surviving "creatures" of the late Pope—there is no discourtesy in the term which is habitually used at Rome to designate the Cardinals "created" by any given Pontiff—and his vigorous action at the Vatican Council has an historical and might have had a prophetic interest. He was thoroughly in the confidence of the late Pope and the Jesuits, and was employed in the editing of the Syllabus. It was even rumoured at the time that there was a scheme of Pius abdicating after the Vatican Council, with a view to Bilio succeeding him. For those who do not happen to be familiar with the Letters of Quirinus it may be worth while to recall some of the leading incidents of the Council in which he took a prominent part. It may be recollected that several preliminary Commissions were appointed to prepare the work for the future Council, and in the directing Congregation of Cardinals the most conspicuous figure was that of Bilio, then one of the youngest of the body both in age and membership, who was already observed never to lose an opportunity in conversation of extolling the proposed dogma of papal infallibility. It was said indeed that Archbishop Manning and Cardinal Reisach were the foremost personages in carrying on the infallibilist propaganda, but the former was not yet a Cardinal, and Reisach was out of health and died, away from Rome, within three weeks of the opening of the Council. And, while the wires might be, and no doubt often were, pulled from behind, the ostensible and public leadership in the business of the Council was assigned exclusively to members of the Sacred College as representing the Pontiff, who only attended himself on State occasions, or what were called Solemn Sessions, after the real work had been already settled. And it was considered that among the Cardinals "the four papal pillars of the Council"—in other words the four most powerful supporters of infallibilism—were De Angelis, De Luca, Capalti, and Bilio, especially the last, who passed for an eminent theologian at Rome, and of whom it was facetiously remarked that, "whereas the rest of the Cardinals and Monsignori held it a sin to understand any German at all, he knows two German words which he constantly repeats, but always with a shudder, deutsche Wissenschaft."

One of the first great wrangles after the opening of the Council was over the Schema de Fide, and then Cardinal Bilio was employed at the last moment to persuade the more indiscreet of the infallibilist party to withdraw premature amendments which it was feared might drive the Opposition bishops to extremities. But his method of procedure was not always characterized by similar moderation. When the learned French Bishop Maret, who had written a book against the new dogma, observed in the course of his speech that for the Council, which was assumed to be a lower authority, to affect to bestow on the Pope, who was ex hypothesi higher, the gift of infallibility was arguing in a vicious circle, Bilio rudely interrupted him with the passionate exclamation, "Concilium nihil dat Papæ nec dare potest, sed solummodo recognoscit, suffragia dat, et Sanctus Pater quod in Spiritu Sancto ipsi placet decidit"—which was of course to assume as a first premiss the very point under discussion. Even the majority thought this outbreak somewhat indecent, and it was publicly disowned by the presiding legate, Cardinal de Luca. He was however no less summary in his treatment of Bishop Verot of Savannah in a later Session, who not unnaturally objected to a statement in the preamble of the proposed decree that the new article was "juxta communem et universalem doctrinam," as being simply untrue in fact, since it was merely the opinion of the ultramontane school. Hereupon we are told that Bilio again interposed, "like a brawling monk," and declared the speaker was wandering from the question. He was however a shrewd man, and, in the narrow and technical sense of the term, a theological expert, and he had the advantage of knowing his own mind and the courage of his opinions. It may fairly be questioned whether any representative of the intransigenti faction among the Cardinals at all his equal is now to be found. And in spite of Pius IX. having twice over during his long reign filled up the Sacred College, his nominees are gradually dropping off. Twenty-eight Cardinals have already died since the accession of Leo XIII., and twelve "Hats" are at this moment at his disposal. Of the 58 existing members of the College, one was created by Gregory XII., Cardinal Schwarzenberg, Archbishop of Prague, 37 were created by Pius IX., and the remaining twenty by the present Pope; and of these last it is noteworthy that three are German, two French, one (Cardinal Newman) English, and one Irish, one an Armenian, and another a Pole. Nearly half of them therefore are now Italians, raising the whole number of foreign members of the existing College to 20 as against 32 Italians; a proportion unprecedented, we believe, for a very long time past. It would in fact be easy for his Holiness, if so disposed, to equalize the numbers by his distribution of the places now actually vacant. Among these vacancies are two of the six "Suburbicarian Sees," from which the Cardinal Bishops take their titles, Albano through the resignation of Cardinal Hohenlohe and Sabina through the death of Bilio. It is now more than three centuries and a half since any but an Italian has sat on the papal throne, Adrian VI. who died in 1523 being the last, but a large infusion of the foreign element into the Conclave might materially influence future elections. And the great reforming Popes, like Hildebrand, who in former ages did so much to restore the failing fortunes of their Church, were of Teutonic not Italian blood. It used during the last pontificate to be a favourite cry among those styled Liberal Catholics, "We want a Teutonic Pope."

The Sacred College now includes the greatest genius and first divine among English-speaking Roman Catholics, and in Cardinal Hergenröther, who was appointed in the same year as Dr. Newman, it has secured the greatest German historian—though of course far inferior to Döllinger—who would be at all a persona grata at Rome. Haynald again, Archbishop of Kalocsa, and Prince Furstenberg, Archbishop of Olmütz, both created by the present Pope, are men of mark, and took an active part in the opposition at the Vatican Council, and after voting against the decree of July 13 signed the Memorial against it presented to the Pope by the minority before leaving Rome on July 17. Haynald was considered, next to Strossmayer, the best Latin speaker at the Council, as well as one of the most adroit debaters. He made himself conspicuous, in a manner very unpleasant to the ruling authorities, both at the beginning and at the end of the Council, and if he has, like his colleagues of the minority, managed to swallow the obnoxious decree since then, it may fairly be conjectured that he too is one of those men convinced against their will who remain very much of the same opinion still. At an early session on February 22 he denounced the passion for new dogmas as the cause of dissension in the Church, and added that the authorities would be much better occupied in preserving the ancient doctrines in their purity which had hitherto proved sufficient, than in devising new ones; whereupon the President, Cardinal de Angelis, rang his bell violently and bade Haynald at once come down from the tribune, which however he did not do. When he had finished the excitement was so great that the sitting was at once adjourned. At the last session attended by the minority bishops, on July 16, the presiding legates bitterly censured a French pamphlet published under the title of La Dernière Heure du Concile, generally attributed to Archbishop Darboy of Paris, who was afterwards murdered by the Communists. The Spanish and Italian prelates—most of whom did not understand a word of French, and of course had not read the brochure—at once exclaimed "Nos condemnamus," and the Opposition bishops, who knew it well, replied "We do not." The presiding Cardinals however peremptorily required those present to subscribe a condemnation of the work, whereupon Haynald ironically advised them to have it translated into Latin, that he and his colleagues might examine it and see whether it deserved such rough treatment. Haynald himself is now a Cardinal, and the reputed author of the incriminated tractate is by many revered as a martyr; were he still living, he too would not improbably have been by this time raised to the purple. It is clear that a silent change has been going on for some years past, not merely in the personnel but the composition and character of the Sacred College, and every fresh vacancy that occurs seems to facilitate the process. Much will necessarily depend on the manner in which the twelve places now vacant are supplied, but the loss to the intransigente of a leader like Bilio is much more than a numerical one. The present Pope, in spite of his in one sense very real imprisonment at the Vatican—which the impression produced on the Curia by the recent judgment of the Roman tribunals in the matter of the Propaganda property will not tend to relax—may yet live many years, and for the interests of his flock, and of religious concord in Europe generally, a continuance of his reign is to be desired, but it cannot at his age be reckoned upon. And at Rome conjecture is always rife about the papabili, though it is seldom justified by the event. No one, that we are aware of, had predicted the election of Cardinal Pecci, and as long as the French Empire lasted there had been much talk of a Bonaparte wearing the triple crown. What may be affirmed with tolerable confidence is that the chances of an ultramontane succession, and especially of one likely to be both strong and durable, are sensibly diminished. More than that no looker-on mindful of the changes and chances of human affairs, and not least of that particular portion of them which is transacted in a Papal Conclave, can venture safely to assert.

MME. VIARD-LOUIS'S RECITALS.

THERE is something imposing in the mere idea of giving the whole of Beethoven's chamber compositions in chronological sequence, and Mme. Jenny Viard-Louis, who undertakes the pianist's share of the vast undertaking, may be congratulated on its novelty and enterprise. The immensity of Beethoven's pianoforte compositions, their enormous range of aim and variety of accomplishment, are sufficient to try the confidence of any but the most ardent students and the most able interpreters. If we except the five concertos, as being strictly orchestral works, there remain for the pianist no fewer than thirty-eight sonatas for piano—some of them presenting difficulties of the most exacting kind—ten others for piano and violin, five for piano and cello, eight trios for piano and strings, the sonata for piano and horn, a prodigious number of variations, &c., for the piano, besides the quintet for wind instruments and piano, and the quartets for strings and piano. In addition to these, the programme of Mme. Viard-Louis includes the occasional vocal compositions. It is manifest that, while the public are presented with a grandiose scheme, the pianist has set herself an arduous task, and one which, on completion, must necessarily abound in inequalities of rendering, technical and intellectual. While it is true that such an enterprise as this may be completely realized by few, there is no denying its attraction, though the long intervals between Mme. Viard-Louis's recitals must detract somewhat from the vague autobiographic interest which makes a chronological interpretation of Beethoven attractive. In the opening recital at Prince's Hall last Tuesday the programme comprised the three trios for piano, violin, and violoncello (Op. 1), and the three sonatas (Op. 2) dedicated to Haydn; the vocal pieces being the six "cantiques de Gellet" and "Adelaide." In the trios the pianist received the assistance of M. Hollander (violin) and M. Libotton (violoncello); these were well rendered, particularly the famous third which Haydn advised the composer not to publish. The performance of the well-known sonatas demands no special notice, and Mr. Iver McKay's singing would have been more successful if his phrasing did not suffer from his slight acquaintance with German. He would have been heard to greater advantage in the six "cantiques" if he had been accompanied by Mr. Lindsay Sloper, as in the "Adelaide," instead of by Mme. Mina Gould.

THE CRIMES OF PARIS AT THE OLYMPIC.

IF the theatrical events of the season had not crowded upon us in such a serried throng, we should have given an account ere this of the melodrama which has been running for some time past at the Olympic. It is the same piece which was introduced at the Surrey not very long ago by Messrs. Merritt and Conquest, adapted by them, with their habitual skill, from some French original which has left its obvious traces here and there upon the dialogue. The Crimes of Paris, however, in no form could have been one of the best of melodramas. It is confused in plot, and, in spite of reiterated points of "business," so intricate as to be scarcely intelligible. There has been a cruel murder in the Rue Belgique, and a person called the Demon, of whom the police have lost sight, is suspected of committing it with his left hand. Of course a left-handed Viscount attracts the attention of everybody, except the police, from the very opening of the play, and a great deal of agreeable knavery is performed by three attendant murderers, the Dummy, the Dandy, and the Plunger, who skip about upon the stage to slow music whenever the plot drags at all, which is very often. The pathetic scenes are as harrowing as usual, and the bigamy of the heroine, who marries the Demon during the lifetime of her husband, a virtuous wearer of a blouse, forms rather a new feature, and a topstone to the pile of the agony. But the piece is distinctly too long, too nerveless, and too clumsy, to be a lasting success.

The Crimes of Paris is played in the fine old country style, with a good deal of conviction. The only real actor is Mrs. Chippendale, who appears as the worthy mother of the unworthy hero, in the first two acts, and then disappears, to the great disappointment of the audience. The detective, Pepin Cardel, is played by Mr. C. W. Somerset, with an occasional suggestion of the manner of Mr. Fernandez. There was something quite refreshing in the studied ease with which this gentleman made his first appearance in the Flower Market, and told an incredible tale of a cock and of a bull and of a pious convict to a young lady who was a total stranger to him. The style, down to the false emphasis on the pronouns, was a finished example of a certain method of acting. A better Pepin Cardel would carry the play through with more success. But, if Mr. Somerset sometimes seems to imitate Mr. Fernandez, the compliment Mr. Philip Beck, who takes the Demon Viscount, pays to Mr. Willard is more flattering still. Mr. Beck has caught, not only the "get-up" of Mr. Willard in The Silver King, but the tones of the voice, the tricks of the hands, the very waxing and waning of the terrible fashionable eyeglass. But Mr. Beck is, after all, only an imitation, and one which lacks the strength and vivacity of the original.

The female parts lack interest, with the exception, as we have said, of Mrs. Chippendale. It is a pity that the heroine, Angèle (Miss Alma Murray), and her friend Lizette (Miss Laura Linden) were so much alike in face and figure and stature that the eye was sometimes puzzled, in their various changes of costume, between the one and the other. This greatly increased that cloud or mist of unintelligibility which continued to hang over the plot until near the close. La Belle Hélène, an artful minx whose desperate egotism goes near to ruin the happiness of several virtuous and prominent characters, was played by Mlle. Carrara in a very odd and emphatic style, but, at all events, so as to preclude all danger of confusion. La Belle Hélène was instantly recognizable in any disguise. The part of an English confidential clerk who has lost his wife for the time being on their wedding tour was taken by Mr. E. Hendrie, who made it very comic without descending to burlesque, and deserves more praise than most of his colleagues. The Dummy, a dumb hunchback of revolting appearance and still more revolting manners, was played by Mr. Batson, who was decidedly effective in it. It is, perhaps, not below the dignity of criticism to remark that the gates of Mabille were adorned on each side with this remarkable inscription, "Prix d'entre 2 frcs."; it mattered little, however, for there was no one to take this "prix," the characters going in and out as cheerfully as though the place had been their private garden.

There would not be much in The Crimes of Paris to attract public attention if it were not for the extraordinary merit of the closing scene. We suppose that the energies of the company are reserved during the evening to be concentrated about eleven o'clock upon this final coup. At all events, the scene called—we have not the slightest notion why—"Her own Avenger" is thoroughly worth seeing, and we recommend playgoers who are not inclined to spend the whole evening at the Olympic to drop in for this. The self-styled Viscount, the murderer of the Rue Belgique, is followed to his rooms by the woman he has forced into a bigamous marriage. She has found out his crimes, and she threatens to denounce him. He leaps upon her, and is about to strangle her, when her first husband, Jules Martel, enters. He frees Angèle, puts her outside the door, and then the two men face one another. The Demon has his back to the audience, and we see him open a clasp-knife behind his back, and suddenly dart upon his enemy. But Jules Martel has a knife too, and now begins a really splendid fight, carried on with incredible fire and fury, and manifestly studied with the greatest care. We have rarely witnessed a duel more excellently managed, more terrible in its vraisemblance. The two men seem exactly matched. In their crafty and sudden movements the eye detects no trace of unreality, and neither actor seems to help the other in the smallest degree. Presently they drop their knives, and something of illusion is lost in the very tame way in which Martel falls beneath the mere threat of a chair. But the fight is only half over; the detective enters, and, with the handcuffs in his teeth, leaps on the Demon, and a fresh scuffle begins, even more exciting and more full of ruse than the former. The way in which the Demon crawls across the floor to regain his knife is extremely pretty and "to-the-heartish," as Leigh Hunt would say. We have no hesitation in saying that the whole of this fighting scene is most effectively contrived, and if the management choose to call it "Her own Avenger," that is their business and not ours.

CAMARALZAMAN AT THE GAIETY.

THE interest which attaches to Mr. Burnand's Camaralzaman is not the interest which attached to Ariel. Before Ariel was exposed to that fierce light which beats upon a new burlesque drama the air was filled with signs and wonders with portents such as herald a prodigious birth. With Camaralzaman a very different course has been adopted. No masterpiece ever crept more quietly into being.

Of the Arabian story the new burlesque-drama has little or nothing but the name, the quarrel between Danasch and Maimouné, and the winning of Badoura by Camaralzaman. In the Arabian author, Camaralzaman conquers Badoura by means of his foster brother, Marzavan—one of those invaluable foster brothers who are wizards as well; he marries his love; he is parted from her; he has, and she has, surprising adventures; he takes to himself, with her full concurrence, a second wife; he departs from our ken the parent of a couple of noble boys, and the hero of a most romantic story. All this, Mr. Burnand, with the audacity of true genius, has changed. To him, writing for a peculiar company, and obliged to work up to the exigencies of a peculiar audience, the Arabian author's situations and effects have seemed valueless. For him, the hero of the story is not Camaralzaman, though Camaralzaman is played by Miss Farren, but Danasch the Djin, who is played by Mr. Edward Terry. In his version Danasch appears to be in love with Maimouné, Maimouné to be in love with Camaralzaman, Badoura to be spirited away by Maimouné; and, by the operation of a magic beverage, it is almost certain that Maimouné at the last moment is made to become enamoured of Danasch. To an author capable of invention of this sort (there is a good deal of it in Camaralzaman) a little incoherence and confusion may be pardoned, especially when it would appear that the author's intention has been not to work out a common plot, but to achieve a piece of pure literature. It is at the dialogue rather than the plot of Camaralzaman that the author seems to have laboured most lovingly. He takes his rouse, like a primæval hero, amid the wreck of English and the crush of words.

True it is that he is not always himself. The fact that his hero is a Djin, that a considerable number of words in the dictionary begin with "gen," and that "gen" and "djin" are to the punster convertible terms, has led him many times astray—so many that we have not dared to count them; the fact that in "peri" you have a couple of syllables which have to do a certain amount of duty in the English language has likewise seduced him into excesses which are reprehensible. But even Homer nods. It is better to leave these extravagances on one side, and to take our author at his brightest and most careful. Here is a specimen of his ingenuity:—

DANASCH. Oh, my princess will win—that I foretell.
MAIMOUNÉ. Where is she?
DANASCH. Coming! Coming!
MAIMOUNÉ. Sure. Bar sell?
DANASCH. Bar-sell, bar door, Bar-doura will—MAIMOUNÉ. Don't boast.
DANASCH. Force it—and here she comes by Bar-cels post.

Whereupon the Princess enters! On the next page Maimouné remarks, "I'll set my masher going by *mash*inery"; while some pages further on there occurs the following flow of soul:—

CAMARALZAMAN. See here, this golden ring—it's the Princess's.
SHALA. Is it? Then it is silver-gilt. 'Twas dropped
Some time ago.
CAMARALZAMAN. For an a-Claudian swopped.

After this, the Emperor of China's barber's remark that his master is "better after shaving, so to speak, During the lather portion of the week" sounds almost unliterary; but the facetiousness of the lines—

Daughter of Wan Lung-yi
Descended from Khan Sing and Bad Li Sung,
Emperors of China, in the line of Hung,
The race of Ham and Dynasty of Tung—

is obvious to the meanest capacity. Not quite so obvious, though quite as admirable, are the author's excursions into French:—"Turn me into stone! Oh, que vous êtes ai-marble." For the rest it remains to say that Miss Farren, who is rather more Miss Farren than ever, sings a song, "I don't know so much about that," with much cleverness and point; that Mr. Elton dances very well; that Mr. Terry is more amusing than usual; that Miss Gilchrist is not quite so inanimate as she was in Ariel; that the Gaiety chorus has often looked better and been more becomingly undressed; and that the absence of Miss Kate Vaughan is dreadfully apparent.

THE GREAT FAILURE IN THE CITY.

THE failure of Messrs. P. W. Thomas, Sons, & Co. has given a shock to the City greater than has been experienced for many years past. The firm had been in existence for more than a century. It was of the highest standing in the Stock Exchange, had formed in many directions a valuable connexion, and was doing a very profitable business. Successive generations of partners, in short, had built up for it a solid success by industry, capacity, and honourable dealing, and the high credit they had acquired passed to their successor. It would have seemed a few weeks ago to most City people utterly incredible that a man so circumstanced, inheriting a large income and a fine position, should, without apparent motive, out of a mere passion for gambling, ruin himself, his partner, and every friend that trusted him, inflict heavy losses on his clients, and perpetrate crimes of the vulgarest and basest kind. Yet, if the charges now made against him by his creditors be substantiated, Mr. Blakeway has for years been engaged in most reckless speculation, has lost thereby enormous sums, and to keep himself afloat for a brief period has misappropriated securities left with him on deposit by friends, relatives, and clients, while he abused the confidence reposed in him by bankers to cheat, if not to commit forgery. And the shock given to the City by a discovery of this nature is increased by the fact that outside of the Stock Exchange, and even inside with few exceptions, nobody had the slightest suspicion of the kind of life he was leading. To the very last his credit remained intact. Nor was this all. He had a partner, who had at all times access to the books of the firm, and whose duty it was to make himself acquainted with what was going on; yet Mr. Thomas affirms that he was entirely ignorant of the sort of transactions in which the firm was engaged. Furthermore, it is clear that much of what Mr. Blakeway is accused of could not have been done without tampering with the books. Accordingly the accounts are in hopeless confusion. Yet the clerks were either kept in ignorance of what was going on, or conspired to screen their guilty employer. Lastly, it is evident that Mr. Blakeway could not have lost the enormous sums gambled away without the fact being known to several members of the Stock Exchange. Yet no intimation was given by them to the banks and money-lenders who have lost so heavily by his misconduct. It is impossible to explain fully how all this could have occurred until the matter is investigated in a court of law, and the exact nature of every transaction is clearly proved. In the meanwhile, however, it is not difficult to show that the conditions under which bankers and stockbrokers transact business afford exceptional facilities for fraud to dishonest stockbrokers to whom favourable circumstances have conspired to give a high character.

A stockbroker is an agent for the public for buying or selling Stock Exchange securities. Strictly speaking, he ought not to speculate on his own account. If he were to do so his interest might run counter to that of his clients, and he might be tempted, therefore, to advise them to sell at a time when to do so would be to throw away their property, or he might induce them to buy at too high a price. But the most prudent broker can hardly avoid speculating for others. The greater part of the business now done upon the Stock Exchange is speculative, and if a broker were rigorously to refuse to engage in speculation, he would certainly make but a very small income, and might probably lose all his clients. Practically, therefore, all brokers speculate more or less for their clients. And the speculation is carried on in two ways—one is for the client to lodge with his broker a certain proportion of the price, say 20 per cent., and to instruct him to borrow the remainder from a banker, undertaking always to keep up this percentage of the price, or "margin," as it is called. If he fails to do so, the banker has a right to sell the stock pledged with him. And so he has likewise if the borrower does not pay back when called upon to do so. In this case, it will be seen, the broker is tolerably secure. The second way is much more risky. Every fortnight there is a settlement upon the Stock Exchange of all the bargains entered into between one settling day and another. Buyers, that is, stipulate that they will then pay for the purchases made in the interval, and vendors stipulate that they will deliver the stock sold. But in speculative transactions the purchaser and seller are rarely prepared promptly to fulfil their bargain. The speculator usually therefore instructs his broker to "carry over the account" to the next settling day, paying interest for the accommodation. If the price of the stock has risen after purchase, the buyer is entitled to the "difference" between the price at which he bought and that quoted for the stock on the first day of settlement. If, on the contrary, the price has fallen, he is bound to pay the difference. If the broker is cautious to do business only for solvent people, his clients send him the "differences" payable in due time, and he has no difficulty on the settling day. But, if he is at all rash, the clients may fail to pay their "differences," and then, according to the rules of the Stock Exchange, he has to make good the deficiency. In this way, it will be seen, a broker may be ruined by the default of his clients just as completely as by his own. In theory, as already stated, the broker is supposed not to speculate on his own account. But, as in many other cases, theory and practice do not accord. Still even when the broker is really acting for clients, the jobber from whom he buys or to whom he sells looks, not to the client, but to the broker, for the fulfilment of the contract. Now, if a broker begins to increase very largely his speculative account, it is evident that the fact cannot escape the jobbers, and that they will soon become apprehensive. He may, of course, be acting for wealthy people, and his business therefore may be perfectly safe. But, on the other hand, he may be recklessly executing the orders of gamblers without a penny in their pockets. Or he may even be wildly speculating on his own account. In such a case, therefore, it is usual for the jobbers, after a few settlements have passed, to compare notes with one another, to find out whether the broker in question is speculating in various kinds of stocks. If he is, they decide to charge him for "carrying over" more than they charge others. If the business he is conducting is a safe one, and he stands in good credit, the broker refuses to submit. Either he "closes the account"—that is, sells what he has bought, or delivers what he has sold—or he goes to his banker and obtains a loan from him. But if he submits to pay the higher rate, the jobbers conclude that their suspicions are justified, and soon afterwards they again increase their charges for the purpose of compelling him to close the account, which they now see to be a risky one. Mr. Blakeway's first offence was reckless speculation on his own behalf; and from the above explanation it is quite clear that the jobbers must have known that, for whomsoever undertaken, the transactions in which he was engaged must prove ruinous. It is said, for example, that at a single settlement he had to pay "differences" amounting to 200,000*l*. As a matter of fact, it is understood that several of them gave hints to friendly brokers employed by banks to lend money on the Stock Exchange, not to be too ready to give him credit. How completely the suspicions of the jobbers were aroused, indeed, appears firstly from the small proportion of his total losses that have fallen on the Stock Exchange, and secondly from the crimes he is accused of having had recourse to.

It is said that the widow of the late senior partner of the firm had left securities in the custody of the firm to the enormous sum of 200,000*l*., and that Mr. Blakeway sold these securities without the knowledge of the widow, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use. He is also accused of having sold the securities of clients who had entrusted them to his charge for safe keeping—a custom very much followed by clients who do not care for the trouble of collecting dividends and coupons themselves, and who either live away from London or do not keep a banker. Lastly, it is known that he has defrauded several banks to very large amounts. When brokers borrow large sums from a bank, the securities they give the bank must usually be of various kinds. These securities are locked up in a box, and kept in the vaults of the bank. But the broker may require access to this box for various legitimate purposes. He may wish, for example, to sell some of the securities, substituting others equally good for them; or he may be called upon to give further security because of a fall of prices; or, lastly, he may want to ascertain the number of a bond. Therefore it is indispensable for the easy conduct of business that the broker should be allowed access to his securities. Where he is trusted implicitly by the banker, it would seem that too often he is allowed to go to the box when and as he pleases. For instance, it is alleged that Mr. Blakeway took away some of the securities pledged with banks, leaving in their place paper that looked like the securities, but in reality was absolutely worthless. He is furthermore accused of pledging the same security twice over to different banks. It is said that he has taken a certificate representing shares in a Company, and pledged it with a bank, and then has represented to the Company that the certificate has been lost, has got a second certificate for the same shares, and has used the second certificate to obtain further advances. To be quite safe, a bank of course ought to have the shares upon which it lends registered in its own name. A solicitor, were he to lend upon shares, would be careful to do so. But there are many reasons why a bank should be less rigid in enforcing its legal rights. In the first place, it wishes to attract customers by making itself as accommodating as possible; and in the second place the banker, like the broker, is a man of business, and knows business cannot be carried on if great facilities are not given. The owner of the shares may be a merchant, and may fear that his credit would suffer if it became known that he had to sell his property. Or he may wish to vote at a coming meeting, and could not do so if the shares were taken out of his name. It is very usual, therefore, for bankers to lend upon registered stocks without having those stocks registered in their own names. And Mr. Blakeway is charged with taking advantage of this laxity of bankers to obtain duplicate certificates and pledge them elsewhere. Lastly, he is accused of having given cheques, which he knew would not be honoured, and obtaining stocks that he had pledged with persons who still had confidence in him.

It will be asked, Is there no way of preventing the repetition of such frauds? We are afraid that the answer must be in the negative. If a wealthy man of high character chooses to abuse the trust that is reposed in him, we fear that to the end of time he will be able to swindle. At the same time it is clear much might be done to make such frauds less easy than they are at present. A banker, for example, ought not to allow any customer, however trustworthy he may seem to be, to have such control of the securities he has mortgaged to the bank, as Mr. Blakeway seems to have been permitted. Every bank too, should, not once or twice a year only, but frequently, examine the securities lodged with it, and see that every paper is what it purports to be, and that all the securities are actually in its custody. If this had been done, it seems clear some acts of which Mr. Blakeway is accused could not have been committed. Again, it is obvious that, if bankers took a little trouble, they could render it impossible to obtain duplicate certificates. When a banker lends money upon registered stock, he should inquire whether the borrower really holds the stock, and whether it is registered in his name. Such inquiry would at once prevent the issue of a duplicate certificate on the application of the borrower. And, lastly, it is manifest that, if bankers had inquired as to the mode in which Mr. Blakeway was carrying on his business, they must have heard something that would have aroused their suspicions before last week. As we have stated above, several jobbers had had their suspicions aroused, had charged Mr. Blakeway exorbitant rates to compel him to lessen the speculative account open with them, and even had given a warning to some of their friends. It was, of course, no part of their business to go about the City giving notice of the dangerous operations in which the firm was engaged. That would have exposed them to an action for libel. But it is also certain that, if inquiry had been made of them by a banker, he would have learned enough to put him on his guard. The banks, therefore, cannot be acquitted of much negligence in this matter. In the same way, it seems clear that the Stock Exchange Committee might adopt measures which would throw obstacles in the way of fraud in the future. For the convenience of settling transactions, the Stock Exchange has already established a Clearing House; but the accounts of brokers and jobbers are not passed through the Clearing House until the settlement. The result is that brokers, jobbers, and the officials of the Clearing House are all overworked during the three days a settlement lasts; as, indeed, are the banks. The business of settling is, therefore, hurried through in a haphazard manner. If the Clearing House were to insist in future that every evening a return should be made of all the transactions entered into during the day, and if it were to check those transactions and see they were regular, laxity would be put an end to, and a wholesome restraint would be imposed upon the reckless members of the Stock Exchange. And this further advantage would follow, that when jobbers got alarmed at the speculations in which any broker was engaged, they would be able under such a system to call the attention of the Stock Exchange authorities to the matter. There would be at the Clearing House ready means of ascertaining whether the charge was well or ill founded, and then the Stock Exchange authorities could call upon the broker in question to give some account of the kind of business in which he was engaged. This, no doubt, would be inquisitorial; but the inquisition would hardly be set on foot except where it was desirable a restraint should be put upon reckless gambling; and in that case we apprehend that no respectable member of the Stock Exchange would be sorry to see any investigation, however annoying, set on foot.

REVIEWS.

THE VICISSITUDES OF FAMILIES.*

WE can hardly err in thinking that when the author planned this work he contemplated only those historic or ancient families that for some cause or other had gone down in the world. In the preface he says distinctly that his topic is the greatness that has gone by. And in his opening chapters he talks about the vicissitudes of great families, dry and dusty materials, and ancient chronicles. But he has sketched some individuals of no family at all, who, to repeat a saying of the Emperor Tiberius, were ex se nati, and whom the satirist of the same generation as the historian to whom we are indebted for the above mot, describes as

> Quales ex humili magna ad fastigia rerum
> Extollit, quoties voluit Fortuna jocari.

The work gains in interest and variety by this extension, but it is not easy to see at first what connexion old Jemmy Wood the miser of Gloucester, and Ward the Prime Minister and trusted servant of the Duke of Parma, have with the aristocracy. The plan of the work might have been improved. The table of contents is very poor. There is not much of an index. We look in vain for historical, social, or national sequence. Jack Mytton comes after the Princess of Connemara, and De Vere, "the noblest subject," &c., after the O'Neills. It would surely have been simpler to divide the chapters into nationalities, or to have dealt with the most celebrated houses. However, the reader may dip into any part of the two volumes without losing in order the thread of discourse, and may follow the plan of some inveterate novel-reader who always begins with the third volume, then takes up the first, and ends with the second. There are other traces of carelessness and haste. In the account of the claim to the Breadalbane peerage we expected to catch the main point of the lawsuit, which was decided some eighteen years ago, or in 1867, by the House of Lords. If we remember right, the contest lay between Campbell of Glenfalloch descended from the second son of a former earl, and Campbell of Boreland descended from the sixth son, and the latter must have succeeded had not Glenfalloch proved a marriage which took place about a century ago. There could not be the smallest impropriety in alluding to facts which had been searchingly investigated in at least two courts of law. At p. 163, vol. ii., we hear of a cousin of Lord Berners, "the hero of Delhi, the present Major-General Sir Archdale Wilson, Bart., and G.C.B." The soldier who, with the aid of Lawrence and some others recaptured Delhi, died in 1874, and was succeeded by his nephew Sir Roland Wilson, as Sir Bernard's other works might have reminded him. The present Baronet, we learn, was an Etonian, Fellow of King's, and Senior Classic. Another omission occurs in the Mar peerage, though perhaps Sir Bernard may think that the public is already cognizant of this unfortunate dispute. What is tolerably certain is that the well-known judgment of Lord Cairns in the House of Lords, whatever else it decided, did not really decide what had become of the old earldom of Mar, and the descent from Celtic rulers termed Maormers, and Mortacus who lived in the time of Malcolm Canmore. We could have wished that the age of the celebrated Countess of Desmond had been more critically discussed. The common story is that she was born in 1464 and died in 1604; that she danced with Richard III. some two years before the battle of Bosworth; and that she died, according to Moore's lines, by falling from a nut or a cherry tree—for the point is still in dispute—at the age of one hundred and forty. A little scepticism is excusable on this head. In the account of Mr. Mackenzie, of Kintail, we might have been informed that the recent purchaser of the Kintail estate is a gentleman of the same name as the chief of Scott's Lament, well known to Anglo-Indians as an enterprising, clear-headed, and successful merchant. On the other hand, it is amusing to find that the ex-Empress of the French arrived at Ryde in Sir John Burgoyne's yacht in 1870, at 2.45 in the day, and not, as the newspapers wickedly and shamefully would have it, at 3.55. And when Sir Bernard tells us of the Fitzgerald chief of the house of Desmond, who was carried away from the battle-field "in his proper place on the necks of the Butlers," his enemies, we wonder it did not occur to him that this excellent specimen of Irish readiness and humour had been admirably illustrated by the brush of Macliss. It would be refreshing, in these days of successful ruffianism, to remember that Irishmen could once display humour without ferocity.

It is scarcely necessary to add that Sir Bernard Burke is not one of those who think the House of Lords an anachronism, and who is anxious that its members should "clear out of the way." He has tears—literary if not literal—for the total disappearance of famous houses or for representatives of tried statesmanship and worth, whom he discovers in cobblers, toll-bar collectors, sextons, or inmates of the workhouse. But we cannot say that his scheme for continuing the union between titles and land or property and position strikes us as very feasible. He suggests that every man who takes an hereditary honour from the sovereign should be required to create a perpetual endowment in favour of the dignity he is about to receive. It does not seem to occur to him that in a democratic age the only mode of providing for such contingencies is for no man to accept a peerage or baronetage who has not a fair estate, and for his descendants not to impoverish their inheritance by extravagant and riotous living. A title and land cannot be secured to posterity by letters patent any more than an individual can be made virtuous by Act of Parliament. Sir Bernard speaks more to the point in his observation that there is no legal tribunal to take cognizance of the claim to a disputed baronetcy. All that the law can do is to decide the succession to the real and personal estate; and as his title in most instances follows the land, society can generally make up its mind as to the real Sir John or Sir Thomas. As Zekiel Homespun remarks to Dick Dowlas in the Heir at Law, "A peer without summat be a wishy-washy sort of thing, Dick," the same may be said of a landless or portionless baronet.

As we have remarked, not the least interesting of Sir Bernard's pages are those devoted to self-made men. The history of Tom Ward, the Yorkshire groom, is an illustration of the "profound" remark of Mr. Weller, senior, that "a man who can form an ackerate judgment of a horse, can form an ackerate judgment of anything." And here, fortunately, there are no misty traditions which the sun of criticism ruthlessly dispels, no tombstones at variance with the registers of births and deaths, and no entries about one sister's age, which are subsequently shown to have reference to another, born afterwards but christened by the same name. Of early advantages Ward had none. Neither the squire of the village, nor the parson, nor even the attorney, paid for his schooling or gave him a start in life. He went to the church school at Howden in Yorkshire, became a fair scholar, and, what is more to the purpose, acquired good steady principles, to "which he steadily adhered through life." In the year 1823, after serving in the stables of Mr. Ridsdale the trainer, he was sent to Vienna with a horse, and was retained by Prince Aloys von Lichtenstein. Here he might have remained with no higher reputation than that of a light weight, a good jockey, and a man of strict probity. Fortunately the Duke of Lucca wanted to rival the English in the matter of stables and horses, and carried off Ward. He soon found that this clever under-groom, with his grey eyes, neat dress, and cleanly person, was a man on whom a Prince, beset with flatterers and intriguers, could thoroughly depend. From groom Ward became valet, and from valet confidant and keeper of the privy purse. Then the public finances fell into confusion, and by the advice of the Duchess the task of checking abuse and restoring credit was entrusted, not to Ward as the reader might anticipate, but, by her agency, to the Austrian Archduke Ferdinand, governor of Gallicia and maternal uncle to the Duchess. However, Ward's elevation was not long delayed. He was created a baron, and made Minister of Finance. Practically, it would seem, he became Prime Minister, directed important negotiations, and managed the cession of the Duchy of Lucca to the State of Tuscany. The accession of the Duke of Lucca to the Duchy of Parma, and the troubles of 1847-48, are matters of history; and Ward's share in these events and his mediation between Austria, Medina, and Tuscany, are all described in his own correspondence. Ward had managed to acquire a good knowledge of French, Italian, and German, and his letters in his own language, correct, idiomatic, and forcible, are proof, if proof were wanting, that eminent success in diplomacy and statesmanship can be attained without duplicity, evasion, or unnecessary concealment. In 1854, after the death of Charles Duke of Parma, his widow thought fit to remove Ward from his post as Minister, and to order him to leave her dominions. The last five years of Ward's life were spent near Vienna, where he took to farming, and, as far as we make out, lived in comparative independence. Sir Bernard does not tell us what became of his children, or whether any of them inherited their father's capacity and knowledge of men. But the Italians to this day talk of "Signor Tommaso."

We are glad to see that no countenance is given in this work to the story of Cromwell's low origin. The brewery Sir Bernard treats as a fiction: and whether the Cromwells could trace any connection with Thomas Cromwell Earl of Essex, or not, it is quite clear that the ancestors of the Protector were men of high repute in their own county, good fortune, and princely magnificence. The male line of the family has been extinct for the last fifty years, but Sir Bernard traces the descendants in the female line almost to our own time, though we could wish he had been a little more particular as to dates.

A search for the descendants of the Palæologi, the Greek emperors, proved ineffectual. More than forty years ago, after search had been made in vain in Italy for some one of the house, a Greek gentleman, employed in indigo cultivation in the district of Pubna in Bengal, asserted himself, with what foundation we know not, to be a descendant of that Royal family. We can confirm what Sir Bernard tells us of another instance of fallen greatness. The descendant of the Cheslyns, owners of Langley Priory, was reduced to such poverty, owing to an unsuccessful lawsuit in which his father was involved, that he was glad to wear the cast-off clothes of his aristocratic friends. "This coat," he would say, "was Rancliffe's; these pants, Granby's; this waistcoat, Scarborough's; these etceteras, Bruce-Campbell's." The writer of this article remembers meeting Dick Cheslyn long ago in a country house, where the other guests being dressed in the usual evening suit of black, the wearer of his friends' cast-off clothes appeared in trousers of a bright blue. Sir Bernard might have added that the said Dick Cheslyn was a capital cricketer, though better in defence than in hitting. We should have liked farther particulars of the mode in which the late Mr. John Shakespear acquired the means to purchase the valuable Langley and Disworth estates. It is quite correct to say that he was one of the best Hindustani or Urdu scholars of his day. His Dictionary, Grammar, and Selections, are still standard works and the delight or terror of students. But, though they commanded a large sale, they were hardly as remunerative as Mr. Trollope's novels. Most people have heard of Law and the Mississippi Scheme, but it is not every one who knows the particulars of his duel with Edward Wilson, commonly called Beau. They had a quarrel about a lady, and one of the combatants drank a pint of sack at the other's house. Then they both got into a coach, and drove from the Strand in the direction of Bloomsbury. The duel was fought with swords in the square, and the unlucky Wilson was run through the body at the first exchange of passes. Law was tried for murder and found guilty, but pardoned by the Crown; whereupon the relatives of Wilson lodged an appeal of murder under an old custom, which was not abolished till 1817-18, when it was well known as "Thornton's case." The upshot was that Law was confined for eight months in prison during the appeal; and then, by corrupting his gaoler, got away to France. As a sort of set-off to the many persons ruined by Law's wild finance, 100*l.* per cent. were paid as compensation to the Wilson family, and Law was at last allowed to revisit his native country. Eventually, all his property in France was confiscated and he ended his life at Venice. Lauriston, the General, who did such good service under Napoleon at Essling and Wagram, was descended from a younger brother of the financier, and his descendant the third marquis, is well known in Parisian circles at this day. The chapter of "Testamentary Eccentricities" is somewhat hastily put together; but these volumes are fairly pleasant reading, though they would have been much improved by a careful revision.

BORDIGHERA AND THE WESTERN RIVIERA.*

THIS book is to be regarded as a collection of pamphlets by different authors rather than as a connected work by a single hand. Its arrangement we must take leave to characterize as dreadfully untidy. M. Hamilton, a banker at Bordighera, is the titular author of the book which Mr. Dowson, as the preface informs us has translated from the original French. But this statement is not to be accepted without qualification. In the first place, the "French edition" of the book is frequently referred to as containing different matter. Next, the book before us is divided into five parts, of which I., III., and IV. are by M. Hamilton. In Part II. chapters XVI. and XVII. are by Mr. Dowson, and the rest are by M. Hamilton. Part V. (artistic features of Bordighera) is by a third hand, M. Charles Garnier. Our author or authors treat of a wonderful variety of subjects—climate, health, manners and customs, government, finance, taxation, law, history, banking, fauna, flora, and geology. Nil intentatum nostri liquere poetæ.

It is much to be able to say, as we do, that the confusion which is rife in the book does not destroy its value. The several subjects have been industriously got up, and much curious information is to be gained by the reader. One defect, however, for which we can find no forgiveness is the want of maps. The historical portion of the book, especially, is so filled with minute local and geographical allusions that the mapless student must become hopelessly lost. Should a second edition be required, this grave omission should be made good.

Many who lack patience or leisure to master M. Lenthéric's learned work on "La Provence Maritime" will gladly read M. Hamilton's sketch of the early history of the Ligurian coast-lands. The latter leans to the opinion that Hannibal's army passed into Italy in B.C. 218 over the Col di Tenda, and not over the St. Bernard. One hundred years after this event Liguria became a Roman province, and the Via Aurelia was opened. This great road left Rome at the Janiculan Gate (Porta S. Pancrazio), and struck the coast of Italy at Alsium. From this point it followed the coast through Pisæ into Liguria, within the limits of which it passed through Matuta (San Remo), Albintemelium (Ventimiglia), Tropæa Augusti (Turbia), and Cemenelium (Cimiez). The Via Aurelia seems to have had a shorter life than most Roman roads; but, no doubt, the physical changes in the coast-line and the incessant warlike operations of the middle ages are answerable for its early disappearance. It is altogether uncertain how much of the ancient track remained to facilitate the construction of the Cornice road many hundred years later. Dante, writing in 1315, alludes to the paths "tra Lerici e Turbia" as the ideals of roughness and steepness on earth. M. Hamilton holds that the Strada Romana at Bordighera follows the old line of the Via Aurelia.

The person whom the Greeks might have styled the oikarchs of Bordighera was St. Ampelio or Ampelius, a monk from Egypt, who settled in a cave at the point of the Cape of Bordighera which now bears his name. This was in the year 411 A.D. About the same time St. Honoratus founded an abbey on the Lérins islands off the coast of Cannes. He seems to have been attracted by their peaceful beauty, as St. Fridolinus was by that of the little island in the Rhine which Von Scheffel has immortalized in Der Trompeter von Säkkingen. St. Ampelio, our own particular saint, died in 428 A.D. His death was followed by a thousand years of war and confusion, during which Genoa, Ventimiglia, Nice, San Remo, and Monaco were involved, turn by turn, and on different sides. The body of the saint was removed from Cape St. Ampelio to San Remo in 1140, and thence to Genoa in 1258. It is probable that from very early days there was a fishing village on the bordigue or creek formed by Cape St. Ampelio. The sea retreated considerably in course of time, and the position of the original inlet is now ascertainable by that of the marine spoil which may be dug up some way inland. In 1470 some thirty families from Bourg St. Nicholas founded a new town, the present Bordighera, loco dicto la Burdighetta. It soon became one of the Ville Ventimiliennes, or confederation of eight towns which acknowledged the headship of Ventimiglia. The others were Camporosso, San Biagio, Soldano, Vallecrosia, Sasso, Vallebuona, and Borghetto.

The suzerain or over-lord common to Ventimiglia and the Confederacy was the Republic of Genoa. In the year 1514 the Republic sold the eight towns to the bank of San Giorgio—"a foreshadowing, perhaps," as M. Hamilton remarks (p. 124), "of what was to occur to their neighbour Monaco 400 years later." This bank, founded in 1346, the year of Cressy and Neville's Cross, soon acquired an influence and power in Liguria analogous to that of the Fuggers and Welsers in the old German Empire. Corsica and the Levantine possessions of Genoa successively passed into its hands. In 1740, four hundred years after its foundation, it concluded a disastrous loan with the Republic, but did not finally succumb until comparatively recent times. In 1562 Genoa was enabled to resume possession of the eight towns. Charles Emmanuel I. of Savoy endeavoured to annex them some sixty years later; but the title of Genoa was confirmed afresh by the treaty of San Remo in 1625. The period that ensued was fruitful in domestic troubles for the Confederacy. Ventimiglia had from the first proved somewhat of a stepmother to her eight children. She not only claimed a royalty of one-fifth on the value of all fish caught by them, but ordered that such fish should be offered in the first instance to her own citizens at a fixed price. All the industries of the subject country were heavily taxed, and in particular the sale of grain and the baking of bread was farmed out to Ventimiglian mestrali, or corn-factors. The latter occasionally failed to supply Bordighera at all, owing to the exhaustion of their stores or the difficulties of communication. Our little town seems to have taken a spirited part in the opposition which these measures provoked. Certain petitions presented to the Syndics of Ventimiglia in 1619, 1622, and 1633 show that the population of Bordighera in those years was chiefly of a seafaring character. The attacks of the Mediterranean pirates and the heavy burden of the Ventimiglian tribute (which amounted to 300 crowns) had reduced most of the inhabitants to destitution. All aid or redress was, however, refused. The eight towns accordingly appealed to the Senate of Genoa, and demanded that in matters financial and administrative there should be a complete separation between themselves and Ventimiglia. The new system was, in fact, to be one of Home Rule under the protection of Genoa and subject to the payment of a quota towards the expenses of the Capitanato and town of Ventimiglia. The prayer of the Confederates was granted in 1683, but it was not until some time afterwards that the Genoese Commissioner charged with the business effected the final settlement of the various conflicting claims.

The eight towns now started as a self-ruling Confederacy under the style of "Magnifica Communitas Locorum Octo." They had a Parliament of twenty-four members (six falling to Bordighera) and four Syndics as chiefs of the Executive. The powers and duties of all these dignitaries were minutely detailed in a Deed of Federation drawn up at Bordighera in 1686. The War of the Spanish Succession brought great suffering on Ventimiglia, but her former subjects flourished considerably until the outbreak of the French Revolution. In 1793 Ventimiglia and Western Liguria were occupied by the army of Italy, then on its march against Genoa. The resistance of the Doge's Government was terminated by the popular revolution of 1797 and the constitution of the Ligurian Republic. The eight towns displayed a diplomatic enthusiasm, and hastened to send a deputation to Genoa to join in the rejoicings over the downfall of the aristocracy. Their spokesman's address to the "Cittadini Provvisori" of the metropolis is marked by all the pedantic bombast peculiar to revolutionary utterances of the French school. But Liguria was not destined to remain a democracy. Her sans-culotte liberators became Imperialists within seven years, and she was cut up into Departments to suit the new French Empire. Ten years later another change came. In 1814 Napoleon went to Elba and left in Liguria no trace of French rule except the half-finished Cornice road. This splendid work was begun as early as 1806, but did not reach Bordighera before 1823, and was not completed until five years later. Hence M. Lenthéric's patriotism is a little too strong for the facts when he calls the road "une œuvre toute moderne et française."

The Treaty of Paris gave Liguria to Victor Emmanuel I., and the whole province remained under the Sardinian sceptre until 1860. In this year the Emperor Napoleon III. claimed the right of determining the Western boundaries of the new Italian kingdom. Savoy and the county of Nice were chosen as the price for his armed assistance at Magenta and Solferino. The history of this painful surrender, in which Cavour made a virtue of necessity, is too recent to bear repetition. It fell to Bordighera, after a brief period of uncertainty, to remain on the Italian side of the new frontier. The opening of the Cornice road, and the gradual receding of the sea, gave the population of the little town an impulse seaward which has largely determined its present position.

Mr. Dowson contributes some matter of his own on travelling in the Riviera in old days, and on the British naval operations off the coast against the French and Spaniards in 1742. Our country seems to have been represented by an undermanned and unseaworthy fleet and a loquacious and irresolute admiral. There is reason to believe that Smollett was serving in one of the ships, the Ipswich, as a surgeon. Both Ventimiglia and Bordighera sympathized with their invaders rather than with their British defenders. The Spaniards, indeed, had been suffered to accumulate large stores of grain and forage at Ventimiglia. But the crew of an armed galley sent by Admiral Matthews destroyed the entire supply without having to fire a shot.

Of the quiet charms of Bordighera M. Hamilton writes with some enthusiasm. Its famous palm-groves, indeed, yield to nothing that is to be seen in the "Petite Afrique" between Villefranche and Monaco. As yet it is a village, with none of the pseudo-Parisian pretensions of the neighbouring towns. Its rural character, if it be possible to preserve it, will always attract the class of travellers which can exist without casinos and boulevards. M. Hamilton has little faith in the fine distinctions drawn by some doctors between the climates of the various towns on the Riviera. But, on his own showing, the wind and dust, which are the two curses of this coast, are slightly worse at Bordighera than elsewhere. He remarks, with great truth, that, in spite of the tropical vegetation of the soil, the atmosphere of the Riviera is brilliant rather than warm. The mistral that sweeps away the clouds also chills the invalid who is endeavouring to admire the blue sky.

In translating this book Mr. Dowson has had a difficult and varied task, which he has executed fairly well. But the following specimens of English are fitted to administer a shock to the system:—"Men will not tolerate with impunity," p. 129; "productions of the country," p. 131; "the Ossian dialect," p. 177; "captinate," p. 137; "rif-raf," p. 106; "games at pure chance," p. 111; "batteries manned by highly-organized troops and led by an officer," &c., p. 217.

THREE NOVELS.*

THE three stories before us have at all events one thing in common. Each of them begins with a description of the weather. Of the three authors, Mrs. Marshall is the most ambitious in this kind of writing. In her first four lines we have amethyst and gold, ethereal green and tenderest sapphire, opal tints and indescribable loveliness. Mr. Buchanan may claim the second place, for if he is not so strong in words, yet he is first in originality. He gives us in a Scotch churchyard a scene of nocturnal blackness, with a tombstone here and there flashing, and the rough graves rolling like a sea. The author of The Millionaire comes last, with nothing better than rolling masses of mist, a fiery glare left by the sun, and a grey wan look upon all the landscape. These descriptions help us in each case but little towards understanding the story; but it seems to have been for some while generally admitted that as we Englishmen always open a conversation with remarks about the weather, in like manner our novels should begin. The time may come when we shall find on the first page of every first volume the weather report as published in the Times. Thus we may hope to have the hero introduced to us in some such way as the following:—"The forecast from New York announced the approach of a storm likely to develop dangerous energy north of latitude 53; the north cone had been hoisted in district No. 2; a deep depression was passing over the centre of England; the wind was backing to the north-eastward; the temperature had fallen as low as 24 degrees—no less than 12 degrees below the average as calculated by Mr. Glaisher—the dew point, as obtained by the use of a Dines's Hygrometer, was 20 degrees; when in a lonely mansion that stood in the aforesaid district No. 2, the deep voice of a man was heard imperiously calling for his shaving-water." There will be one advantage in a description such as this. It can be kept truer to nature. We shall not find—as we find in the pages of The Millionaire, the harvest-moon shedding its glorious light a few days at most after "a ghastly moon in the last quarter had been hanging in the heavens like the wreck of a world." Neither should we find in Scotland, as we find in Mr. Buchanan's story, "the outer world trembling to the first dim rays of wintry dawn" so early as five o'clock. There would be a further great advantage gained by thus strictly following the weather-reports. Two volumes would in many cases, if not in most, suffice, instead of three. We must not, however, expect our old stagers to fall into this concise and accurate style of writing. For instance, we must still allow Mr. Buchanan to tell us how "the vitreous rays of the moon began playing on the window-panes." It is well, by the way, that many of his readers do not know what vitreous means. Their ears would have been less pleased if they had been told that "the glassy rays of the moon began playing on the window-glass."

When we come to consider the merits of the three books as stories, we do not find any very good standard which will suit them all. They are, in fact, addressed to different classes of readers. In Colston's Days may be read with perfect propriety in a serious family on a Sabbath evening. The worst it can do for any one is quickly to put him to sleep. It is innocence itself. It throws, to quote the words of the preface, "round the early youth of Edward Colston—the great Bristol philanthropist—the halo of romance." It does not, by the way, do any such thing; for, though the story is not true, there is no halo and no romance. The author affects the style of the seventeenth century. Her characters say at stated intervals forsooth, methinks, an' it please you, I must e'en be, I mind me now, it irks me, prythee, I am right glad, and so on. But all these scraps give no reality to the tale. How little, indeed, she herself is capable of entering into the spirit of the times that she describes is shown by her calling Colston "a thorough Conservative." "An' it please you," we would say to her, "it irks us to have the right-worshipful Master Colston called a Conservative, for we mind us, well warrant, that whilome Conservatives forsooth there were none." With all its dulness it is a book very well suited for giving away; not the less so as it is adorned with some very pretty pictures of Bristol streets as they used to be.

A very different kind of a story is Mr. Buchanan's Annan Water. It has, he tells us, been already dramatized and represented. That we can easily believe, for the close of very many of the chapters makes us think of the speeches that are addressed to the gods of the gallery just before the curtain falls. The novel opens with a white-haired man who has been, we are told, sexton of the churchyard where the tombstones flashed "man and boy for forty years." However, we must do the author the justice to admit that this character has some good points that tell well even in a story. His devotion to his old master, the minister, is at times touching. The heroine, too, is not ill drawn; but the story is spoilt by the extravagant character of the villain and the rapid succession of grossly improbable scenes. Any one, too, who has the least regard for accuracy cannot but be annoyed by the monstrous blunders into which Mr. Buchanan falls in describing events so recent as the siege of Paris and the insurrection of the Commune. Before the siege had begun, while the German line was advancing, we have an artist's model introduced dressed in the "costume of a pétroleuse." When the public distribution of food had been going on for some while in the besieged town, we have people going in and out of Paris by the railway, just as if there had been no blockade. All this would perhaps pass muster on the stage; but surely in a novel some little regard should be paid to that history which few people besides Mr. Buchanan can have forgotten. No less ignorant is he of the laws of his own country than of the recent history of France. The villain had not only deserted his wife for another woman, but he had struck her, and left her and her child in utter destitution. If it had not been for the charity of others, both one and the other would have perished in the streets. Yet when he followed them to Scotland we are told:—"Of his power over Marjorie and the child there was no question; by the laws of both England and Scotland he could claim them both." Why cannot some one set up as a consulting lawyer for novelists? They all delight in law, and they almost all in dealing with it make the grossest blunders. But Mr. Buchanan, no doubt, is acquainted with the tastes of his readers, and is well aware that a succession of startling conclusions to his chapters covers a multitude of errors even worse than those into which he falls. The book certainly begins pretty well, with tombstones flashing, two wild eyes looking in at a window like the eyes of a spirit, the wind springing in like a tiger at the door, a baby left on the doorstep, and a woman drowned in the Solway. But it is in the third volume that the most striking effects are produced. Thus, as the chapters close one after the other, we see the heroine bleeding and swooning on the floor, thrown with her child upon the great city where she had not even one friend, refused as a foreigner her share of bread in the public distribution, searched for in vain by friends from home, who, in spite of the siege, had entered Paris by the railway; then, in what is called a lifeless swoon, next discovered and acknowledged by her long-lost mysterious mother, and free, it seemed, at last as she read that her husband the villain had been shot by the Committee of Public Safety. Then turning to the path he had taken, we find him, after he had beaten his wife, marrying another woman. On the very evening of his marriage day he is arrested by the Commune, while his new wife takes advantage of his absence to steal all his money. The chapter closes on him in a dungeon, hiding his face in his hands, and moaning in mad despair, and on her in possession of his stolen property. When the curtain next falls he is a free man in Scotland, having escaped in a wonderful manner, while the heroine throws up her hands with a wild cry as he claims her and her child. We then see the scene close as he is grasped by the throat by the virtuous hero and dashed violently to the ground. The following chapter, which is entitled "Nemesis," ends with "a bearded human countenance gazing in upon him" through the window, while "he struggles like a drunken man, glaring back at the face." Then we see our last of him as he lies dead in his bed, with his false beard beside him. One more chapter, just five pages long, shows the heroine first a widow, then married to the virtuous hero, and then a gentle matron with a family of sons and daughters.

So far as extravagance goes, The Millionaire scarcely falls behind Annan Water, but then the extravagance is more artfully concealed. It can even boast of a certain cleverness; unfortunately this cleverness is in many places thickly overlaid with vulgarity. The author thinks to overpower his readers with a display of riches. There is nothing in which he more delights than in making his characters lose or gain vast sums of money. Everything must be done on a big scale. Even a kind of pomp is given to a tailor's bill when it is swollen to the amount of 2,000*l*. We cannot but regret that the items of this remarkable account were not given. With what relish should we have read that, say, for 100 pair of trousers the spendthrift Captain owed 300*l*. It is to the millionaire who lends his name to the story that the author gives all his strength. This great man, we read, kept by him in his safe, as a little reserve, ten millions of pounds of railway securities, besides other papers of vast value. At an hour's notice he was ready to pay twenty millions to get the control of a railway. At times he would "embark a colossal fortune in some enterprise which would have made a whole syndicate of bankers tremble in their shoes." He startles first a lawyer by handing him suddenly learns that for 80,000*l*.; and next the heroine, who finds her dressing-table a she is his granddaughter, by leaving 500*l*. stood to her credit. banker's book which showed that 20*l*. At this wonderful man dined To heighten the effect we are told, not on chop or a beefsteak. Had the at one o'clock upon a mutton-cutlet or a million mutton-chops or a million author made him daily eat excited our admiration. The lesser beefsteaks, he would have lost of this big man. There are two great characters are not unworthy London solicitors into gigantic liquidations, while the other was from the arrangement held in greater fear than any man in his profession, for no one was acquainted with so many personal and family secrets. He is so big a man that he even dines with a duke. The author is not content with not only a Cabinet Minister, but even the Premier, bringing people. He flies at a different kind of game, In local part of the book there is a good deal of smart writing. It is curious that with this smartness there should be mixed up some rubbish about the rapt and mysterious look of a gipsy, and the weird, unaccountable influence that stole over the millionaire as she examined his hand. When to this strange mixture is added the vulgar worship of money which we have already censured, the result is by no means pleasant. Smartness, vulgarity, and superstition are certainly none the pleasanter for being united. Yet the story has considerable merits. The heroine is a charming young lady, and even the old millionaire has one side of his character that is very winning. The author, we feel sure, might write a good story if he would keep to a far lower level. We call to mind the advice that many years ago was given to a youthful person just entering the University. "Keep, my lad," said a prudent old friend, "to the family tailor." In like manner, let the author keep to the people with whom he and writers like him pass their time. What has he had to do with Prime Ministers and millionaires? Whenever has he come across these famous solicitors, or the spendthrift who owes two thousand pounds for his clothes? Let him tell us of Dick, Tom, and Harry, and make his hero and heroine comfortable on a thousand a year at most, and he may yet write a very pretty story.

VAGARIES IN POLITICAL ECONOMY.*

MORE than one of the books before us notices the recent disarray among political economists, and every one, we think, refers to the portentous apparition of Mr. George and his theories among the placid dovecotes of the followers of Catallactics and the wage-fund theory and the like. We have no desire to "lightly" Mr. George, in old Scotch phrase. It is written in the history of the world that such books as his have their influence. But it is certain that a political economist who trembles in his faith because of Progress and Poverty must be a very weak-kneed political economist indeed, for the theories of that now famous pamphlet need no falling back on Millism or on Ricardoism, on the principles of Bastiat or the principles of Quesnay, in order to demolish them. The elementa artis logicæ and a slight study of human nature as interpreted by history are sufficient to grind them to powder. This, indeed, does not dispose of their practical importance; for the mass of men, who are tending more and more to be the arbiters of their own destiny, are no more guided by the elementa artis logicæ than they are acquainted with the teachings of history. But that a book so weakly in logic and in facts, however plausible it may be in rhetoric and in appeals to cupidity, should bother the devotees of what calls itself a science is certainly a curious phenomenon. It does not indicate that political economy is a delusion, but perhaps it does indicate that political economists are very often deluded.

It is one of the merits (and they exist side by side with not a few drawbacks) of Mr. Devas's original book that he recognizes this fact. He recognizes it indeed rather too forcibly. Few economists with whom we are acquainted have apparently a larger acquaintance with the literature of their subject than Mr. Devas, and this is a very good thing. But, unluckily, with Mr. Devas to know is to despise. We do not say that he is not right in his condemnation of many separate points in the creed of the luckless persons whom he successively arraigns. But when the ordinary plain man has read for some time of Buckle's "folly and impertinence"; when he hears that "even Cossa seems involved in obscurity and contradiction"; when Cairnes "verges on the absurd"; when he is confronted with Herbert Spencer's "philosophical delusions"; when Adam Smith makes "absurd assumptions"; when the learned Roscher "has specious illusions"; when Carey and Patterwitz "indulge in extreme unhistorical folly"; when the late Professor Jevons is "feeble and contradictory"; and the late Mr. Bagehot "so arbitrary as to be intolerable," he must be a very odd sort of plain man if he is propitiated. That Mr. Devas is the sole prophet of political economy may be true; but he goes a doubtful way to prove it by simply damning all the other prophets. Even if the reader agrees with more or fewer of his particular objections, he can hardly fail to be offended at the manner in which they are put. Nor is this offence mitigated if we deftly take our plain man away and substitute in his place an expert in political economy and logic, with no particular leaning to one system or to another. For such a person will pretty soon discover that Mr. Devas, so severe on other people's slips, is anything but a consistent walker himself. "Reason," he observes in a kind of demonstration intended to show the true method of political economy, "tells us that it is wrong for a man for mere pleasure to deprive himself of his senses wholly or partly." What reason? and whose? and where? and when? and why? When we lie down to sleep and court that refreshment, we deprive ourselves of our senses. Is that wrong? Oh, but Mr. Devas will say, it is not for the sake of pleasure. Who told Mr. Devas that pleasure was per se an unworthy aim? Certainly not reason. Let it be understood, of course, that we are not arguing for artificial paradises. We are only pointing out that the position that reason shows them to be bad and wrong simpliciter is unsustainable. Again, Mr. Devas, who is certainly a Roman Catholic, and apparently an Irishman, is good enough to say that "those who seriously maintain that Ireland is over-populated are scarcely within the pale of economic reasoning." Language of this kind is very easily retorted, and not worth retorting. The paragraph in which these words occur teems with paralogisms; but the very sentence just quoted from contains one the citation of which may serve. "When Ireland was most peopled," says Mr. Devas triumphantly, "it poured forth every year a stream of exports of food." It is a little wonderful that a writer on political economy should fail to see the simple connexion between these three following propositions. The more peopled Ireland was, the more over-peopled was it. The more over-peopled it was, the less had the people to spend on food. The less they had to spend on food, the more certainly did the produce of the island seek foreign markets.

Despite, however, the acrimony of his tone and the frequency of his paralogisms, Mr. Devas's book is not without value. For it is in the first place, as has been said, a really learned book, and in the second, its method, which shuns systematic making of principles and ranges as widely as possible among all sorts of economic facts, secures a very interesting and valuable collection of instances and some discussions of points of opinion which are worth attention, notwithstanding the glaring and already fully commented on defects backs of the author's tone, his parti pris against "modern thought," and his apparent determination that the one thing needful is to disagree with everybody.

The author of A System of Subjective Political Economy is one of those not un-numerous persons who remind the reader of Carlyle's good-natured description of the author of an absurd Life of Voltaire as "an inquiring honest-hearted character, not destitute of talent, some of whose statements and opinions must have begun to astonish himself several years ago." Mr. Smith, indeed, will not come in for the latter part of his description for some time to come, inasmuch as his book is quite new; but otherwise it seems to fit him. He somewhere complains, with a naïveté which is eminently characteristic and rather attractive, that "he knows he cannot express himself clearly or well," and he certainly cannot. At the outset he very properly anticipates that his readers will ask "Why subjective?" And we are sorry to say that he quite fails to give any intelligible answer. Of all the writers, and they are a long and stately list, who have entangled themselves in the mysteries of "sum-m-m-ject and om-m-m-ject," hardly any one at present occurs to us who has wound himself into such a nine-fold coil of botherment as Mr. Arthur M. Smith. His grievance is that the average political economist "disregards mind and concentrates his attention on matter"—which, if the average political economist does, he certainly is an ass. But does he? Mr. Smith fails, as far as we can see, to produce any proof of it. Mr. Smith, "with a frankness which we're sure must charm ye," as Mr. Trevelyan said when he was young and amusing, and as yet not wedded to Radical politics, tells us at the outset that objective political economy means Free-trade and subjective political economy means Protection. The hasty Free-trader quand même will probably read no more after this avowal, wherein he will be wrong, for Mr. Smith has a kind of useful gospel to say if he could only say it. His system of subjective economy is, of course, mere moonshine, as one of the first attempts which he makes at an argument, properly so called, will show. Mill, he says, is wrong in saying that doubling the productiveness of a country doubles its purchasing power. For, says Mr. Smith, "the doubling of the production will not make desire for the things produced twice as great." Now, if Mr. Smith, instead of sitting in the Cave, had gone into the Market and the Theatre, he would have found that this fancy is quite unjustified by the actual facts. The more purchasing power a man (and in the same way a nation) has the more does his appetite for purchasing grow, and supply has nearly as much effect in quickening demand as demand has in eliciting supply. The grain of truth which, if Mr. Smith had only acquired a better faculty of reasoning and stating his reasons, might have made his book of some value is that sentiment, national prejudice, and other similar things are, as a rule, somewhat overlooked by the economists of what he calls the orthodox school, or by some of them. But, though these items of the problem correct results to a considerable extent, they supply nothing like a basis for a new system exclusively founded on them.

Mr. Fawcett is probably regarded by the innovators in political economy, of whom Mr. Devas and Mr. Smith are in different ways representatives, as a fossil person whose utterances are not worthy of attention. That, fortunately, is not the general opinion of Englishmen, and the sixth edition of his well-known manual may be taken as indicating that there is a public for sober discussion of the subject. It is needless to say that we do not endorse everything that Mr. Fawcett says. It is still more needless to say that even his general conception of the science or the art or the collection of reasoned instances (whichever term may be preferred), called political economy, is a fair matter for discussion and debate. But as we have now, and before now, endeavoured to make clear, it is not the general conception which any man forms of this most perplexing and hazardous division of human thought, but the attitude of mind which he displays towards each particular problem, which is of the main importance. Professor Fawcett's attitude is always sane and moderate. The chief addition to the present edition, the chapter on Land Nationalization theories, which has been already separately published, displays these qualities eminently. Some readers may think that it deals with the Nationalizers too tenderly, that it treats them too much as reasonable antagonists, and not enough as crazy fanatics whose doctrine has these two fatal faults—that it is almost impossible to see how it is to be put in practice, and quite certain that, if by violence or by accident it were put in practice, it would directly and immediately fail to produce the effects claimed for it by its proposers. But the error, if it be an error, is one on the right side. On Land Nationalizers themselves and all folk of their kidney argument is indeed lost, but the battle will not be decided by Land Nationalizers any more than it will be decided by landowners. It will be decided by the great mass of the moderately intelligent, and not directly interested, public who have neither land to defend nor land to covet, and on this mass Mr. Fawcett's "plain man" reasoning is likely to have a better effect than subtle logic or high-flying heroics.

Very few words are necessary to recommend Mr. Walker's excellent little book on "Land and Rent," which, as may be expected, deals mainly, though not wholly, with Mr. George and his theories. We have had occasion before now to differ with Mr. Walker on some points. But he is perhaps the ablest living American economist, and his work here is very valuable because he certainly cannot be suspected of "feudal" leanings.

CAMPING AMONG CANNIBALS.*

PHÆACIA is not wholly a fable, and the Lotus-eaters have not perished out of the Lotus-land. There are countries where even Mr. Ruskin would find nothing to grumble and swear at in the weather; pleasant countries where the sun is always shining, the sea is always warm, and the happy people do nothing but bathe, smoke cigarettes, and crown each other with flowers. Rumours of war and defeat come never there, no one knows that politics exist, and the only serpent in the Paradise is the Missionary.

Mr. Alfred St. Johnston, who has visited this modern land of the Phæacians in the proper spirit of simple enjoyment, gives his book an unlucky name—Camping among Cannibals. Of cannibals he saw very little, though a temporary companion of his in a walk across the centre of Fiji seems to have been made into lalouka, and devoured in the fearless old fashion. But Mr. St. Johnston was much more at home in Tonga and Samoa, among the fair, beautiful, and peaceful races of the Summer Islands, than in Fiji among the lately converted or unconverted man-eaters. Mr. St. Johnston is not a scientific traveller. Though keenly interested in birds and plants, he does not introduce technical terminology into his charming volume. He is not much of an anthropologist either, and does not even seem to have read Mariner till after his return from the simple people who used to worship stray white "beach-combers" as gods. Yet no man could travel through Polynesia in a better or kindlier spirit than Mr. St. Johnston. He had no Aryan prejudices about him. In Tonga he did as the Tongans do. Nothing can be more pleasant than his account of how he made friends on the sunny shore with the first set of natives he met; how they bathed together, picnicked together (cooking pig by a prehistoric process of baking), and how they then fell to athletic sports. To the credit of the Aryan race, Mr. St. Johnston won the high jump. He is too modest to give his "record." He remarks "how painful and horrible seems to him the behaviour of many white people in countries such as this, where the inhabitants are said to be of an inferior race. It has struck me much in India, but even more here, where we have not even that shadow of a right to it which conquest seems to give. The supercilious, patronizing, and confoundedly impertinent manners that a white man generally assumes are not only horrible to me, but incomprehensible. Do they thus expect to gain the love or respect of the people? It is just the reverse; and I believe it has been chiefly my feeling of affection and fellowship with these Polynesians that has taken me so well all through the islands." The truth is that Mr. St. Johnston went through the islands in the spirit partly of a poet (though he never drops into poetry), partly of the boy in the story who asked the priggish dog and industrial bee to come and play with him. The Tongans and the other café-au-lait-coloured people were delighted to come and play with Mr. St. Johnston. They all enjoy "day-long blessed idleness." But the ordinary visitors to the isles are not poets or sentimental travellers, but Philistines and men of business. They swagger about progress, and try to impress all the good, jolly islanders into the race for wealth, into the struggle of competing enterprise. The islanders have all they need, and all that any man really needs, without labouring at all. They naturally object to digging and toiling that the white man may "make a pile" to spend in 'Frisco or Paris, and so the white man reviles them as a lazy, loafing lot of something niggers. Their ideal is the old Greek ideal. His ideal is that of Birmingham or Manchester. If, by some impossible accident, ancient Athens had maintained its ancient life, and had only been discovered thirty years ago, by this time we should have destroyed half the population with measles, and the rest would be drinking themselves to death in gin-palaces, slaving in the mines at Laurium, and wearing clothes made by cheap London tailors.

Fortunately for the lotus-eaters of the Pacific, Tonga is a good distance out of the way of merchants and missionaries. Yet even Tonga is being "improved," as the Riviera is improved, with hideous modern buildings. Mr. St. Johnston went to the islands from New Zealand in a very small trading schooner. In the office at the docks he met "a fat, methodistical-looking person, with a huge double chin and unctuous countenance." This person turned out to be the Minister of the present King of Tonga. By him, and such as he, "pretentious wooden erections, presumably of the reverend gentleman's own design," have been erected, with "a hideous palace for the King, awful Government buildings, and a great gaol, which the ordinances and restrictions invented and framed by the reverend gentleman manage generally to keep full, and last, but certainly not least, the large and handsome home of the poor self-sacrificing missionary himself." That these lovely buildings may be the better appreciated, the man has cut down a shady avenue of ancient trees which would have concealed his "white staring sheds." But all this vandalism is as nothing compared to the puritanic criminal code enacted by the "erstwhile missionary," for, according to Mr. St. Johnston, this holy man is no longer an official representative of his sect, whatever that may be. He has tried, by a system of fines, to stop the lotus-eaters from lotus-eating, to hinder the women from smoking the tiny native cigarette. The wrestling matches and the beautiful dances have also been repressed. "The consul tells me that vice has enormously increased under this system of repression, as it always will when a nation's customs are tyrannously prohibited and repressed." Again, "one frequently sees the best looking of both sexes in bulianga, as prison is called, and it is their mutual admiration of beauty that brings them there." Why even in the Scotland of last century Robert Burns did not pass all his time in prison, as so energetic an admirer of beauty would certainly do in modern Tonga. Mr. St. Johnston points out that the old creed of Tonga, as described by Mariner, was "surely a good enough creed," inculcating "honour, justice, patriotism, friendship, meekness, modesty, fidelity of married women, parental and filial love," and many other Christian qualities. "It will be said that we teach them the beauty of self-denial and unselfishness. Why, no Tongan, however hungry or small his meat, would think of refusing to share it with another; and unselfishness was so general that it could not be thought a virtue." When Mariner lived with them it was a saying "As selfish as a Papalagi," which was not very complimentary to Mariner.

Thus even the modern Phæacia is being corrupted. But much remains, and Mr. St. Johnston's descriptions of these "summer isles of Eden" are extremely tantalizing to the dweller in dismal London. Mr. St. Johnston never acquired the art of walking up a cocoa-nut tree in the manner common in all the Pacific Islands; but he swarmed up a stem in boyish fashion, and he reports very favourably of the milk in the cocoa-nut. He drank kava, too, and says it is by no means bad, and not nearly so intoxicating as Miss Bird imagines. Miss Bird "raves against it in very impassioned language"; but the kava-drinkers whose society she frequented must have had weaker heads than Mr. St. Johnston's friends. "The brightness of face and intellect was always the same among the natives after the drinking as before, and I myself never felt any 'faculties numbed'" Miss Bird's repartee, if she chooses to make it, is obvious; but Mr. St. Johnston acknowledges the general brilliancy and accuracy of her account of the Pacific. Being a fair-haired man himself, he found himself the glass of fashion in Tonga, where the natives have dark hair and dye it yellow. Whence came this passion for fair hair in the dark races? It is difficult to write any connected account of experiences which were naturally disconnected themselves. Mr. St. Johnston had the great joy of seeing a fire lit with implements exactly like the old Indian pramantha, or fire-drill:—

> Two pieces of wood are selected, one a long piece, rather soft and dry, which is flattened at the top and a slight groove cut in it; the other is a short hard piece, pointed at one end. The larger piece is steadied by a second man, or by the operator sitting on one end of it himself, and the smaller piece is held by both hands, the wood resting between the thumbs and forefingers, the other fingers on the top of it, so that great pressure can be put on to it, and nearly all the weight of the body. Kauhiva was the operator; taking the pointed piece in his hands, he slowly began to rub it up and down the groove cut in the larger one. This motion scrapes away a fine powder from the sides and bottom of the groove which lies at the end of it, and the speed of the rubbing gradually increases till it is very quick indeed, when you see a little smoke arise from the under, and at last a tiny spark which smoulders slowly in the little heap of wood powder formed by the friction. The rubbing then ceases, and, blowing gently, they manage to set fire to a small piece of fine dry gnatoo tor from their vala or their turban. They managed very quickly to get a light, and soon the wood in the oven was blazing.

He found that the native chiefs are still "Zeus-sprung kings," as in Homer, and descended from the gods. He learned that a certain native medicine will cause toothache to vanish away and never return again. "There is money in this," but that idea does not appear to have occurred to Mr. St. Johnston, a most uncommercial traveller. Already a patent medicine called Tonga exists, but that does not appear to be the same article. Uncommercial as he is, Mr. St. Johnston connived at smuggling by the simple process of drawing the native revenue officer's portrait while the contraband goods were being stored. Of the labour question and its present solution he gives the following account, which is unprejudiced either by philanthropy or planter esprit de corps:—

> There is a species of very mild slavery existing here in the Pacific; ships go to the islands to the west, New Britain, New Ireland, the New Hebrides, and the Solomans, and also to those just at the equator, the Hervey and other groups, or, as they are called here, "the Line Islands." There they engage men, it does not matter how savage, for a certain term of years at, one may be very sure, a very low rate of wages. These men are brought to the more civilised islands, where they are made to work upon the plantations of the white man. It is to the advantage of the white to serve these fellows well and keep them in good condition, to get the most work out of them that is possible in the time; now all these vessels that transport the men—labour ships they are called—are looked after by Government-appointed agents, who do all that they can to prevent kidnapping and barbarous treatment after shipping. Still kidnapping—"blackbirding" as it is called—goes on to some extent. These savages at the end of their term receive their wages in "trade," as it is technically called—that is to say, they have goods given to them to the value of the amount they were engaged for; in this, in old times, these poor fellows were generally terribly robbed, having all sorts of rubbish given to them as equivalent for the money they had earned; but this, too, has been subjected to the supervision of Government overseers. At the end of the three years for which they generally engage themselves, without knowing either what the time means or what the work is to be, they are returned to their native homes. I believe hardly any of them will engage again after their first experience, for such work as they have to do in the plantations—continuous, monotonous, and hard—is very different from even a hard day's work at home.

Another curious point mentioned by Mr. St. Johnston is the magic song which actually does call sharks into a circle:—

> They charm the sharks with a strange wild song, which they sing in chorus from their canoes, and the fish, hearing, ascends and is caught. A missionary some short time since remonstrated with them for this practising of wicked witchcraft, which he denounced as being useless, as well as savouring of the devil; whereupon his audience said that if he would go with them some time, they would convince him of the power of their charm. So out they paddled him silently, and no shark was seen, until at last they chanted all together their song, and almost at once the black fin showed.

Talking of sharks, he tells us a story of a chief whose big canoe was wrecked, and whose thirty followers made a group round him in the water, and swam the chief in the centre to land. The cry was still "Another for Hector!" and when the chief landed only four or five of his men were left alive. Mr. St. Johnston also heard of fish something like salmon which leap fifteen feet into the air. What joy to be fast in a fish that can give the salmon some ten feet in a high jump! We conclude with Mr. St. Johnston's description of the art of pot-making as practised in Fiji. In New Caledonia, where the natives used to make pots as big as that in which Ares was imprisoned, the art, we believe, is now lost:—

> The potter is always a woman, such work being far beneath the attention of the men. Taking a round stone in one hand, she forms the bottom of the jar by pressing it into a lump of moist clay, which she gradually moulds to the shape of the stone with a smooth piece of wood, and, adding clay to the edge of the growing jar, she continues to mould it in the same way with the stone inside, and smoothing with the wood upon the outside. . . . Too wise to waste much ornament on mere cooking utensils, she simply decorates them with a few lines or dots only; but upon other pieces, such as water jars and the other quaint vessels that they make, she lavishes great fancy in varying the design, and skill in application of it. No two pieces that I saw were decorated the same. There is a constant variety, although, as far as I have seen, the designs for their pottery decoration, like those for other work, are always linear and geometric, and never pictorial.

In taking leave of Camping among Cannibals we may repeat that the temper and spirit are models of what should animate a non-scientific book of travels. Mr. St. Johnston is to be congratulated on his happy tour, and on its unassuming and most interesting record.

THE ART MAGAZINES.

THE spread of an intelligent interest in art for its own sake is shown by nothing more than by the increase and success of the magazines which depend entirely upon such an interest for their circulation. Most people can remember those dark ages in which The Art Journal was the sole representative of art in English journalism and the sole pabulum prepared for our æsthetic appetites. It presented us with cut-and-dried criticism, adorned by steel engravings of popular pictures. The style of these engravings, although they often contained excellent work with the burin, was monotonous in the highest degree. The same traditional system of dot and line, the same linear convention, was used for all subjects—for heads, for landscape, for sculpture itself. The grand style of engraving introduced by Reynolds and Cousins, and even the robust work of such men as Mr. Doo and Mr. Lumb Stocks, cost too much time and labour to attract the publisher of a magazine. He was led to aim at securing work which should at once be cheap and pretty. The machine-ruler came into fashion, and superseded free-hand drawing with the burin; while common steel was called into requisition where the diamond was formerly in use. The result was not always bad; but it became, as we have said, exceedingly monotonous in the long run.

It was not, however, then conceived possible to compete with The Art Journal. Its prestige was first shaken by a rivalry from which it seemed to have little to fear. There was introduced the practice of illustrating the ordinary magazines in a new and brilliant style. Mr. Millais and Mr. Sandys recovered the habit of drawing strongly and simply on the block, with vigorous imitation of nature, thus returning to the study of Dürer and Holbein; while a little later the peculiarly English school of Lawless, Frederick Walker, Topham, and Pinwell poured into the pages of the popular weeklies and monthlies the treasures of their genius. But still the prestige of the dry steel engravings in The Art Journal remained unshaken. The new procedures were used for all manner of illustrating purposes before they were brought to the services of fine art itself. The outcry against this monotony, however, was constant; and at last, in 1869, Mr. Hamerton started The Portfolio. In 1874 there appeared, simultaneously in Paris and London, a venture on a far more ambitious scale, L'Art, a folio periodical, illustrated copiously by means of as many of the graphic arts as it was possible to bring together. The Magazine of Art followed, in a more modest shape; and three years ago The Art Journal itself, which had proudly held aloof, refusing to adapt its methods to these modern notions, was forced to give way, and began to appear under new auspices in a fresher and more varied form. At the present moment, therefore, without mentioning any other efforts than those which time has proved to be successful and durable in their results, there are four copiously-illustrated periodicals now flourishing in England, all of them exclusively devoted to the study of the fine arts.

The latest volumes of each of these magazines are now before us, and we can estimate the importance of the lively competition which is kept up between them. In the issue of the Portfolio for 1883, which first comes to our hand, we find enough to exercise the attention for hours, and the subject-matter for a complete education in the various graphic processes. It is agreeable, too, as we turn over these pages, to reflect on the truth of the good old maxim, that when things are at their worst they will mend. Twenty years ago the prospect looked dark indeed on the horizon of the graphic arts. It was supposed that photography would destroy all the finer forms of handicraft in illustration. This idea became quite a scare in the minds of some of the best critics, and there is no doubt that the danger existed. It is strange to think that, as lately as 1867, M. Philippe Burty could lift up his voice in such wailing words as these:—

Il reste acquis que le monde se désintéresse de la gravure sur métal, que l'eau-forte succède au burin, que le bois est en péril, que le "procédé" tend à supprimer le burin, l'eau-forte, la lithographie et le bois, et que l'agent provocateur de ces menées révolutionnaires, c'est, directement ou indirectement, la photographie.

We are glad to point to the plates of The Portfolio as a proof that after fifteen years the burin is not yet suppressed. The frontispiece to the volume of 1883 is a pure line-engraving by Mr. Lumb Stocks after Mr. Millais's "Souvenir of Velasquez," a little girl with her hair floating over her shoulders, seated with an apple in her hand. This picture is, we believe, in the Diploma Gallery of the Royal Academy, and it gives us a very good instance of the nature of the work demanded from a first-rate line-engraver. This picture, it will be remembered, was much critized on its appearance. Its texture was in Mr. Millais's roughest manner—vigorous, effective, but not delicate, although the nature of the subject, and the allusion in the name, would seem to demand delicacy. Mr. Stocks has produced an engraving which reproduces the qualities of the picture, minus the colour of course, but plus a delicacy which the bright scheme of colour rendered needless to the painter's design, but which the engraver felt to be demanded by the exigencies of black and white. Mr. Lumb Stocks would perhaps hesitate before admitting that he is capable of improving Mr. Millais's drawing; but it is notorious that the exact method of the engravers does give them an opportunity of doing this, an opportunity of which Mr. Cousins has never hesitated to take advantage; while Sir Joshua Reynolds remarked that "Mr. Bartolozzi sets us all right in our drawing."

But it is not usual to take a text in favour of line-engraving out of the pages of The Portfolio. Mr. Hamerton claims special credit for a catholicity of taste from the fact of his admitting Mr. Lumb Stocks among his etchers and wood-cutters. It is etching for which The Portfolio has been specially famous, and it is not without a foundation in fact that Mr. Hamerton and his publishers boast "that we ourselves are responsible in some degree for the change of fashion" from the popularity of the burin to that of the point. This is certainly the most remarkable alteration of taste which has taken place in our time. A generation ago etching was absolutely neglected. If any man was old-fashioned enough to preserve a portfolio of etchings, or interested himself in Wilkie and the little group of Scotch etchers who tried to keep the lamp burning, he was looked upon as a pure eccentric, and he hardly would venture to bring out his despised treasures to be looked at. Nowadays, etching is the department in which the art magazines achieve their boldest successes. The Magazine of Art has lately presented its readers with an original plate, expressly designed for that purpose, by Mr. Robert Macbeth, while in L'Art for 1883 we find an entire series of original etchings, the plates by M. Lucien Gautier, of scenes in Marseilles, which might be removed from the pages of the magazine to form a little collection of their own. It is, however, still to The Portfolio that we look for the more characteristic exercise of the art of etching. The series of articles on Paris are illustrated by some exquisite architectural specimens, ranging from the celebrated "Abside" of Nôtre Dame, by Méryon, to recent designs by Léon Lhermitte and Brunet-Debaines. The Méryon is itself a marvel, which would have seemed impossible to us fifteen years ago. It reproduces in every detail, with scarcely any perceptible detriment to the artistic beauty of the original, a noble etching, which now can only be obtained for many times the price of the whole magazine of which this is only one plate. This is an example of the process which takes its name from its inventor, M. Amand-Durand, in which bichromatized gelatine is spread over copper as an etching-ground, and a new plate is produced in facsimile of the old one, on any scale that may be desired. The Amand-Durand process is likely, however, to pass away with the inventor, for he is an artist as well as a mechanician, and there is much more in his reproductions than can be secured by a merely mechanical process. The Dujardin process is also exemplified in The Portfolio, particularly by some specimens of the work of Donatello. The Dujardin plates are produced by photographing the object on a bronze surface, and the eye is conscious of a bleared look, which does not detract from the artistic fidelity of the reproduction, but betrays the fact that the camera and not the hand of the reproducer has done the drawing. The lines are cleared by a skilful scientific process, of which Mr. Hamerton has given such particulars as are known in his Graphic Arts. Of the three processes now performed in Paris, and known as the Amand-Durand process, the Dujardin héliogravure and the Goupil photogravure, the details of which last are entirely a secret, the first appears to us to be the most valuable because distinctly the most individual and artistic. If the latter two could be combined and greatly reduced in expense, it is probable that they would carry before them the entire field of ordinary illustration, in which clearness and accuracy are of more importance than direct artistic beauty. For this last object the mechanical systems of process will probably never supersede the handicraftsman's labour.

The columns of our contemporary the Spectator have been opened during the last few weeks to a correspondence which many of our readers must have noted with amusement. The art-critic of that newspaper, in reviewing a posthumous translation of the Eclogues of Virgil illustrated by Samuel Palmer, was led astray by a blunder in the preface, in which a certain plate, which happened to be the mechanical reproduction of a water-colour drawing, was referred to by the number of another plate, which was a pure piece of original etching. The unfortunate little mistake might have passed if the criticism which accompanied it had not been expressed with unnecessary arrogance, and if a curious ignorance had not been displayed in charging the publishers with forging an impression around the facsimiles to make them look as though they had been printed from a plate. We cannot disguise from ourselves that this last suggestion could scarcely proceed from a writer who had any pretension to be an authority on the subjects which he presumed to criticize; but we confess that the throng of modern processes in illustration are more bewildering than those professionals who have been withering the unlucky critic of the Spectator are quite prepared to admit. For instance, there has just lately been invented a new plan by which water-colour drawings can be reproduced in colours with a fidelity that is absolutely amazing; and we have ourselves seen one of the most accomplished artists of the day poring over these new Goupil facsimiles and confessing himself baffled by their astonishing precision. Nay, more, it is said that M. Edouard Détaille, the eminent war-painter, was lately struck by seeing a water-colour drawing of his own in a shop-window day after day as he went to his studio. Sometimes it would disappear for a day or two, but it would always reappear. At last, unable to bear this irritating apparition any longer, he burst brusquely into the shop one morning, and said, "Since you can't persuade anybody to buy that drawing, I will buy it myself." "O but, sir," they replied, "it is having a very large sale." "What do you mean?" said the painter. "How can a water-colour drawing have a large sale?" "It is the Goupil facsimile of your drawing, sir"; and when he examined it closely in his hands he found that it really was the facsimile. When it is possible thus to deceive even the very elect, the errors of the poor art-critics should be more leniently dealt with. But they, at the same time, would do well to be quite sure of their ground before they charge their opponents with a fraud.

In country places and towns where original art scarcely exists, these artistic periodicals must be invaluable to people of taste. For a few shillings they can enjoy the full, or almost the full, pleasure which is given to an amateur by an exquisite artist's proof of some rare etching which he consigns to an innermost drawer of his collection. By the expenditure of a very little money, a poor man in a provincial town can, when he has finished reading his L'Art or his Magazine of Art, carefully remove the principal illustration from its cover, and have it remounted and glazed, and cheaply surrounded by an Oxford frame. He can thus enjoy the possession of a little gallery of works in black and white, which will have every merit except that of rarity, and to the periodicals which offer such a boon to the multitude we cannot deny the praise of effective usefulness. Nor can we believe that the inventions by which works of art can be multiplied are more than past their infancy. We should like to be able to indulge ourselves with a glance at the art magazines of 1904.

IRISH MANUSCRIPTS.*

THE publication of this work is one of many signs of the growing interest felt in Celtic literature proper, as distinguished from the study, for purely linguistic purposes, of the earliest remains of Irish and Welsh preserved in the so-called glosses. Since the study of the Celtic languages was placed on a firm basis by Zeuss's Grammatica Celtica just thirty years ago, great strides have been made in our knowledge of these languages through the labours of a small but remarkable band of scholars, of whom the late Professor Ebel and Mr. Whitley Stokes are the foremost. Ebel was prematurely lost to the science of philology at the very moment when he had attained a position which gave him greater leisure and increased opportunities for the pursuit of those studies in which he already ranked so high. Mr. Stokes is happily still with us, constantly adding to the already heavy debt which all Celtic students owe him.

The labours of these great scholars, and of others whose names will readily occur to all who are interested in Celtic studies, are producing their natural results in a closer and more critical study of the early legendary literature of Ireland than was possible or perhaps conceivable to the older race of native scholars. We are far from undervaluing the work of such men as the late John O'Donovan and Eugene O'Curry, whose books are still indispensable to students; it will be sufficient to point to Mr. Stokes's edition of the Calendar of Oengus the Culdee, an undertaking which would have been beyond the powers even of O'Donovan, the greatest and most scholarly of the Irish scholars of the past.

M. d'Arbois de Jubainville, the author of the volume before us, is a distinguished French archæologist, whose previously published works have won for him an honourable place among the Celtic scholars of the Continent. In the summer of 1881 he spent some ten weeks in the libraries of England and Ireland, having been charged by M. Jules Ferry, then Minister of Public Instruction in France, with a mission littéraire to examine and report upon the collections of Irish MSS. in the British Isles; the present volume is in substance the report addressed by M. d'Arbois de Jubainville to M. Ferry's successor, and it forms a useful and indeed indispensable supplement to the well-known work of O'Curry on the MS. materials of Irish history. As the title of the book shows, the author professes to deal only with the epic literature of Ireland. The bulk of it is mainly a compilation from the catalogues of the libraries visited. The titles are arranged alphabetically, and under the head of each tale is given a chronological list of the MSS. in which it occurs. Information is also furnished on points not less important—namely, as to the publication of editions, translations, or imitations. Thus, under the headings "Aided Chloinne Uisnig" ("Death of the Children of Usnech") and "Aided Conculainn" ("Death of Cuchulainn"), we find references to Macpherson's Darthula and Fingal respectively. As no catalogues have been published of Irish MSS. contained in any of the public libraries of the British Isles, with the exception of those in the Bodleian, M. d'Arbois de Jubainville has rendered a very great service to students of Irish literature. At the same time, as the author himself points out, his work is far from being exhaustive. At both the Royal Irish Academy and Trinity College, Dublin, the MSS. appear to be most incompletely catalogued; and as, owing to the short time at his disposal, he had to rely mainly on the catalogues for the information he gives, the value of his work is proportionately limited. It is, however, consoling to be told that everything of value is believed to be known.

The total number of MSS. of which the catalogues have been examined by M. d'Arbois de Jubainville is 953, of which 560, or considerably more than half, are in the library of the Royal Irish Academy, which, however, is said to contain as many more uncatalogued. The catalogue of Trinity College, Dublin, contains 63 MSS., out of a total of 140, according to O'Curry. The British Museum contains 166 MSS., the whole of which are catalogued, the greater part having been described by Eugene O'Curry more than thirty years ago.

The MS. of greatest interest to the student of Irish legendary history and mythology is the Leabhar na hUidhre, or "Book of the Dun Cow," belonging to the Royal Irish Academy. This is a collection of miscellaneous pieces transcribed about the end of the eleventh century. There are unfortunately many gaps in this noble volume; but, in spite of them, it is without a rival in the interest and value of its contents.

Trinity College possesses in the "Book of Leinster" a volume of similar character and of hardly inferior interest; the greater part of it dates from about the middle of the twelfth century. The Royal Irish Academy has published facsimiles of [illegible] volumes, and also of the Leabhar Breac, or "Speckled Book," which contains the principal text of the Calendar of [illegible] Culdee. The execution of these facsimiles has [illegible] subjected to a searching criticism by Mr. [illegible] their imperfections, they are of inestimable [illegible] scholars and to those who are unable to [illegible] libraries.

On his last page M. d'Arbois de Jubainville records with strong approval the purchase by the [illegible] portion of the Ashburnham [illegible]. While sharing his pleasure [illegible] of the Government of the Stowe [illegible] perhaps difficult to speak [illegible] of the Government. The [illegible] portion of the library has been entrusted to the keeping of the Royal Irish Academy, without apparently being strictly the pro- [illegible] body, will probably not be objected to by most [illegible]

MINOR NOTICES.

MR. CHURCH has perhaps not made the best possible choice of a title (1) for the last addition to his series of books founded on classical history or literature. It is not, properly speaking, a picture of Roman life in the days of Cicero, but a causerie about the great orator, with incidental notices of his friends and enemies. The author enters into very few details. He says nothing about the military side of Roman life, and very little about the political. It would not have been easy, and perhaps not possible, for him to have shown fully how a Roman politician could rise in the State, and how he got elected to office, but from want of a few words of explanation much of his book will be nearly unintelligible to a reader who does not bring at least some knowledge of the constitutional history of Rome to the reading of it. Mr. Church's narrative is also at times a little confused. At the close of his account of the Catiline conspiracy he breaks off his story of Cicero's life to sketch the struggle between Cæsar and Pompey, and continues it to the end. Then he comes back to the exile of Cicero, and the fight between Clodius and Milo. It will be those who know the subject best who will read Mr. Church's book with most profit. He begins with a chapter on the schooldays of a Roman boy, which is followed by another on the Roman undergraduate. These are the fullest and most interesting in the book. The public schoolboy who has been sent up to the head-master may be consoled at learning from them that the birch and its uses, even to the minutest detail, are strictly classical. There are several passages in the book on the private life of Cicero which are interesting and pleasantly written. The political side is, as we have said, less good. It is treated in a rather confused way, and much is either suppressed or left unexplained. Mr. Church does not try to make a hero out of Cicero, but he is more inclined to accept the view of Convers Middleton than that of Mommsen, for which we are far from being inclined to find fault with him. There are some of the excuses he makes for Cicero which are the best possible justification of his political enemies. When, for instance, we are told that he left Rome rather than fight Clodius, because "he hated to confess that freedom was becoming impossible in Rome, and that the strong hand of a master was wanted to give any kind of security to life and property," we cannot help reflecting that a freedom which is unable to fight for itself is not worth preserving. If Cicero had stood his ground, and beaten Clodius, he would have given the best possible proof that the strong hand of a master could be dispensed with. As a matter of fact, however, it was not from Clodius that he fled, but from the men who stood behind the demagogue. Mr. Church very properly abstains from either sneering at or trying to defend the complaints against his friends uttered by Cicero in his exile. They were not dignified, but they were very natural. He had not behaved with heroic firmness, but the Senatorial party had certainly treated him a little as Jack's friends did Jack in that matter of the voluntary hanging. The book is well illustrated by "ink-photos" of famous statues and busts. As a rule they are fairly successful, but the head of Cæsar has been poorly rendered. It gives no idea of the intellectual vigour and terrible keenness of expression of the original in the British Museum.

We are decidedly of opinion that three stout volumes is too much for the history of New Zealand (2). Gibbon himself could hardly have written so much on the subject without becoming tedious, and Mr. Rusden has decidedly failed. If he had rejected much, and compressed more, so as to confine his work to one volume, he might have produced a book which would be both readable and valuable. As it is, the task of going steadily through his three is almost too much for the patience of anybody who is not an historian engaged in original research. To him the work will doubtless be valuable. Mr. Rusden has obviously studied his subject thoroughly, and deals with it in a very fair spirit. Only those who have gone to the original sources can [illegible] whether he has also treated it with uniform accuracy. [illegible] would appear from his preface to [illegible] to undertake the work by his interest in the Maories. [illegible] he is careful throughout to defend them from the accusations brought against them by unscrupulous and greedy colonists. It is a very respectable motive, but, after all, the Maories are only one of the many weaker races which have been doomed to disappear before a superior people in the struggle for life, and the process of extermination is at no time gentle. The Maories are proudly conscious of having eaten up somebody else. Then, too, nearly two thousand pages about the weakness of this Colonial Governor and the shiftiness of that Colonial Secretary is more than enough. By far the most interesting part of Mr. Rusden's book is the introductory account of the manners and customs of the Maories. After that we get too much Blue-book and newspaper, with strictures on the same.

Mr. J. Frederick Hodgetts, "late Examiner in English to the University and District of Moscow," is plainly one of those estimable Englishmen whose patriotism only becomes warmer in a foreign land. Judging, however, from the six lectures delivered by him in what he is reluctantly compelled to call the British Museum (3), it has been heated to a perhaps excessive pitch. Mr. Hodgetts's imagination has been apparently so fired by the writings of the late Mr. J. R. Green and other prophets of the Old English, whom the unregenerate call Anglo-Saxons, that he can see little else of any value in history. It is certainly commendable in a gentleman who suffers from this queer enthusiasm that he does not write Daily Telegraphese, but beyond that we cannot say much for his lectures. Mr. Hodgetts's heart warms to the Scandinavian, but he tramples on the mere British, and vilipends the poor Romans. He denounces the wicked renegades who have introduced Latin words into English, and laments our weakness in adopting the Latin alphabet in place of the runes. Would Mr. Hodgetts be surprised to learn that his beloved runes have been plausibly supposed to be nothing but an attempt to imitate the alphabet he despises? He waxes poetical over the noble weapons buried with the ancient chiefs, in total ignorance of the tolerably well-known fact that many of the swords and spears found in graves are mere imitations supplied by the primitive undertaker. What it is just, though a little brutal, to call Mr. Hodgetts's nonsense, is at its best when he has to speak of the "Anglo-Saxon sword." In an inspired passage he asks, "But what chance could the Roman 'gladius' or even the 'ensis' have had against such a weapon as one of those in the British Museum must have been before its decay? The heavily-armed legions of Rome went down before the superior arms and superior weight of the Teutons, as the cuirassiers at Waterloo went down before the unarmoured Life Guards, who, as the great Duke observed, 'smashed them like lobsters in their shells.'" It is generally supposed that by the time the heavily-armed legions began to go down before the Teuton, they were mainly recruited among Teutonic peoples, and that the invaders had often learnt war in the service of the Empire. But there is no limit to the eccentricities of the Old English enthusiast when he goes in his doublet and hose and leaves off his wit.

Although Aunt Charlotte's Stories of American History (4) has a wonderful frontispiece, representing General Sheridan careering through space on a wondrous black horse, with various little military figures gyrating round him, the book is written in a sufficiently mild spirit. It is a species of American history reduced to nice little stories for good children. The authors cover the whole ground in a rather thin fashion, beginning with the state of the native races before the discovery by Columbus, and ending with the War of Secession. The conquest of Mexico and Peru are there, and so is Pocahontas and the traditional General Washington. The slavery question is treated in the usual goody-goody way, though without conspicuous rancour. We should like to know, however, how Miss Yonge or Dr. Weld or the publishers reconcile their insertion of a picture showing a gang of black field-hands being driven to their work in chains with decency or the slightest regard for truth.

In a very closely-printed volume the Rev. John Mackenzie gives his experience of many years' work as a missionary in South Africa (5). All books of this kind have a strong family likeness. They tell of long journeys and hardships, and remarkable conversions and equally remarkable relapses into paganism. Mr. Mackenzie's book is no exception to the rule. To the majority of educated readers they are apt to be rather tedious, and the missionaries' belief that a barbarian can suddenly be changed into a civilized being is apt to look a little silly; and to that rule Mr. Mackenzie's book is also no exception. The most interesting parts and the most valuable are those which deal with the habits and characters of the natives. The tribes of South Africa are likely to occupy so much of our attention for some time to come that any book which gives us first-hand information about them deserves a welcome. The "personal equation" of the missionary can always be calculated by the use of a little cold criticism.

Mr. Kay's work on Education and Educators (6) has certainly one merit. It is, perhaps, the most copiously annotated book which has appeared in our time. Whenever the author advances a proposition of any, even the most harmless, description, he hastens to support it by a most formidable array of authorities. All literature is ransacked from Quintilian to Celebs in Search of a Wife. Thus, when Mr. Kay points out that the word education is commonly used as if it meant school-teaching only, he supports this not very audacious assertion by quotations from Rosenkranz, Paley, John Foster, J. D. Morell, Dr. Jas. Donaldson, Dr. Curtman, and C. Schmidt, which cover the better half of a page. When, again, he says that "He who is under the dominion of his own desires and passions may in truth be a greater slave to them than ever one was to the will of another," he defends this harmless truism by citations from Dr. Whichcote, Dr. Smiles, Goethe, and Lovelace. The author's name explains how a writer on education comes to assert that "his labour shall not have been in vain" if certain things happen. For the rest, Mr. Kay's book is full of sound, though not original, general propositions, but a little barren of practical instruction.

"In Our Friend the Dog" (7), says the author, "is given not only all the information possible about every breed of dog under the sun, but the standard of points of the different breeds as recognized by judges at the present day." We quote this passage from the preface to show what it is that Dr. Stables has undertaken to do, but without pretending to decide whether he has faithfully kept his word. The subject he has chosen is great, and the chance of making mistakes is in proportion. Without venturing to decide whether Dr. Stables is uniformly accurate, we can bear witness that he does mention an immense number of dogs, and says his say about them very clearly. His rules for training these friends of man, housing them, and keeping them in health are both kind and sensible. The numerous illustrations to the volume are of very unequal merit, some of them being simply libels on the noble beast, while others are decidedly good.

Mr. Hueffer has yielded to the universal weakness of writers, and issued a second collection of his magazine articles (8). There are nine in all, including one lecture, and they deal with such various subjects as the friendship of Petrarch and Boccaccio, and "The Literary Aspects of Schopenhauer's Work," "Musical Criticism," and "Mr. Pepys, the Musician." Mr. Hueffer treats them all with an obvious desire to set his facts right, but occasionally with a slightly wooden jocularity.

We are so ill supplied with good English works of reference on art subjects that the new edition of Bryan's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers (9), which is being thoroughly revised under the editorship of Mr. R. E. Graves, of the British Museum, deserves a hearty welcome. Without pretending to criticize it, we may point out that it is being brought up to date. The publishers have had the good sense to bring it out in monthly parts, of which two have appeared, at a moderate price. It is, however, well printed on very good paper.

There are doubtless many readers who, though they are not Roman Catholics themselves, will appreciate a work which gives them information about the Roman Catholic Church with accuracy and in a convenient form. It is needless to insist that such a book should be welcome to members of the communion. Messrs. Addis and Arnold may therefore feel assured that they have supplied a want in compiling the Catholic Dictionary (10) published by Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co. They must be supposed to speak with authority, for the title-page shows that "Eduardus S. Keogh, Cong. Orat., Censor Deputatus," has put his "Nihil obstat," and "Henricus Eduardus, Card. Archiep. Westmonast." his "Imprimatur," to the editors' work. For the non-Catholic not the least important thing to know is the spirit in which the Dictionary has been compiled. It is pleasant to be able to say that it is, on the whole, fair and free from rancour. In the article on the English Catholics, for instance, the author tells the story of their sufferings with temper, and even with a general acknowledgment of the fact that Englishmen are good-natured as a rule, and only take to persecution under provocation. Some amusement is to be got out of his eagerness to prove that the revolution of 1688 showed that England practically recognized the existence of a deposing power somewhere, and ought, therefore, on all sound logical principles to have had no objection to the Pope's. To the mere heretic there seems to be a broken link or two in that chain of reasoning. It is natural, though a little malicious, to turn to the article "Inquisition." We observe that the Dictionary draws the usual fine distinction between the general and the Spanish forms of the institution, and we see with the respect due to courage that the writer, his editors, and his official censors stoutly lay down the law that the Church has a divine right to persecute wherever it is strong enough.

Mr. Mulhall, the well-known statistician, has published another Dictionary likely to be quite as useful as that of Messrs. Addis and Arnold, though in a different way. This is a Dictionary of Statistics (11), the first work of the kind "ever published in any language," according to Mr. Mulhall. It is full of facts and figures, and further illustrated by diagrams.

The small minority of ladies who are oppressed by the painful consciousness that they have nothing to do worth speaking about will read Miss Kingsbury's funereally bound little book on Work for Women (12) with melancholy sympathy. The author is moved with grief and indignation when she looks round her on the unhappy position of her sex. She sees that the tyranny of man has left sister women to the corrupting influences of idleness, and has the gloomiest ideas about the future of the world in consequence. These ideas are detailed in page after page of her little book. How such a sad state of things is to be remedied Miss Kingsbury does not tell us. If looking after their houses and acting as the judicious bottle-holder is not enough for women, what are they to do? We have a notion that there are men enough in the professions already.

To try to translate La Rochefoucauld (13) is next to attempting a poetical rendering of Heine, the unwisest thing in literature, and that is probably the reason why it has been so often tried. Every respect is no doubt due to the courage of Lieutenant-Colonel Bolton, who has attacked the difficulty once more, and, not content with that, has "Englished" Sainte-Beuve's preface to a French edition; but it has not been rewarded with success. He gives the meaning correctly enough, but contrives to miss the sinewy elegance of the original. He has apparently forgotten or never learnt that the translator of the Maxims must not only know French, but must also be a master of English.

If only good advice could make men wise in money matters Mr. Urlin's Hints on Business (14) would be a useful little book. It contains a great deal of sound sense on the subject of investments, will-making, and so forth. Fortunately for Capel Court and the Bar, mankind is largely indifferent to good advice. His Hints on Business will be neglected by everybody except the sensible people who can be trusted to look after their own money.

Most of us have heard of the curious little barbarism called "hop-picking" (15), which goes on for a few weeks of every year in some of the southern counties. It is a spectacle which is considerably more barbarous than picturesque. What it really is, and to what disgusting immorality and disorder it leads, may be learnt from the Rev. J. Y. Stratton's contribution to the "People's Library." The best account of the whole business is given in the words of the old woman who came hop-picking from the Borough:—"They treat us like beasteses, and we b have accordingly."

In a course of six lectures delivered to railway workmen, Professor Stuart propounds the weighty question What is a law of nature? (16), and gives a series of answers which may be read with profit by others than workmen.

The life of "the Philatelical Millionaire" (17), as written by Nemesis, is decidedly worth reading. Not because there is anything very wonderful in the fact that twenty thousand pounds should be made by an industrious tradesman, but because the writer expresses the grovelling admiration which not a few of us feel for anybody who has heaped up a round sum of money, in the most characteristic fashion. He bubbles over with admiration of Mr. Palmer's genius and industry. His jocularity is a thing to wonder at. A philatelist, it seems, is a person who collects stamps. Why does not somebody invent a fine name for a marine-store dealer?

Among new editions a word of praise is due to the "Jewel Poets" published by Messrs. Macniven & Wallace of Edinburgh. The volumes are small enough to go into a waistcoat-pocket, and are nicely printed on good paper. We have received selections from George Herbert (18), Henry Vaughan (19), and William Blake (20).

Messrs. Macmillan's new edition of Lord Tennyson's Works is a fuller and larger version of the "Globe" edition (21). It is better printed, but still in too small a type. That is inevitable if the volume was to contain all the poet's writings, but it is not the less trying to the eyes. The arrangement in double columns is also, to our mind, very ugly. As the text has been carefully revised, the edition will, however, probably be the standard for purposes of reference. The portrait at the beginning is excellent.

Except for the sake of the illustrations, there does not seem to be any particular reason for publishing an English translation of Mr. V. Duruy's History of Rome (22). The illustrations are numerous, and in some cases good. Some of them have no particular right in a history of ancient Rome. What is the use, for instance, of the picture of the modern Insula Tiberina in such a work? The translation seems accurate, though a little wooden.

We need only mention Messrs. Bentley's handsome new edition of the Memoirs of Mme. Campan (23).

It is a good sign that Mr. Fyffe's History of Modern Europe (24) has been sufficiently successful to call for a new edition.

The ninth edition of Mr. George Craik's Manual of English Literature (25) has been enriched by a chapter on the prose writers of the beginning of the century from the pen of Mr. Henry Craik.

The English reader who desires to know what kind of thinker was the philosopher who said passim that this is the worst of all possible worlds will be able to satisfy himself by tackling the translation executed by Messrs. Haldane and Kemp (26) for Trübner's "English and Foreign Philosophical Library."

Mr. Abbott's translation of Kant (27) has reached its third edition.

Mention must be made of the fact that new editions of the following works have appeared. Dr. Dyer's City of Rome (28) has reached a second edition.

Messrs. Macmillan publish a complete translation of the voyage of Baron Nordenskiöld in the Vega (29).

The late Captain Gill's account of his journey through China and Eastern Tibet to Burmah (30) has been "condensed" by E. C. Baber, and published, with a memoir of the author, by Colonel Yule.

The Letters and Memoirs of Charles Kingsley (31) have also been published in a condensed form.

Messrs. Bentley & Son also publish a new edition of The Out-of-Door Life of the Rev. John Russell (32).

What need is there to praise the venerable Almanach de Gotha (33), or what is the use of finding fault with it? This patriarch of Almanacs has now reached its one hundred and twenty-first year, and continues to give accounts of royal or noble persons in the usual erratic style, some being taken and others left, on no very obvious principle.

The Era Almanack for 1884 (34), which deals with a less magnificent but perhaps more amusing side of life, may be recommended to all who desire theatrical information and gossip.

Messrs. W. H. Allen & Co. have begun to publish a new periodical designed, according to the prospectus, to "advance the great and valuable interests of our Service Institutions (35), to give precise and accurate information upon all subjects, directly or indirectly connected with the army, navy, and auxiliary forces, and to afford a work of reference upon military and naval stations, barracks, &c., not elsewhere to be found."

The managers of the Orient and Pacific Steam Navigation Companies have been well inspired in publishing their handsome Illustrated Guide (36). It is full of excellent lithographed portraits of steamers, and of maps or pictures of the colonies. The text is much above the level of productions of this sort.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE ninth volume of M. Elisée Reclus's gigantic gazetteer (1) includes "Anterior" Asia, a term not so familiar in English that it is unnecessary to explain it. It is a semi-classical phrase for the countries which occupy the south-western portion of the continent east and west from the frontiers of India to the Ionian Sea, north and south from the Caucasus to the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. In other words, it embraces Afghanistan, Beloochistan, Persia, Asia Minor, Syria with Mesopotamia, and Arabia. Perhaps no volume of this vast work can have presented greater difficulties, the historical importance of the districts and their abundance in interesting places being complicated with somewhat imperfect exploration in modern times. That M. Reclus has made good work of it need hardly be said. But, in passing, we may be allowed to regret that he gives an example of the foolish pedantry of innovation too common nowadays by substituting "Cypre" for the proper French form "Chypre."

All who know, and many who have been unable to know (for it has been for some time out of print), M. Yriarte's interesting and useful Vie d'un patricien de Venise (2) will be glad to hear that the author has reissued it with an abundant illustrative commentary of engravings in and out of the text, printed in various inks, and excellent both in selection and execution. The book itself made its mark long ago, and needs no fresh criticism; but it is well to remark that the present issue is as a beautiful volume, remarkable even among the exceptionally careful and tasteful productions of its publisher. It ought to force itself on every student of the Italian Renaissance and on every visitor to Venice who has the means to buy it.

M. Léon Roches's (3) account of his Algerian adventures is such an exceedingly strange one that the modest critic might almost prefer to wait for its completion and for the opinions of specialists and persons familiar with the actual events of fifty years ago before noticing it. But that would be unjust to the reader and perhaps to the author. Suffice it to say that M. Roches claims to have spent a long time with Abd-el-Kader when he was an independent chief as secretary and favourite, to have simulated Mahometanism, though with no formal act of apostasy, to have been forcibly married to a Mussulwoman, &c. In the next volume, to which we shall certainly hope to return, we are promised a visit to Mecca. In the present there are included many letters from the Emir, whose recent death may probably have stimulated M. Roches to bring out these reminiscences.

A collector who grudges his trois-cinquante for M. Eudel's valuable annual record of the Hôtel Drouot (4) sales, now in its third year, must be a very foolish or a very penurious collector. Besides, M. Eudel ingeniously baits his hook with interesting prefaces by other hands. This year the "hand" is the eminently eminent one of M. Charles Monselet, who has a charming story of a wicked ventriloquist who played tricks with the dealers.

Two of the remarkable illustrated books of science, science popular and semi-popular, of which M. Rothschild has made a kind of specialty lie before us. L'esprit des fleurs (5), a very highly ornamented volume, has on one page certain imaginative letter-press by Mme. Raymond, surrounded by elegant encadrements, and on the other a group of flowers in chromo-lithography, as delicate as chromo-lithography can be, and a description, both technical and popular, of the plants composing it. There are over sixty of these plates, making a very beautiful volun . "The Atmospheric Phenomena" of the Norwegian Professor Mohn, translated into French, and abundantly illustrated with dia rams and engravings, is of a severer style, but by no means rp. lsively severe. Now that weather forecasts have added a new terror to life, meteorology has almost ceased to be a merely "facultative" subject, and it is here treated very well.

We very rarely look gift-horses in the mouth, and are almost always ready to accept M. Jouaust's charmingly executed reprints without question. The addition of Florian's Jeune Espagnol (6) to the "Petits Chefs-d'œuvre" might, however, lead grumblers to inquire after the definition of a masterpiece; and we rather grudge three volumes of the delicate "Bibliothèque des Dames" to Dumoustier. The elegant if rather fade gallantry of the eighteenth century is well exemplified by him; but his letters are far too long. A whole Pantheon in the Gentil-Bernard style is intolerable. But the frontispieces are charming, and the book, as a book, faultless.

Where are the bad and ungrateful men who have hinted that newer competitors are displacing M. Fortuné du Boisgobey from his proud position as chief purveyor of blood, thunder, and mystery? Let them read Margot la balafrée (7) and blush. A murder and a vitriol-bottle at the beginning, two deaths and two vitriol-bottles at the end, with suitable connecting links (including much information on the noble game of baccarat), await the student. Neither let us be taken as speaking scoffingly; for the book is good of its kind, whatever the kind may be.

A HISTORY

OF THE

INDIAN MUTINY

By T. R. E. HOLMES.

"Mr. Holmes has approved himself a writer of rare qualities; he has spared no research..... He has produced a series of most admirable portraits of the leading heroes.....On the whole, the story of the siege of Delhi has never been told with more directness and power than here. .....The book is one that will form a valuable addition to the library."
British Quarterly Review.

"His work is perhaps as good as is possible in dealing with events so close to our own time. .....He has not contented himself merely with pictures of striking events, or with accounts of military exploits, but has realized the complicated nature of the problem, and its interest as illustrating the character of our rule in India."—Contemporary Review.

"Always lucid, often powerful and picturesque.....Particularly effective is his narrative of Sir Colin Campbell's and Sir Hugh Rose's campaigns."—Spectator.

"A most readable book.....Admirably written history."—Times of India.

Morning Post.

"Of these and many other stirring deeds of that heroic time Mr. Holmes gives a most interesting, impartial, and graphic account."—Echo.

"Mr. Holmes's account of the growth of the sepoy system is singularly interesting and instructive."—Dublin Daily Express.

THE BREAD-WINNERS:

A Social Study.

PRESS NOTICES.

"'The Bread-Winners' is interesting, it is earnest, it is sincere; it is in many ways a very remarkable book, fine in its performance, and finer still in its promise."—Saturday Review.

"'The Bread-Winners' is eminently clever and readable, a worthy contribution to that American novel literature which is, at the present day, on the whole ahead of our own."
Pall Mall Gazette.

"The book is certainly clever. It has humour, observation, character, and action; likewise, it is not long."—World.

"Well worthy of the attention of all readers of modern fiction."—John Bull.

"It is elaborate in style and bold in treatment; crowded with incident and lively in movement, sensible, and occasionally epigrammatic."—Athenæum.

THROUGH ONE ADMINISTRATION.

By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT,

Author of "A Fair Barbarian," "That Lass o'Lowrie's," "Haworth's," "Louisiana," &c.

PRESS NOTICES.

"The pathetic power which Mrs. Burnett showed so fully in 'That Lass o' Lowrie's' is exhibited in many a touching scene in her new story.....The book is one of great interest and of striking ability."—Athenæum.

"Mrs. Burnett assuredly has nothing to learn from the more pretentious novelists who advertise themselves and each other so energetically in this country."—Quarterly Review.

"'Through One Administration' may unhesitatingly be pronounced one of the strongest novels of the present season."—St. James's Gazette.

"Few novels which we have read of recent years have given us so much genuine pleasure or created so real an interest as we have felt in reading 'Through One Administration.'" Pictorial World.

"A truly clever novel, the chief quality of which may be wholly expressed in that one word. .....A real triumph for Mrs. Burnett."—Court Journal.

"The story is interesting, and her heroine has very considerable charms."—Globe.

A SHORT HISTORY OF NATURAL SCIENCE,

And of the Progress of Discovery from the Time of the Greeks to the Present Time.

By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY.

The New Edition has been carefully brought up to the present state of information, especially as regards electricity and botany, in which much rapid strides are being made, and the final chapter has been in great part rewritten.

From the JOURNAL OF EDUCATION.

"We know very few men who could have written so charming and so simple a history as this; it has all the best properties of a woman's style. On the other hand, we know only a few women who could have collected and digested so much solid and so various, with so firm a grasp and so accurate a touch."

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S
NEW BOOKS.

ALARIC WATTS: a Narrative of his Life. By His Son.

Associated with the Literature and Art of the first half of the century, the "Life of Alaric Watts" will be found to contain interesting and valuable facts, reminiscences, and correspondence hitherto unpublished, of and concerning his friends among the poets and painters of that day—of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Hood, among the former; of Leslie, Constable, Etty, De la Roche, Ary Scheffer, Daveria, among the latter.

"Open the pages where we may, some anecdote, allusion, or illustration of character is sure to arrest attention."—Athenæum.

"Mr. Alaric Watts's sketch of Wordsworth is one of the best we have ever read, and will bear comparison even with Carlyle's graphic etching."—St. James's Gazette.

2 vols. crown 8vo. with Portraits, 24s.

LADY JACKSON'S "THE COURT of the TUILERIES: from the Restoration to the Flight of Louis Philippe." By the Author of "Old Paris" &c.

MADAM CAMPAN'S "PRIVATE LIFE of MARIE ANTOINETTE."

"Despite the stupendous mass of literature which exists in reference to the French Revolution and its antecedents, Mme. Campan's 'memoirs of Marie Antoinette still supply the most vivid, and, as some writers say, 'matterful' collection of statements about the Queen. Perhaps there is still no single book of anecdotic history which may be read with such advantage by the average student; there have been added to the book illustrations which increase its attraction not a little. Two portraits of the Queen are given as frontispieces to the two volumes. The first, an extraordinarily lovely one, is after Mme. Vigée Brun, the other is the better known, older, and less attractive, but still very handsome, portrait by Werthmüller."—Pall Mall Gazette.

2 vols. 21s.

MRS. LYNN LINTON'S "THE GIRL of the PERIOD"; and other Social Essays.

"The book possesses a distinct value, not only as a permanent record of a bad tidal wave which passed over society when we were all about fifteen years younger, but as an able and cheerful pulpit against most of the worst follies which will pester us and possibly our children, to the last...recorded not without a good deal of plain speaking, which may yet do something, as it must have already done, to stem the torrent."—Academy.

From the TIMES.

"Hayward's literary reputation will rest on the essays and articles, the best of which have been republished under his own careful supervision. For very many years he regularly contributed both to the 'Edinburgh' and the 'Quarterly Reviews,' although latterly his contributions were almost entirely confined to the 'Quarterly.' The 'Quarterly' articles are extraordinarily characteristic of him. Indeed, we can hardly recall any writing of the sort in which the writer's individuality is so perpetually insinuating itself."

SIXTH EDITION, crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 6s.

ALTIORA PETO.

By LAURENCE OLIPHANT,

Author of "Piccadilly," "Traits and Traditions," &c.

"Brilliant and delightful..... The book is one which everybody will greedily read and greatly admire. It is the outcome of amateur originality and intelligence ..... It contains enough to equip a score of ordinary novelists for the production of a score of crammed many novels."—Athenæum.

"May be characterized as a novel of a thousand, if only for the fact that it may be read through consecutively twice, or even thrice, with unexhausted pleasure to the reader with every fresh perusal..... It is not as a story that 'Altiora Peto' challenges warm admiration, but as a brilliant picture of life and manners."—Spectator.

"To say that the book is one of the most outlandish and brilliantly written that has seen the light of many a long day is to accord to it no greater praise than it deserves. ..... Every page sparkles with crystallized observations."—Morning Advertiser.

"The book is full of humour and drollery."—Saturday Review.

This day is published.

Waterways, Lagoons, and Decoys of East Anglia. By G. CHRISTOPHER DAVIES, Author of "The Swan and her Crew." Post 8vo. illustrated with 12 Full-page Plates, 14s.

"This charming book..... an excellent medium account of the whole district with short lists of its birds and fish and of the many curious old hands amongst and gunners who manage to gain a precarious livelihood in it. The book is well written and well illustrated ..... This book will probably attract a multitude of holiday-makers next summer to these silent waterways and picturesque lakelets of Norfolk."—Athenæum.

"It is doubtless the handsomest as well as the most interesting of all descriptions of the Broads, and will preserve the memory of a paradise for naturalists and sportsmen."—Land and Water.

"Mr. Davies gives us a succession of charming pictures of the Broads, all tinged with personal adventure; in fact, he describes them with all the living details that make up the varied 'Life on the Broads.'"—Field.

"He has produced a book which will please all lovers of singular scenery, all boating men, all naturalists, all who look on nature with a poetic eye..... The best account we have ever seen of the whole method of taking ducks in a decoy is given in this book."—Bradshaw.

This day is published.

GRANITE CRAGS. By C. F. GORDON CUMMING,

Author of "Fire Fountains," "A Lady's Cruise in a French Man-of-War," "At Home in Fiji," &c. 8vo. Illustrated with 8 Full-page Engravings, 16s.

"She gracefully does the honours of this strange world of giant waterfalls and trees, depicts with graphic pen and touch the savage grandeur of the granite precipices, with the gleaming teeth of the snowy Sierras as background of the picture, and introduces us to some of the grim humours of the digger's camp and the rare romance of station."—Scotsman.

"As fascinating as any of her former works."—Whitehall Review.

This day is published.

READINGS in RABELAIS. By WALTER BESANT. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

"The selection is made with equal care and judgement, and the result is a book that is as pleasant to read as it is edifying in perusal..... Mr Besant's aim has been to illustrate the wisdom of Rabelais."—Athenæum.

SECOND EDITION.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY by ANTHONY TROLLOPE. 2 vols. post 8vo. with Portrait, 21s.

"It is a fine manly character that comes out of the story of his life, and nobody will read it without feeling that he knows the writer, and, knowing him better, that he values him with increased regard."—Athenæum.

SECOND EDITION.

THE MILLIONAIRE. By LOUIS J. JENNINGS,

Author of "Field Paths and Green Lanes," "Rambles among the Hills," &c. New Edition, 2 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"The millionaire is the romantic figure par excellence of the nineteenth century. Mr. Dexter Fife, the American millionaire of the story before us, is a decided success. We follow his doings with unflagging interest. To the story we have little but praise to give."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Aside from the general merits of the narrative—its compactness of structure, energy of movement, distinctness of characterization, and attractiveness of style—it has some features calculated to keenly interest American readers, and excite a great deal of curiosity concerning the authorship of the book..... The story is full of astute reflections and bright sayings. The effect of this book upon its readers, who are likely to be counted by tens of thousands, will be to sensibly modify the current opinion of the American financial magnate who is here depicted."—New York Sun.

ALISON. By the Author of "Miss Molly,"

"Dollois," "Geraldine Hawthorne," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 25s. 6d.

"'Alison' is a very graceful, and—though ending happily enough to satisfy the most exacting reader—a very touching story, which will well maintain the reputation of the author of 'Miss Molly.'"—John Bull.

"The author's pure mind breathes in every line and every word she writes, and books like hers do much to elevate and enrich the reader's understanding."—Whitehall Review.

NOW READY. SECOND YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

OFFICIAL YEAR BOOK
OF
THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND
For 1884.

Demy 8vo. paper boards, 3s.; cloth boards, 4s.

The second issue of this important work is now ready. It furnishes a trustworthy account of the condition of the Church of England, and of all bodies in communion with her throughout the world.

The following Reports are new features in the Volume, namely: A Statement with regard to Parochial Work; The Cathedral System; Sisterhoods; Convalescent Homes; Endowed Schools for the Middle Classes; Diocesan Organizations of Sunday Schools.

Interesting Records are furnished in the present issue of the Church in Ireland and Scotland, compiled in each case by the direction of the Archbishops and Bishops. In addition to these, an exceedingly valuable summary of the work of the Episcopal Church in America has been furnished conjointly by the Secretaries of the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies, in compliance with a Resolution passed by both Houses at the recent Convention.

A Reference Section has been added with a view of supplying information concerning matters of practical necessity and usefulness, which could not distinctly come within the classified Records of Church work.

The Year-Book is issued under the sanction of the Archbishops of Canterbury, York, Armagh, and Dublin; of the Primus of Scotland, and of the Bishops of the English, Irish, Scottish, and American Churches; and it has also been formally sanctioned by the Lower House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, and by the Convocation of York.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY,

ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES:

FOUNDED MAINLY ON THE MATERIALS COLLECTED BY THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

EDITED BY

JAMES A. H. MURRAY, LL.D.

PRESIDENT OF THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF MANY SCHOLARS AND MEN OF SCIENCE.

THE object of the NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY is to present, as concisely as possible, the history of every word, and of all the different uses of every word, in the written language, not omitting those which are now obsolete. In order to ensure complete accuracy and thoroughness, it has been judged desirable, instead of adopting the traditional and often erroneous instances contained in existing dictionaries, to make an entirely fresh selection of representative extracts from the original works themselves. To gather together this fresh and trustworthy material— in other words, to lay a secure and adequate foundation for the fabric of English lexicography - has been the task of five-and-twenty years, and of more than 1,300 readers, working under the superintendence of the London Philological Society. Over 5,000 of the chief English writers of all ages, and at least four times as many separate works, have been laid under contribution; and some idea of the bulk of the material which the Editor has drawn upon may be formed from the fact that more than 3,000,000 distinct quotations, each complete in itself, have been placed at his disposal, of which about a third part will be finally included in the Dictionary. Every passage is furnished with a precise date and reference for the purpose of verification, as shown in the specimen words printed below.

Nor has the principle of co-operation been confined to the collection of the raw material. The Editor, though even the minutest details of the work have passed under his eye, has freely availed himself of the services of students of English, and of other branches of knowledge bearing thereon, in all parts of the world. The New Dictionary, therefore, will represent in a condensed form the accumulated knowledge of very many of the first scholars of our time; and will, if the expectations of its promoters are realized, be found in all respects abreast of the actual state of science. The Editor has sought to give such results only as are beyond dispute, avoiding rash speculation and all dogmatism on doubtful points. His object has been to allow each word, as far as possible, to tell its own story, by careful selection of the most characteristic examples, and by a strictly logical arrangement and subdivision of its various meanings; his own explanations being as brief as may be found consistent with clearness.

The work is addressed, not only to the advanced student of English literature, who will find it to combine a glossary of obsolete words with an etymological dictionary of the living language; or to the student of the sciences, who will learn from it at what date the technical terms with which he is dealing were introduced, and what modifications of form or sense they have since undergone; or to the professed philologist;—but also, and in no less a degree, to the general reader, who will here find, ready to his hand, the derivation and accepted pronunciation, the past history and present use, of every word which may occur in his reading, and concerning which he may desire to be further informed. It is thought that the extracts, even in the abridged form which considerations of space have rendered necessary, may still possess an independent interest of their own. Many vexed questions of etymology will be found to be settled once and for all when brought, as here, to the touchstone of history; and it can scarcely be but that new light will be thrown on various literary and bibliographical problems which have puzzled generations of enquirers. In the confident hope that it will be recognized as a contribution of solid and permanent value to the study of our language and literature, and as an attempt, carefully planned and conscientiously executed, to achieve for English all, and more than all, that Littré has achieved for French, the First Part of the NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY is now given to the world.

Subsequent Parts will be issued as rapidly as is found practicable, and the work will be completed in Six Volumes, each containing Four Parts similar to that now published.

The following are two specimen words:—

Agnostic (ægnǫ·stik), sb. and a. [f. Gr. ἄγνωστος unknowing, unknown, unknowable (f. ἀ not + γνω-know) + -ic. Cf. GNOSTIC; in Gr. the termination -αστ never coëxists with the privative ἀ.]

A. sb. One who holds that the existence of anything beyond and behind material phenomena is unknown and (so far as can be judged) unknowable, and especially that a First Cause and an unseen world are subjects of which we know nothing.

[Suggested by Prof. Huxley at a party held previous to the formation of the now defunct Metaphysical Society, at Mr. James Knowles's house on Clapham Common, one evening in 1869, in my hearing. He took it from St. Paul's mention of the altar to "the Unknown God." R. H. HUTTON in letter 13 Mar. 1881.]

1870 Spect. 29 Jan. 135 In theory he [Prof. Huxley] is a great and even severe Agnostic, who goes about exhorting all men to know how little they know. 1874 STUART Mem. Relig. etc. 208 Our modern Sophists—the Agnostics,—those who deny we have any knowledge, save of phenomena. 1879 Spect. 14 June, Nicknames are given [illegible]ents, but Agnostic was the name demanded by Professor Huxley for those who disclaimed atheism and believed with him in an "unknown and unknowable." In other words that the ultimate origin of all things must be some [illegible]known and unknowable. 1880 Mr. FRASER in Manch. Guardn. 25 Nov., [illegible] neither denied nor affirmed God. He simply put Him on one side.

B. adj. Of or pertaining to agnostics or their theory.

1875 Q. Rev. CXXXV. 192 The pseudo-scientific teachers of what has been called the Agnostic Philosophy. 1876 Principal TULLOCH Agnosticism in Weekly Rev. 18 Nov., The same agnostic principle which prevailed in our schools of philosophy had extended itself to religion and theology. Beyond what man can know by his senses or feel by his higher affections, nothing, as was alleged, could be truly known. 1880 BIRDWOOD Ind. Arts I. 4 The agnostic teaching of the Sankhya school is the common basis of all systems of Indian philosophy. 1882 FROUDE Carlyle II. 216 The agnostic doctrines, he (Carlyle) once said to me, were to appearance like the finest flour, from which you might expect the most excellent bread: but when you came to feed on it, you found it was powdered glass, and you had been eating the deadliest poison.

THE EGYPTIAN DEBATE.

THE interest of individual speeches in the Egyptian debate (which is likely to be protracted) is perhaps inferior to the general question of its probable result on the country. Lord CAIRNS in the House of Lords and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE at the St. Stephen's Club dinner commented justly enough on the character of the Government defence as conducted by the Government chiefs. Lord GRANVILLE paid us the compliment of adopting our suggestion that he should make the speech that he ought to have made a week before; but he unfortunately imposed on us the duty of suggesting now that he should make next week the speech he ought to have made on Tuesday. Mr. GLADSTONE with immense energy, and almost more than his usual luxuriance of subterfuge, devoted himself to the task of marching past the enemy, and exploring regions which the enemy had not occupied or thought of occupying. Ministers are charged with allowing the massacre of Sinkat, and they reply by discussions of the Dual Control. They are asked why, in the just language of their own supporters, they committed the "little short of deliberate "murder" of sending BAKER PASHA's troops to be speared, and they reply that Mr. CLIFFORD LLOYD is sensibly ameliorating the condition of the Egyptian prisons. Exactly the same contrast reproduced itself between the two chief speeches of Thursday. The whole gist of Mr. FORSTER's able argument for the motion (characteristically capped by a promise to vote against it) lay in the question, "Why did "you not do weeks ago what you are doing now?" The whole drift of Sir CHARLES DILKE's equally able and equally characteristic reply was a "drift past," a skilful evasion and eluding of the demand. The special as opposed to the general object of this course of apology is obvious enough. What is above all things necessary is to apply a sedative to the consciences of Liberal members which may enable them to vote for the Government without unbearable twinges. Everybody knows that the vote of the House of Lords on Tuesday was the vote, as Lord SALISBURY has said, which every Englishman who was not constrained by party ties to be silent would have given in a plébiscite on Tuesday night after the news of the fall of Sinkat. Everybody knows that that unhappy garrison looked daily for English aid. What is wanted, therefore, is to obliterate as far as may be this knowledge and these sentiments in the Liberal party. For that purpose and for no other the indignation and the circumlocution, the arguments on points which nobody wants argued, and the refusal to argue the points which everybody wants argued, may be supposed to be suitable.

Outside the walls of Parliament it is very noteworthy that the Government have not succeeded in rallying a single defender beyond the ranks of a small and faithful band, who follow a celebrated Parliamentary character by "denying "everything." With these last very short work can be made. If they deny that, after Lord GRANVILLE's despatch of the 4th of January, every step taken by BAKER PASHA was a step for which the English Government was responsible unless the English Government directly forbade it; if they say that between that date and the last agony Sinkat could not have been relieved; if they assert that the force under BAKER was, on good and valid testimony of experts, reasonably sufficient for the work; if they urge that TEWFIK BEY knew nothing of England, and had no ground for expecting anything from England—they say what they know, or ought to know, to be false, and they deny what they know, or ought to know, to be true. A certain common ground of respect for proved and notorious facts is necessary before political argument is possible—before, indeed, any man who respects himself can condescend to attempt it. The responsibility of the Government for the fate of HICKS PASHA is a matter on which, though it may be difficult to imagine how any one can honestly and with knowledge deny that responsibility, there yet may be two opinions. The slowness of the Government to come to any definite decision as to the Soudan is another point on which, though the balance of argument is very greatly against them, there are yet such contents in the lighter scale that the process of weighing is not wholly frivolous. But, with respect to the rout of Teb and the massacre at Sinkat, the facts are absolutely unchallengeable, and entirely on one side. For a full month before the one, and for nearly six months before the other, England, by her own declaration, had assumed an absolute initiative and an absolute veto in the dealings of Egypt with the Soudan. Every act done, or not done, by an Egyptian commander within reach of telegraph or messenger was done, or not done, under formally announced English overscership and command. Ample means were at hand for doing what was necessary, and ample powers for forbidding what might have been deemed undesirable. The Government neither did nor forbad doing. They knew that Sinkat was in extremities, and all Mr. GLADSTONE's assurances will not convince a single soldier that they did not know the entire untrustworthiness of BAKER's force. If they did not know it, so much the worse for them. And they capped the climax of imbecility by waiting for days, during which it was impossible to get at General GORDON, in order to find out General GORDON's opinion on a point on which, from his own words, he seems to have been almost entirely indifferent. Certainly excursus on the administrative excellences of Mr. CLIFFORD LLOYD and historical criticisms of the Dual Control are, from Mr. GLADSTONE's point of view, thoroughly in place. He said nothing in exculpation of his cruel and cowardly fault. And he did not say it because he could not say it, because there was nothing to say. The one word approximating to the actual situation was his assurance of BAKER PASHA's satisfaction with his chances. As if, supposing that this rather Bardolphian security as to BAKER PASHA's utterances were accepted, any General was likely to declare himself utterly hopeless and helpless in a task which he had undertaken, and as if the Government had not abundant means of knowing from expert and unbiassed sources the forlornness of the hope!

These things are so clear that, with the exception of those who, as has been said, start from propositions demonstrably and notoriously false, no attempt has been made anywhere to explain them away. Pile after pile of newspapers devoted to the Government may be turned without discovering a single really hearty defence of the Government conduct by any one who does not invent his premisses and beg his conclusion. It is not that the faithful followers desert their chiefs. It is sometimes said that party hatred is less bitter than it once was; it certainly cannot be said that party allegiance is weaker. After comforting himself with the irrelevant diversion of blaming the form of the Opposition attack, or insinuating that the Opposition themselves would have done no better, or taunting their chiefs with the absence of an announced policy, and the inferiority of their appeals to passion as compared with Mr. GLADSTONE's, follower after follower of the Government ends by the tell-tale confession that it would be well if these measures had been taken earlier, that a firmer policy would have been preferable, that in fact the Opposition charge is substantially true, and that there is no defence to it. The quibblers about vacillation forget that the vacillator need not necessarily do one definite thing one day and another another. It is in the inconsistency of acts with any definite tenor of purpose that vacillation consists, and it is this inconsistency which the Government have displayed. Even since the beginning of the debate they have exemplified the fault charged against them. Their warmest apologists, the very apologists who most boldly deny the facts, admit that the measures taken now might have been and ought to have been taken long ago, even if it was necessary to wait for BAKER'S defeat and GORDON'S permission before actively undertaking the relief of the garrisons. The plaintive suggestion is put forward that "some commencement of preparation for the contingency "of GORDON'S non disapproval might have been made." And why was it not made? Simply because the Government has vacillated, is vacillating, and will vacillate to the end of the chapter. The same intolerance of facts which showed itself before the first Egyptian War shows itself before what Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE calls the second. Had Lord ALCESTER had a couple of thousand men ready to land at Alexandria, there would have been no first war. Had Lord GRANVILLE'S despatch of the 4th of January even then been accompanied by the despatch of a small force to Souakim, Sinkat would not have fallen, the rout and butchery of Teb would not have happened, and General GORDON would have been as free as he is at the present moment to do what seems best to him in the interior. But this would have required Ministers to look facts in the face, to give up political living from hand to mouth, to abandon their absurd theory that England is protecting Egypt without a Protectorate, and occupying it without an occupation. It was not done, and thousands of lives have been sacrificed, a great disgrace has, in the serene judgment of the civilized world, fallen upon England, and a costly expedition of which no man can see the end has been made necessary.

CAVES.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL boasted a week ago in an election speech at Bridgwater that in the conduct of the Franchise Bill the Government will not have to fear the establishment of a Cave. There were, indeed, as he said with a strange confusion of metaphors, two or three hyænas prowling about in search of such a refuge; but they would look in vain for the shelter which was provided for their kind in 1866. A political Cave, which owes its name to Mr. BRIGHT, is a resort, not of wild beasts, but of malcontents. When a small section of Lord RUSSELL'S followers began to oppose his Reform Bill, Mr. BRIGHT, affecting to doubt whether Mr. LOWE or Mr. HORSMAN was their leader, declared that the party reminded him of a Skye terrier, so much hidden in hair that it was difficult to say which end was head and which was tail. In a short time, when it was evident that Mr. LOWE had become the chief of a considerable body of seceders, Mr. BRIGHT devised a new parable, reminding the House how every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented joined DAVID in the Cave of Adullam. Mr. LOWE and his friends at once accepted the description, only complaining that the Cave was becoming too small to hold them. That there is now no Cave, as far as domestic politics are concerned, is a result of the diminished independence or of the less scrupulous consciences of Liberal members. The Caucus keeps watch over every available opening, and the ultimate defeat of the dissidents of 1866 discourages imitation. The former Cave defeated the Reform Bill on Lord DUNKELLIN'S amendment, having already divided the House almost equally on Lord GROSVENOR'S motion for giving precedence to the question of redistribution. The hope of a coalition between the moderate sections of both parties, under Lord STANLEY as Minister, was disappointed; and in the following Session Mr. DISRAELI threw over the party to which he owed his accession to office. At the next election several denizens of the Cave paid in the loss of their seats the price of their political honesty and courage. Mr. LOWE himself would have been excluded from Parliament if the constituency of the University of London had not been created as if for the express purpose of providing an independent and unpopular politician with a seat.

A main disadvantage of party government consists in the arbitrary nature of the tests by which political loyalty is judged. The leaders of a Government or an Opposition can change their principles more easily than their adherents can disregard their personal connexions. The House of Commons of 1866 had been elected in the lifetime of Lord PALMERSTON, who, as it was well known, would never have allowed a Reform Bill to pass as long as he remained in office. The great majority of the Liberal party would have been well content with the prudent policy of the aged Minister; but Lord RUSSELL, who was his inevitable successor, had for some years past associated his ambition with a further change in the Constitution; and Mr. GLADSTONE was already understood to incline to democratic changes. The measure which was consequently introduced was comparatively moderate; but only the Radicals, who were then far less numerous than at present, heartily approved its provisions. Many of those who voted with the Ministers sympathized with the objects of the Cave, though not with its independent or mutinous organization. It was evident that ultimate success must depend on a coalition with the Conservatives, which would have been highly distasteful to the great body of Ministerial members. The heretics of the Cave were punished for their deviation from orthodox standards not only at the general election but in the later distribution of offices. When Mr. GLADSTONE formed his Government he excluded every inhabitant of the Cave with one remarkable exception. Mr. LOWE, if he had failed to prevent the degradation of the franchise, at least established the sound principle that, when a party includes in its ranks a man of great ability, it is judicious to give him office. There could be no better reason for allowing Mr. LOWE to hold a high Cabinet place in the Administration of 1868. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL is probably justified in his confidence that no second Mr. LOWE will disturb the harmony of the Liberal party during the discussion of the Franchise Bill.

An imminent contingency had not disturbed the confidence of one of the ablest official apologists of the Government. The House of Commons, if not an administrative body, supervises current policy with a vigilance which is sometimes keener than its interest in legislation. While it is doubtful whether a large portion of the assembly cares for the extension of the franchise, all its best members share the anxiety of their constituents for the national honour. Since the beginning of the Session, notwithstanding several episodes of secondary importance, the attention of Parliament and of the country has been almost exclusively concentrated on Egyptian affairs. The repeated refusal of Mr GLADSTONE to gratify the general curiosity naturally increased the irritation which has been produced by the comparison of disastrous events with the records of Ministerial policy. When the PRIME MINISTER felt or professed surprise at a simultaneous reference to the defeat of BAKER PASHA and to what he called the wholly pacific mission of General GORDON, it became impossible to restrain universal impatience. Fantastic paradoxes sometimes cause amusement when they are introduced into theoretical discussions; but in moments of danger and difficulty they become wholly intolerable. As a consequence of the strange Ministerial tactics, an inchoate Cave began to form itself within forty-eight hours of the time when the ATTORNEY-GENERAL declared that it was impossible. On Monday it was said that certain Liberal members had signed a paper in which they insisted that the Government should openly avow the existence and assume the responsibility of a protectorate which had already been assumed in practice. The expediency and justice of the demand must be considered in connexion with the general question of Egyptian policy. For the present purpose it is only material to note the risks of internal division which happily limit the omnipotence of the strongest Ministry.

The security from internal schisms which pleased the fancy of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL was, as has already been said, mainly founded on the solid strength and constant activity of the Liberal Associations. As long as the Government moves in the direction of democracy it is assured of the support of the organized partisans who are inaccessible to adverse reasoning. The Associations will accept the concessions which are expected from Mr. GLADSTONE, though they would prefer the more revolutionary measures which are threatened by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In questions of foreign policy of which the managers know little, and for which they care less, their course is determined either by the supposed bent of popular feeling or by calculations of the interests of the Government. It is not a little significant of the present state of public opinion that the Caucus has not ventured to issue a mandate in anticipation of the division on the Vote of Censure. It was therefore possible for dissatisfied Liberals to impose conditions on their support of Government, or at least on their cordial adhesion to a policy which has not hitherto secured their confidence. It is indeed not a little absurd that alternative schemes of international policy should be inseparably associated with party divisions which represent conflicting systems of domestic legislation. At different periods the Whigs and the Tories have several times changed places as the respective advocates of peace or war. It was by mere accident that Lord BEACONSFIELD, happening to be in office when the Eastern question was reopened, became the principal representative of the policy which had before his term of office been maintained by Lord PALMERSTON. The negotiations and wars in which his Ministry were engaged had nothing to do with Conservative or Liberal doctrines. At the time of the Berlin Treaty the Government had acquired great popularity by its conduct of affairs; but the dissatisfaction which was afterwards caused by untoward events in Asia and Africa transferred political power to the combined Liberals and Radicals.

It is unlikely that the dissatisfaction which has been caused by transactions in Egypt should at present dissolve the Liberal majority. The members who protest against the continuance of idle and mischievous fictions in Egyptian policy have for the most part no other ostensible cause of quarrel with the Government, nor will the lines of division on questions which are for the time urgent coincide with permanent tendencies to separation. A few extreme Radicals, such as Sir WILFRID LAWSON, Mr. LABOUCHERE, and Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, desire a summary abandonment of Egypt; but other members of the same political section are solicitous to defend the honour of the country, and even within the Cabinet it is said that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN inclines to a vigorous course of action. Perhaps a majority of the Liberal party, though it abstains from promoting a victory of the Opposition, may not have regretted the exposure of errors and miscalculations which have led to their natural results; but a coalition is still far distant, and there are not yet sufficient materials for the construction of a Cave. It will not be surprising if the discipline of the majority is temporarily strengthened by a partial and casual display of independence. Scrupulous members who decline to be parties to a national dereliction of duty will be eager to assure themselves and their constituents that their party allegiance is still unshaken. Nothing will be easier than to exhibit severe Liberal orthodoxy by voting for the Franchise Bill, for the postponement of the Redistribution Bill, and for the London Municipal Bill. By the end of the Session Egyptian difficulties, if they have not disappeared, may probably have changed their character. It is not equally certain that recent miscarriages may not affect the result of the next election. War is sometimes popular; but a timid shrinking from danger always causes feelings of resentment. In 1880 the contest was in a great measure decided by considerations of foreign policy. It is not for the interest of the present Government that such issues should be raised on the next appeal to the constituencies.

THE BRADLAUGH MUDDLE.

THE most probable comment of the plain man on the conduct of Mr. BRADLAUGH during the beginning of the present week is What does it mean? and it is not improbable that it only means Mr. BRADLAUGH's desire that the plain man should ask himself that very question. The late member for Northampton has not been flourishing lately, and even his usual ragged regiment of followers appear to have been conspicuously absent on Monday. The very significant letter which a Liberal M.P. recently addressed to him in a Liberal paper corresponded well enough to facts. There is no doubt that to many Liberals Mr. BRADLAUGH is simply what an impatient guide-book maker calls the stone at the entrance of Borrowdale, "a "huge, vulgar nuisance." A new election and a new mandate seems to him probably the best way of recovering a little importance, if only by renewing the disturbance in Parliament which after Monday he would have been unable to renew this Session. His own mysterious hints of a weapon which he is going to use with terrible effect need not receive much attention, for Mr. BRADLAUGH is very good at these mysterious hints, and nothing ever comes of them. Expert as he is at the clever, but rather useless, devices which suggest themselves to an amateur of ability in law, even Mr. BRADLAUGH can hardly hope to get his own conduct recorded or regarded as a precedent in his favour; while his acceptance of the Chiltern Hundreds, though it would not bar the ATTORNEY-GENERAL's action, deprives himself of all benefit from the very improbable result of that action being brought and failing. It is probable that he at first contemplated the course of action to which his conduct on Monday seemed naturally to lead—that of provoking legal proceedings and abiding their result—and then decided that this by itself was too tedious or too unexciting a course. Of that which he finally fixed upon, it can only be said that Northampton has another opportunity of recovering its rank among constituencies deserving respect. It is probable that the aspects of the matter which will decide the election are local rather than national, otherwise the Conservative candidate ought, despite the intimidation practised by Mr. BRADLAUGH's mob, to have a fairer chance than usual at the present moment. Mr. BRADLAUGH himself appears to have no extraordinary assistance, except a five-pound note sent by the Rev. Mr. REES of Somewhere. The ease with which the Rev. Mr. REESES of this world and their five-pound notes are parted has been frequently remarked on by the ancients.

The Parliamentary incident itself was distinguished from others that have gone before it chiefly by the license of insult to religion and decency which the senior member for Northampton permitted himself, and by what must be regretfully called the weakness—a very unusual weakness—of the SPEAKER in preserving order. If a statutory ceremony, obligatory on members of Parliament, and held to be sacred by a great majority of them, may be described in the terms which Mr. LABOUCHERE used, it is a little difficult to comprehend how any merely verbal indecency can be a breach of order. It is still more difficult to comprehend Sir HENRY BRAND's ruling that Mr. LABOUCHERE, using these unbecoming words "on his own "responsibility," was not to be interfered with. It is not known that any member, Irish or other, who has been rebuked or suspended for improper language during these last years, has ever been shown to have used the words complained of on any responsibility other than his own. There was perhaps some inconsistency in the series of confused divisions which followed; but the only important results, even before Mr. BRADLAUGH's application for the Chiltern Hundreds, were his exclusion and the hinted prosecution, and with the granting of the Chiltern Hundreds the former of these ceased to be of any importance. The House, it is to be feared, must be content, for reasons to be presently touched on, with keeping this brawler out of its precincts every time that a constituency is ill advised enough to return him. Much, no doubt, is to be said for the suspension of the Northampton writ. The offence of a constituency where some scores or hundreds of voters take glasses of beer or five-pound notes not to vote against political convictions which do not exist, but simply because the glasses of beer and the five-pound notes are pleasant things to have, is, in any philosophic estimate, venial as compared with the offence of a constituency which obstinately returns a person like Mr. BRADLAUGH. But the one is a legal offence and the other is not. Again, there is considerable reason for thinking that Mr. CHILDERS should not have complied with Mr. BRADLAUGH's application for the Chiltern Hundreds. But this again is a matter which it may be argued ought not in strictness to affect Mr. BRADLAUGH's rights or the rights of Northampton. In strictly abiding by the thoroughly reasonable, lawful, and constitutional course of conduct which it has hitherto pursued, and in simply excluding Mr. BRADLAUGH every time that he presents himself to take an oath which he cannot take, the House, at the cost of some trouble to itself, and at the risk of affording Mr. LABOUCHERE further opportunities of misbehaviour, is absolutely secure from all other inconvenient consequences. It is not easy to point out any other course in pursuing which it is equally secure.

There remains, however, as there generally has remained in this question, through all its phases, the singular, eccentric, and extraordinary conduct of the Government.

No reference is made by these words to Mr. GLADSTONE's remarkable, but now usual, proceeding of temporarily suspending himself ab officio, but by no means a beneficio, as first Minister of the Crown and leader of the House of Commons. That is now a familiar spectacle, and there is some justice in his own claim to be allowed to present it afresh as a mere matter of consistency. But Mr. BRADLAUGH seems born to be a stone of stumbling to the Government. In the original debate of Monday they were in vain solicited for a clear exposition of what they intended to do in the matter of Mr. BRADLAUGH'S repeated and contumacious votes. But it certainly was then understood (Mr. GLADSTONE indeed has expressed himself on the subject in words which would have bound any other man except that no other man than himself would have been likely to use them in the circumstances) that a prosecution was to take place. This being so, the action of Mr. CHILDERS in conferring the Chiltern Hundreds on Mr. BRADLAUGH was at least peculiar. For either the Government thought that Mr. BRADLAUGH had brought himself within the penalties of the statute or that he had not. If he had, he had ceased to be a member of the House of Commons before his application. He had, therefore, no more right to the Chiltern Hundreds than the first man who happened to walk over Westminster Bridge that day. If, on the other hand, the Government had come to the conclusion that Mr. BRADLAUGH had not vacated the seat, it might at least have been supposed that a formal statement would have been made by a responsible Minister, that the change of the Government ideas from what had seemed to be their course would be announced, explained, and supported by argument, and that the House thus fortified and informed would be asked to give its decision on the issue of the writ. But neither of these courses would have comported with Mr. GLADSTONE'S favourite ostrich-like attitude in reference to matters he does not like; and so probably the third course of doing nothing was adopted. Even here the singularity of the Government conduct did not cease. The remarkable reply of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL to Mr. NEWDEGATE on Wednesday exhibited all Sir HENRY JAMES'S ability in that department of law learning which consists in giving answers unintelligible, or nearly so, to the profane layman. But it seemed to suggest that the prosecution of Mr. BRADLAUGH, which Mr. GLADSTONE had seemed to speak of on Monday as certain, and which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT had referred to on Tuesday as at any rate an argumentative probability, might never come off at all. Sir HENRY doubts gravely "how far the Cabinet can direct an Attorney-"General against his discretion to sue for penalties." This is a very pretty constitutional question; but the raising of it is anything but consistent with the tone of the scanty remarks on the subject which the Cabinet, as distinguished from this nobly independent and discreet adviser of theirs, had previously given. It is odd that the second thoughts of Ministers always seem to tend to Mr. BRADLAUGH'S advantage. But, perhaps, this portrait by an Attorney-General of an Attorney-General discreetly resisting the pressure of a persecuting Cabinet was only a fancy picture drawn to magnify the artist's office, and perhaps to make Mr. NEWDEGATE unhappy.

LIFE AND DEATH OF CETEWAYO.

THE death of CETEWAYO, though it may remove some embarrassment, ought to excite compunction in the minds of many official and non-official Englishmen. For the varied misfortunes of his later life he was but in a small degree responsible. It was not his fault that, born and bred a military despot, he sacrificed the welfare of his people to the effective organization of his army. He maintained evil customs which he inherited from his predecessors because he shared the superstitions and prejudices of his countrymen. When a civilized neighbour was seeking a cause of quarrel, the Zulu KING was accused of having broken certain promises which he was supposed to have made to the English agent on his accession to the throne. If he had been skilful in argument, he might have answered that he was crowned because he was already KING, and not in consideration of pledges which he perhaps scarcely understood. Like his ancestors, and, indeed, like some European sovereigns in former times, he took the property or the lives of subjects who had become obnoxious by reason either of large possessions or of suspected disloyalty. The process of smelling out witchcraft would have commended itself to LOUIS XI. of France as a mode of dealing with turbulent nobles which would have been at the same time pious and profitable. English functionaries who were shocked by the compulsory celibacy of Zulu warriors could scarcely be ignorant that similar restrictions are practically imposed on millions of soldiers in European armies. A less capricious objection was raised to CETEWAYO'S occasional declaration that it concerned his honour to celebrate his reign by washing his spears. In the course of some years he had never executed his threat; and there was at least an even chance that, like FREDERICK WILLIAM I. of Prussia, he would keep the peace through disinclination to spoil or deteriorate so perfect an instrument as his army.

If he had discharged his alleged duty by invading any neighbouring territory, there was every reason to believe that he would have attacked the Boers of the Transvaal rather than the English colonists. No intruders from Natal were in the habit of encroaching on his territory; while settlers from the Transvaal constantly passed the border of Zululand. The question of the title of the disputed lands was referred to the arbitration of the English High Commissioner, who ultimately gave his award in favour of CETEWAYO. Unfortunately in the meantime the government of the Transvaal had been assumed by a representative of the Crown, and, consequently, the chosen arbitrator had become a party to the litigation. The consequence was an act of flagrant injustice, for the High Commissioner, while he nominally confirmed the award, drew an arbitrary distinction between the sovereignty of the debatable territory and the actual possession of the land. The district was restored to CETEWAYO as a part of his kingdom, but the Boers were allowed to retain possession of the farms. As the Zulus wanted the lands, and not an empty title, CETEWAYO, with good reason, from that time ceased to entertain friendly feelings to the English authorities; yet he abstained from any act of hostility until his own dominions were invaded on the most frivolous pretexts. He was suddenly required to disband his army, to allow his young soldiers to marry; to discontinue the custom of smelling out witches; and to abandon other barbarous practices. Whether he could have retained his throne if he had complied with the peremptory demand, it is impossible to know. His disinclination to engage in a struggle with his imperious neighbour was shown by his moderation in returning no answer to the challenge. If he still thought it possible to negotiate, his hopes were disappointed. After a short delay the English troops crossed the Tugela, which formed the boundary between Natal and Zululand. Since greedy potentates first illustrated or suggested the fable of the wolf and the lamb, there has seldom been so causeless a declaration of war. It is true that the immediate result confirmed the estimate which had been formed of the formidable character of CETEWAYO'S army. At Isandlana the Zulus, armed almost entirely with spears and javelins, stormed an English camp and destroyed the garrison. In the later battle of Ulundi they once more proved themselves to be among the bravest of mankind, though they were at last utterly defeated by regular troops armed with weapons of precision.

The KING became a fugitive, and when he was soon afterwards taken prisoner he seems to have forfeited the allegiance of his subjects. The tribe which had become under the dynasty of himself and his immediate ancestors the most powerful section of the widely-spread Kaffir nation, had been organized with Spartan asceticism rather as an army than as a State by DINGAAN, PANDA, and CETEWAYO himself. The loyalty which depended on military discipline was dissolved when the Zulu force was destroyed or scattered at Ulundi. No opposition was offered to the singular arrangement by which Sir GARNET WOLSELEY distributed the Zulu territory among thirteen petty chiefs, one of whom was of English birth. There was no trace of attachment to the fallen KING, or of desire for his return, and some of the members of his own family zealously deprecated a restoration. The ties of blood are generally lax among barbarous chieftains; and CETEWAYO himself had first made himself king by killing several of his brothers in battle and by deposing his father. Unfortunately for the peace of South Africa, and for CETEWAYO himself, some English philanthropists, in their feeling for personal wrongs, misjudged the interests of the Zulus, and began an agitation which has resulted in widespread anarchy and bloodshed.

It is easier for sentimental persons to sympathize with an ex-king than with an unknown multitude of his former subjects. Bishop COLENSO, who had long been regarded as a patron of native chiefs whom he deemed to have been unjustly treated, cordially espoused the cause of the Pretender. Deputations from Zululand visited the BISHOP'S house in defiance of the protests of the Lieutenant-Governor of Natal, and the reaction against the policy of the Zulu war had proceeded so far at home that the Secretary of State for the Colonies at last acceded to the request that the prisoner who had been detained at the Cape should be allowed to visit England. The next step was, as had been expected, a nominally conditional restoration. Lord KIMBERLEY had with some difficulty been persuaded by the urgent representations of Sir HENRY BULWER to recognize the title of a chief who was too powerful to be expelled to retain his dominions in the north; and a small territory bordering on Natal was reserved as a place of security for the other chiefs whose rights had been summarily disregarded. In London, and again at the Cape, CETEWAYO, while he accepted the terms proposed for his signature, plainly intimated his purpose of disregarding limitations which he considered unjust. He can scarcely be charged with a breach of faith because on his arrival in Zululand he took little notice of his formal engagements. He at once attempted to levy troops in the Reserve, with which he was not to meddle; and he attempted to reconquer the territory of USIBEPU, which he had undertaken to respect. If he had succeeded, his contumacy would probably have been condoned; but the fortune of war turned against him, and USIBEPU, in alliance with OHAM, a brother of CETEWAYO'S, inflicted on the restored KING two or three successive defeats. From the Reserve in which he had been compelled to take refuge he organized another unsuccessful invasion of his enemy's territory, and consequently he subsided from the condition of a guest to that of a prisoner. A few days before his death he contrived to escape from the custody of his not unfriendly gaolers. It is possible that annoyance at his recapture may have been one of the causes of his death. He will be remembered for a time as a sufferer from the contest between civilization and barbarism, and also as a victim of special injustice. During his time almost every possible mistake has been committed by the English Government in its dealings with the Zulus.

Lord DERBY, who possesses a negative qualification for dealing with uncivilized tribes, inasmuch as he is not a sentimentalist, will now have one difficulty the less to encounter in settling the future condition of Zululand. A new, but not unexpected, complication has resulted from the recent troubles. The Boers of the Transvaal have taken the opportunity of internecine civil war to gratify their characteristic appetite for land. USIBEPU, OHAM, and perhaps CETEWAYO himself, have invited their assistance, and adventurous volunteers have rendered services which are of course to be rewarded by territorial grants. It may perhaps not be the business of the English Government to interfere with such transactions on the North-Western frontier; but it is not desirable to have the Boers for neighbours where their presence can be avoided. The first step ought to be the termination of internal war; and the most obvious mode of attaining the object would be the establishment in some form of a protectorate, such as that which is about to be instituted in Basutoland. There is a certain tendency to bloodguiltiness in a policy which allows barbarians who might be kept in order to kill one another without restraint. The Reserve, which, but for Lord KIMBERLEY'S perverse policy, would have been double its present size, ought to be more directly governed by English functionaries. The Zulus are as manageable as they are brave, if only they are governed as in Natal with prudence and justice. Even the soldiers of CETEWAYO'S former army probably prefer peace and freedom to rigorous discipline; but, if civil war is prolonged, the military caste will revive, and perhaps some warlike chief may succeed to the powers and pretensions of the former dynasty. The system of leaving neighbouring barbarians to settle their own affairs has not proved successful. In the great majority of cases, it is cheaper and easier to govern them than to repel their encroachments. The partial failure of Sir GARNET WOLSELEY'S experiment was probably due to the absence of a central authority. An English Resident might contrive to keep the peace, and to promote improvement with the aid of the chiefs, including perhaps USIBEPU.

CORRECTING FORTUNE.

"I DON'T believe there is a single offence that I have "not committed," said an undergraduate once, as he awed a whole wine party with examples of his knowledge of life. There was a respectful silence; then a small voice asked, "Did you ever cheat at cards?" With shame and blushes the fanfaron of vice came down from his bad eminence, and owned that he had never cheated at cards. This is, indeed, the very lowest depth to which civilized man can descend, and he seems at present to reach the abyss pretty often. No one can defend a man who has cheated at cards; the only estimable person who ever did so was the Chevalier DES GRIEUX, and he had the one constant excuse for his conduct admitted by all admirers of Manon Lescaut. The case of the Chevalier must be placed on one side in that world of random morality to which CHARLES LAMB good-humouredly consigned the comedies of the Restoration. No, a man may do many shady things; his accounts may be difficult to unravel; he may decline to fight a duel in a foreign country; he may find that urgent private business calls him to Europe when his regiment is in the Soudan or Nova Zembla, and people will make excuses for him. But he really must not cheat at cards.

As the whole world seems in a gamblesome humour, while clerks play napoleon in railway-carriages, and Park Clubs explode in every direction, it may be as well to point out that gambling has two inevitable ends—men don't pay, and men take to cheating. The former disaster always occurs as soon as "paper" is admitted as a legal tender over the green baize. When I.O.U.'s accumulate sport decays, firm friends quarrel, and a club or a loo-playing set at college breaks up in confusion. Some of the members become suddenly scrupulous, and explain to their unconverted companions in iniquity that they think it wrong to waste money in the payment of obligations which it was sinful to incur. This kind of thing is not pleasant, but it is less unpleasant than the habit of correcting fortune. The pigeons of this world are not unsoiled doves; but the pigeons are better than the rooks, into which, by a familiar process of ornithological differentiation, unknown to DARWIN, they are apt to develop.

A very fine rookery has just been discovered, according to the newspapers, in a Parisian club in the Rue Royale. Most French clubs exist merely for the purpose of gambling. Their sacred hearth is the long green baccarat-table, with that pit in the middle which has so often proved "a nice opening for a young man." From dusk till dinner-time, from dinner-time to dawn, bankers are giving cards, or performing the act of abatage (unexplained by LITTRÉ), while the ghost of Banco perpetually walks. At the club in the Rue Royale the game of quinze (which we regret to say that we are practically unacquainted with) seems to be more popular than baccarat. While the sport of quinze was in full swing one of the players thought he saw, or felt, something odd in the cards. Apparently the point of the game is to make fifteen, as the object in baccarat is to make nine, or nearly nine. This inquisitive player continuing his researches found by a "comparison of instances" worthy of BACON that the court cards and fives were marked. This could scarcely be regarded as fortuitous, but rather showed clear proofs of design. The court cards had been pricked at the corners, the fives at the corner and in the centre, with a needle dipped in a solution of gum arabic. Now in clubs of this kind the cards are usually supplied by one of the servants, who is also a sort of banker to the establishment. For the convenience of players he changes bank-notes or paper into counters of a recognized value, and these counters are redeemed at the end of the play. The card-room servant has also been known to cash cheques, and perhaps to lend money to the décavés. Thus the functionary gets an unhealthy sort of importance, and has opportunities which he appears to have abused at the club in the Rue Royale. In the great club scandal at Nice some years ago, when an Englishman of good family was found out in cheating, his system was, we believe, to deal with carefully-arranged packs procured from one of the club servants. The ordinary processes of cutting and shuffling had no effect on those packs, "with which," as the Henwife says to the Queen in the Irish tale of The Black Thief, "I do not think you can "lose." Now, at the club in the Rue Royale a number of packs of cards and some 4,000*l.* worth of securities "payable "to bearer" were found under the bed of a servant. Here is a plot ready made for M. FORTUNÉ DU BOISGOBEY. The club servant is doubtless a profligate Marquis in a

"make-up" he has introduced into the club (while he was still a member of it) the chief of a band of brigands who wins with the marked cards furnished by the Marquis. Can any scene be finer than that in which the hero unmasks and pulls the powdered wig or the whiskers off the "made-up" footman, proving that he is "no waiter but" the long lost Marquis DE KERIGHIAN "in disguise." The question is whether it would be necessary for the hero afterwards to fight the Marquis, in whose veins runs some of the bluest blood in Brittany.

Perhaps matters have not been quite so romantic in real history, but it remains certain that, if there was a felonious servant, there must also have been a felonious accomplice, actually a member of the Club. In one of M. CHAVETTE'S tales, the cheating is done by a hero who has such enormous hands that no one can see what is going on behind them. Yet even he has a confederate, and a confederate is necessary, we think, to any gentleman who wishes to correct fortune. He may, or may not, be a servant or disguised as a servant. "Having a remarkably fine eyesight and "a great natural aptitude," says Mr. BARRY LYNDON, "I was speedily able to give my dear uncle much assist-"ance against his opponents at the green table." Mr. LYNDON goes on to observe, and members of the club in the Rue Royale should note his noble indignation, "It is only "the clumsy fool who cheats, who resorts to the vulgar "expedients of cogged dice and cut cards," or tattooed cards, we may add. It is not so very hard to detect a card which is only "correct" in an immoral sense. "Such "a man," adds BARRY, "is sure to go wrong some time or "other." So is the person who, playing without a confederate, stuffs his sleeve after the manner of the Heathen Chinee. "Everything successful is simple. If I wiped the "dust off a chair, it was to show that the enemy was strong "in diamonds; if I pushed it, he had one king; if I said "'Punch or wine, my lord?' hearts was meant; if I said "'Wine or punch?' clubs." It was only from hearing FRANK PUNTER yawn thrice when the Chevalier held the ace of trumps that Mr. LYNDON knew Greek had met Greek when Lord DEUCEACE encountered DE BALIBARI.

Without a confederate the now fashionable game of baccarat does not seem to offer many chances for the Greek. He may carry nines concealed about his person, but this sort of cheating requires very great skill in sleight of hand. Only a "sneak thief," as the Americans say, would sink so very low as to put his stake half on and half off the table, and withdraw it when he lost

The plan of dealing over a large, highly-polished, silver cigar case is good, but old. Of course the cigar-case shows the dealer in its burnished surface what cards he is giving the players, and he knows better whether to stand on his own hand or not. According to a competent authority, while there is no game at which one may not be cheated, at écarté one may be cheated in from fifteen to twenty different ways. One gallant gambler played against a Greek, and his friends warned him that he was being duped. He answered in a loud voice, "Monsieur triche! mais je "le sais bien que monsieur triche! Seulement il est con-"venu que chaque fois que je le prendrai, je marquerai "un point!" This was, indeed, a sportsmanlike handicap, and argued a great love of the game in the player, and a cynical indifference to the character of an antagonist. The tale of the old General in a country town is also good, though rather well known. This veteran cheated habitually and execrably. It was thought "good form" to take no notice of his exploits; but one day a small civilian, a stranger to the club, observed, "Why, "General, you are cheating!" "Yes, sir," said the General, who stammered dreadfully; "yes, sir, I know very well I'm cheating; but I d-d-d-don't like to be t-t-t-told it"—a remark to which there is no very obvious repartee. A splendid failure to cheat was that of the French Greek. No one had suspected him; he usually won some fifty louis every time he took the bank; and on one occasion he left the theatre at Nice in the middle of a play and went on to the club. There he took the bank, won on an eight, and on a nine. Then he offered to "give cards"; his opponent accepted, and the banker laid down a card marked

THÉÂTRE FRANÇAIS
DE NICE.

It was the ticket of readmission in case he had wanted to go back to the play. Obviously this could not have formed part of a normal pack, and as obviously the banker had taken it out of his pocket by mistake. On the whole, the moral of cheating at cards is that expressed by Mr. BARRY LYNDON:—"Such a man is sure to go wrong some "time or other; and my advice to people who see such a "vulgar person at his pranks is, of course, to back him "while he plays, but never, never to have anything to do "with him."

THE ARMY AT SIXES AND SEVENS.

MONDAY night's sitting in the House of Lords began with a brief conversation which suggests some matter for reflection at the present crisis. The subject was the state of the army, which deserves more practical attention than it gets at all times, and is of vital importance at this moment. Like most other people, the Earl of GALLOWAY had been a good deal surprised by Lord WOLSELEY'S breezy confidence, as shown in that remarkable speech to the Artists corps, and he asked for information—or rather he asked for some explanation of the ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S sources of information. The answer was most instructive. It seems that when Lord WOLSELEY startled his hearers by stating that the army returns proved so many pleasant things, he "inadvertently" forgot to add that they were a year old. The British army, which contains within its ranks fifty-eight per cent. of men over five feet seven inches high, for instance, was not the army that we know, but the force of 1882. In other words, it was the reserves and the old regiments of General ROBERTS'S army which made the average such as it was. The question of dates is of no small importance in dealing with the state of our army. A year makes a considerable difference when we are losing seasoned men by thousands, and replacing them by a mob of recruits five feet two inches high and thirty two inches round the chest. The Earl of GALLOWAY commented with by no means undue severity on the "inadvertence" of a General holding a high post in the War Office who uses figures in this fashion. Lord WOLSELEY'S discretion was indeed at fault in a sufficiently remarkable way. He took care to supply himself with the figures because he sagaciously foresaw that they would be needed. He paraded them with some solemnity. He insisted on their importance, and he only forgot to say that they proved nothing to the point. When a high Government official supports his assertions by statistics, we fondly imagine that he is giving us the benefit of his particular information, and not merely drawing on sources open to everybody, unless he says so. Lord WOLSELEY is too good a soldier to damage his chance of securing a good position, even for temporary purposes, by letting his opponents into the secret of his manœuvres, and so he, of course inadvertently, used the neat little stratagem animadverted on by the Earl of GALLOWAY, and revealed by Lord MORLEY. How surprised the Times must have been to learn that its little crow of triumph was supported by nothing better than the carefully prepared blue pamphlet we all had the pleasure of reading last year! The intellectual suppleness of the scientific soldier is truly great. There is to be sure nothing new in Lord WOLSELEY'S little slip. By some law of nature not as yet investigated by science, official persons are terribly liable to commit these oversights when giving us information about the army.

It is, indeed, a wonderful proof of the irrepressible hopefulness of politicians that any body can be persuaded to undertake the care of that undoubted white elephant. The disappointments of the Admiralty are neither few nor trivial; but it is rewarded with a certain amount of success. Ships and crews can be relied on to answer modest expectations, but no man can tell what will be the state of the army a week ahead. A few days ago the War Office was talking about holding autumn manœuvres once more, and was apparently looking forward to a year of quiet drift. It calculated on showing again how it can leave the Guards dinnerless within a few miles of Salisbury, or in some other distant and barren region. While all these fancies are in full bloom comes the nipping frost of a call for actual service, and we see how very fit the army is for the work it is always liable to be called on to do. The papers are full of makeshifts and rumours of makeshifts. A force of a few thousand men is to be sent to Suakim at the eleventh hour, and to get it together there is such a turmoil as took place in the United States when M'DOWELL'S army was getting ready to enter Northern Virginia. Before we can get at OSMAN DIGNA there is to be a complete change round. The Cairo garrison is to be hurried to Suakim, and to be replaced by the regiments at Alexandria, which again is to be occupied by the blue jackets of the Mediterranean squadron. The sailors must do the work, for the ships have been stripped of Marines to reinforce General GRAHAM's army on the Red Sea. Our recent experience of the results of setting everybody to do somebody else's work has plainly taught the Government nothing. It would be equally foolish and impertinent to compare the seamen of our squadrons to the poor wretches sent by the cruel pedantry of Mr. GLADSTONE to die on the road to Sinkat, but garrison duty on shore can assuredly do their discipline no good. Meanwhile their ships will be as useless for naval purposes as if they were laid up at Chatham, and the Channel Squadron will probably have to take their place in the Mediterranean. It also is to be stripped of its Marines. The Egyptian army under Sir EVELYN WOOD probably deserves to be considered useless. It is no reproach to its European officers that they are not believed to have made an efficient force out of a race which cannot fight, but though that is a very sufficient reason for leaving them at home, it is a still better one for not wasting any more English officers on them. More are to be sent, however, and that of the very kind we can least spare. The most spirited non-commissioned officers at Aldershot are being tempted to volunteer for Egypt, as if our own regiments were not in manifest and increasing need of their services.

The most notable feature of the whole muddle is the treatment of the Marines. It is undoubtedly right that they should be used, and it is in the highest degree satisfactory that we have at least one military force which is at all times fit for service. In all our little wars of late years—ever since the intelligent reformer went crazy over the German army, in fact—we have used the force continually, and with excellent results. Nobody has anything to say against making use of them again. There are, however, ways and ways of doing the best of things, and it may be roundly asserted that the War Office takes the worst in its dealings with the Marines. It is no small abuse that the men of the force should be suddenly called away from active service on board ship. To land Marines for a definite operation is one thing. To send them away for weeks is altogether another, for it entails leaving a whole squadron insufficiently manned. If we asked why the whole battalion formed to serve under General GRAHAM was not sent from home, the answer would doubtless be that they could not be spared. The force has been so seriously reduced of late years that it is just adequate to the ordinary calls of the service and no more. But this is only one detail of the whole policy of the War Office towards the corps. The Marines have only been allowed to exist, as it were, on sufferance for years. Its officers have been deliberately treated as if the authorities wished to discourage any one from entering the force. They have very hard and very various work to do both on sea and land, but all the prizes and honours of the military profession are denied them. At this moment the Ministry is giving an extraordinary proof of its partiality. A body of Marines is being collected in hot haste to make up General GRAHAM'S force, and a colonel of that arm is being sent out to command them. Colonel TUSON led the battalion of Marines which distinguished itself so highly in the last Egyptian campaign; but it appears that he is not thought worthy of acting as a general officer, and Colonel REDVERS BULLER is sent from England to act as second in command to General GRAHAM. It is not easy to see why a second in command, whom the Duke of WELLINGTON thought a superfluity at all times, is wanted in a force of some four thousand men; but, if an officer had to be named to the post, it might, it would seem, have been found in the commander of that part of the little army which we are learning to rely on more and more. Indeed, the commands at Suakim are all being distributed on what appears at least a curious principle. There are five general officers with the seven thousand men in garrison in Egypt. Nearly half that force is detailed on service, but the five generals are left behind, while two officers are hurriedly despatched from England. If the field officers in Egypt are incompetent, why are they employed? If they are, as we must suppose, capable officers, why are they passed over when a chance of gaining distinction presents itself? The answer is not difficult to find. General GRAHAM and Colonel BULLER have been already associated with Lord WOLSELEY, and it is to that fact rather than to their acknowledged abilities that they owe their present employment.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

WHEN Mr. LABOUCHERE announced in the House of Commons the other day his intention of bringing in a Bill extending the provisions of the Cruelty to Animals Prevention Acts to bears, there were some who laughed. The joke was not obvious. But the necessity for the legislation was. Only a few days before a police magistrate had been compelled to dismiss a charge of savage cruelty to bears on the ground that they did not come within the terms of the Act of 1849. They were not domestic, said Mr. HANNAY, and that statute only applied to domestic animals. We are aware that the truth of the evidence for the prosecution is challenged, and we have no intention of expressing or implying any opinion upon the facts. Whether they were as alleged, or something quite different, is not a question which affects the argument. For the purposes of the decision it was of course assumed that the ill-treatment of the bears was made out, and the conclusion unfortunately is that, so far as the law goes, they may be ill-treated with impunity. Of course this serious omission does not affect bears only. It concerns all animals of a wild nature, whether they have been actually domesticated or not. We need not enter into any elaborate contention that this is an unsatisfactory state of things. Every humane and sensible man must admit at once that it is so, and that the only doubtful point is what would be the best practical remedy. It is not difficult to see why Parliament excluded wild animals from the security afforded by the fear of punishment. For hunting and partridge-shooting might otherwise have been made illegal, and the bitterest enemy of those amusements would probably agree that they are matter for separate and independent consideration. Historical explanation is not, however, as a good many people seem tacitly to assume, the same thing as logical justification. To account for a thing is not to defend it; and, whatever the cause may be, there is a serious defect in the law. Mr. LABOUCHERE'S Bill, which has been introduced, and which is backed by Mr. COLERIDGE KENNARD and Mr. O'SHEA, goes a long way, if not the whole way, to supply what is required. It provides that "the word "animal" in the existing Acts shall "mean and include "every animal, whether of domestic or wild nature, ex- "hibited for purposes of gain." Whether this system of piecemeal legislation is theoretically sound or practically convenient may perhaps be doubted. But it is, if ever, justifiable in circumstances like these, where an immediate cure is wanted for a definite complaint. Mr. LABOUCHERE'S Bill, which we rather hope than expect may be passed without unnecessary delay, would certainly be beneficial, if not, as it stands, completely adequate. The words "ex- "hibited for purposes of gain" would exclude acts of wanton cruelty perpetrated on what may be called, in the technical sense, "pet" bears, or monkeys, or other creatures of a wild nature; and in this connexion a suggestion in the Globe of Thursday last seems very well worth attention.

It will perhaps be easier to pass than to enforce Mr. LABOUCHERE'S Bill. The amount of barbarity practised on wild creatures in travelling shows, or stationary menageries, or circuses, and on beasts who are required to "perform," is, no doubt, much exaggerated. The best trainers are the least severe in their methods, partly, no doubt, from self-interest, but partly also because, as a rule, only stupid people are cruel. Lions who have been tormented are not insensible to the pleasures of revenge. "They bear malice "just like Christians," as the groom said of horses, and the consequences are unpleasant to the tormentor. Gentler beasts are still more easy to manage by the kindness and patience through which RAREY succeeded in breaking the most intractable steeds. But amendment of the law is required because these plain truths are not unfrequently neglected. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals may be invited to turn its attention to the Zoological Gardens, and to the conduct of some visitors to that resort. It is a fact, which cannot be too widely known, that some people go to the Gardens with the deliberate purpose of inflicting pain. They poke the animals with pins fastened into the end of sticks. They tempt monkeys to beg, and then put red-hot fuses into the poor creatures' hands. To comment on these barbarities would weaken the effect which must be produced by simply stating them. The keepers no doubt do their best to protect the animals under their care from annoyance. But nevertheless, as we have said, sticks with pins in them and red-hot fuses are introduced and employed by persons whose superabundant energies might more harmlessly and most appropriately be dissipated on the treadmill. At present they cannot be punished, taking possibility in its legal sense. If these things are done in Regent's Park, what may not be done in obscure corners of the country, or even in suburban places of amusement? It is a curious fact that a recent interference of the Legislature on behalf of animals has made the law more ridiculous, if not more monstrous, than it was before. The Vivisection Act, as is well known, prohibits, except under the most stringent conditions, experiments upon live animals for scientific purposes. Not very long ago a prosecution was instituted under that Act at Bow Street. Had the defendants chosen to say that what they did was done, not in the interests of research, but in the way of amusement, they must have been at once discharged. They were men of science, and of course they said nothing of the kind. Indeed, we ought to apologize for supposing such a thing even by way of illustration. But the law which makes such an hypothesis legitimate is an absurd one. It is high time, indeed, that all distinction between animals of a domestic nature and animals of a wild nature, which have as a matter of fact been tamed, should be swept away. There are still animals which, not being specially protected by statute, may be stolen with impunity from their owner, because the common law recognizes no property in them. Mr. LABOUCHERE'S Bill does not of course go beyond the particular sphere of punishing cruelty. More general legislation may perhaps stand over till the day when the whole of English law is codified. Parliament will do well to pass this unpretending little Bill without trying either to enlarge or to restrict it. There are plenty of honest zealots in the House of Commons who are glad to seize every opportunity of attacking and protesting against field sports. But they should reflect that, if they seek to amend the Bill in this direction, they will go far to ensure its failure, and thus miss an object which they in common with the general public desire.

Mr. ANDERSON has again brought in his Bill for the suppression of pigeon-shooting. We wish him every success. His measure, after he had abandoned some clauses which would have affected the sacred rite of stag-hunting, passed the House of Commons last Session by a large majority. It was, however, thrown out in the House of Lords, though, with the exception of Lord REDESDALE, every distinguished peer who took part in the division voted with the Contents. This year its operation is restricted to shooting birds liberated from traps or from the hand. There is no use in mincing words about pigeon-shooting. It is a cruel, unmanly, and degrading pastime. The better class of sportsmen detest it, and are prepared to vote for putting it down. People who live in the neighbourhood of Hurlingham and the Gun Clubs know that it is a nuisance to respectable people as well as a barbarous pursuit. The wounded birds who flutter away to perish miserably in gardens or on housetops are at once a proof of the latter and an illustration of the former. Such is pigeon-shooting at its best. At its worst it will hardly bear describing. The methods by which the pigeons are prevented from sitting, and made to fly in one direction rather than another, are too shocking to mention unnecessarily. These abuses are no doubt punishable under the existing law, for pigeons are domestic animals. But there is no compensating advantage in the so-called sport at which Mr. ANDERSON'S Bill is aimed which excuses its recognition in spite of incidental outrages. The whole thing is abominable. It does not brace the nerves by involving the smallest risk. It does not promote health, like sports which include riding or walking in the open air. These are not, of course, in themselves reasons why the Legislature should interfere with it. If people prefer unhealthy amusements, that is their own affair. We are no believers in the revived doctrine which many Radicals tacitly or openly profess, that the majority ought to prevent the minority from doing anything which the majority considers to be wrong. Pigeon-shooting ought to be prohibited, not because it gives pleasure to the marksmen, but because it gives pain to the pigeons. But, when it is urged that this pain is an evil which ought to be tolerated on account of the social benefits which accrue from it, then the points which we have urged may legitimately be pressed in rejoinder. "If," said an opponent of the Bill last year, referring to Mr. ANDERSON, "if the "honourable member were a blue-rock, would he rather "run the risk of being shot in a fair way or not come into "existence at all?" We leave this conundrum to the acumen of the Irish party, from whom it ought to have come, though it did not. It was the effort of a Scotch imagination, and is a fair sample of the arguments in favour of pigeon-shooting.

FRANCE, ITALY, AND THE VATICAN.

THE POPE has a fresh grievance. The Italian Government, which for many years has freely appropriated or sold property once belonging to the Church, has now attacked the Propaganda. This institution, founded by GREGORY XV. more than two centuries and a half ago, is, as is well known, the centre of the missionary enterprises of the Roman Church. The broad block of buildings which is its seat, and which stands at the southern end of the Piazza di Spagna, is familiar to every visitor to Rome. The annual income of the college, which flows in from every part of the world, is said to amount on the average to some five or six million francs a year. But besides these annual contributions, the extent of which naturally varies with the zeal and the means of the faithful, the Propaganda is possessed of a large amount of real property; and this property, said to be nearly a million and a half sterling in value, has been to a large extent bought with money furnished from abroad. The faithful Catholic has always maintained that the Papacy is an international Power, and that the past action of the Italian Government in treating the Pope as no more than any other Italian Prince is de jure null and void. The present action of the Government does not, therefore, raise any new question of principle. It simply illustrates afresh the principle, which Italian statesmen have long maintained, that Rome and the Roman State are as much Italian ground as Naples or Milan. Acting on a decision of the law courts, the Government is now proceeding to seize the landed property of the Propaganda, and to give the College Consols in exchange. But the conditions of the transfer are such that, what with one new tax or another imposed upon the property, its value in Consols is much less than half of what it was as real estate.

It is not unnatural that a measure of this kind should excite the keen resentment of the Vatican; and it is not unnatural that the most should be made of the fact that the confiscated property should have largely, and perhaps mainly, been due to the liberality of non-Italian Catholics. It is said that the Vatican has made representations on the subject to the French and other Governments; and it is also said, with less probability, that the French Government is inclined to take steps in favour of the Propaganda. It is hard, however, to see on what grounds the action of the Italian Government can be fairly challenged by any foreign Power. Whatever sums of money individuals scattered over the Catholic world may have sent to the Pope are subject, in case of dispute, like sums of money sent to any other individual in the kingdom, to the jurisdiction of the local courts of law. Apart from this general fact, there is a special reason why foreign contributors to the support of the Church in Italy have no claim whatever to be insured against risk. The secularization of monasteries and the sale of ecclesiastical goods have proved over and over again by how uncertain a tenure the Church held its corporate property; and no living donor of ordinary intelligence can have been unaware that his gift might share the fate of many others. By far the largest part of the ecclesiastical property already confiscated by the Italian Government (to say nothing of prior confiscations under the old régime) has been derived, directly or indirectly, from foreign sources. It is absurd to suppose that Italians are likely to show any special tenderness towards those foreigners who support by their gifts what for centuries was the chief, and what is now the only, enemy of Italian unity. It is the more absurd when we remember that for years the Italian Government has offered to the Pope an annual income, which has been steadily declined, of more than three hundred thousand pounds. A Government which guarantees to the Pope a sum like this, which does not hinder him from receiving whatever further gifts his widespread body of adherents may wish to send him, which leaves him in possession of the noblest palace in the world, and which secures to him the free exercise of his spiritual functions, cannot reasonably be charged with abusing its power. It is enough to compare the position of the Clericals under a Liberal Government now with that of the Liberals under a Clerical Government twenty years ago. If one-tenth of what is now freely said and printed against the Government by the Clerical party, from the Pope downwards, had been then said or printed by any Liberal, he would have had summarily to choose between prison and exile. At present, whatever the Pope may say, the Italian Government takes no notice of his utterances, and continues to offer him its money and to confer on him its protection.

The present relations between the Papacy and the Government of France are curious. For several years after the close of the Franco-German War the Vatican had cherished the hope that the temporal power, the fall of which was hastened by the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome in the summer of 1870, might be restored in consequence of a monarchical restoration in France. Even when the events of the autumn of 1873 showed that such a restoration was impossible, the French Government still maintained an attitude friendly to the Vatican and suspicious, if not hostile, to the Government of Italy. For a considerable time a French ship of war was kept at Civita Vecchia, as an advertisement that, if the Pope desired to leave Rome, he could find a welcome and a shelter under the flag of France. There is not the least doubt that the restoration of the Bourbons in the autumn of the year 1873 would have had, as one of its consequences, a religious war between France and Italy. Nor was it till the resignation of Marshal MacMahon that the Clerical party ceased to hope that the question of the temporal power might serve to embroil the two countries. It must be remembered that the interest taken by Frenchmen in this question was by no means confined to zealous Catholics. Multitudes in France who never went inside a church from one year's end to another felt their national vanity flattered by the thought that the Pope had long lived in his own capital under the protection of French bayonets. It is notorious that the expedition to Rome in the year 1849 was due only in part to the desire to win over the Clerical vote. France destroyed the sister Republic mainly because, if she had not done so, Austria would have taken her place. The northern part of the Papal States was already occupied by Austrian troops when the French forces moved on Rome; and in the course of a few weeks, had France remained inactive, the influence which she coveted in the Catholic world as protector of the Church would have passed into other hands. Even now the feelings which prompted the Roman expedition are by no means extinct in France, though the opportunity of satisfying them has long gone by. It is said that the Nuncio in Paris has requested the Government of France to remonstrate with that of Italy on the recent confiscation of the property of the Propaganda, a part of which has been the gift of Frenchmen. It is improbable that M. Ferry's Ministry will do anything of the kind; and it is certain that, if such a remonstrance were made, the French Government would be politely told to mind its own business.

THE NEW BISHOPS.

THE announcement last Wednesday of the appointments to the See of Chester and the new diocese of Southwell will probably be received with very general satisfaction. One at all events is conspicuously suitable, and there is nothing to be said against the other. It is only fair to admit that Mr. Gladstone, whatever may be the strength of his party bias in other matters, has usually shown a creditable disregard for such considerations in his ecclesiastical patronage. Both the new bishops designate are, we believe, Conservatives. Both may, roughly speaking, be called moderate High Churchmen, but with a difference. Dr. Stubbs, if any one, has a right to claim membership in the "Historical High Church Party," for his Churchmanship is moulded on a large and accurate knowledge of English ecclesiastical history and law in which he has few or no living rivals. The long list of works he has composed or edited need not be reprinted here; is it not written in Crockford? To the general public he is of course best known by his Constitutional History of England, and lately by what is acknowledged on all hands, even by those who least approve the practical suggestions of the Commissioners, to be his masterly handling of the historical portion of the Report on Church Courts. But his Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum, his editions of Mosheim's Church History, Wilkins's Concilia, and many other kindred works constitute a most valuable contribution to a subject which is in these days acquiring or rather regaining a high interest and importance. It might indeed from one point of view be regretted, as in the somewhat similar case of the election of Dr. Lightfoot—his predecessor in his canonry at St. Paul's—to the See of Durham, that he should be raised to a position where he must necessarily have much less time for the prosecution of studies for which he has shown so remarkable an aptitude. And it is certainly to be regretted that Dr. Lightfoot's elevation, though he makes an excellent bishop, should not even have left him time to republish in a permanent form the admirable series of papers he wrote shortly before in the Contemporary Review in reply to Supernatural Religion. But Dr. Stubbs is as far as Bishop Lightfoot from being a mere bookworm, and it may be hoped that in the See of Chester, now reduced by the separation of Liverpool to more reasonable dimensions, he may find scope for his practical energies without the necessity of abandoning all literary work. The Bishop of Lincoln has shown, though in a somewhat different department of literature, that the two may quite possibly be combined. Dr. Stubbs is a man who made his mark early, and under serious difficulties, and has always more than held his own in the position he had once acquired. He had hardly taken his degree, graduating in double honours, when he was elected to an open fellowship at Trinity, and he not long afterwards took a Trinity living. Since that time his advance both in reputation and preferment justly earned has been steady and continuous. He will vacate by his elevation to the See of Chester two important posts, a canonry of St. Paul's and the Regius Professorship of Modern History at Oxford, which it falls to the Government to fill up. And recent experience has taught us to look for a high standard of excellence in both. It will soon indeed come to be thought that Canons of St. Paul's hold a high place among the episcopabili, if such a coinage may be allowed, members of the Chapter.

Of Dr. Ridding much less is known to the general public, but what is known is mainly in his favour. It cannot be said that he came quite satisfactorily out of the "tunding" affair at Winchester some years ago, and he certainly did not meet the crisis with the outspoken fearlessness and decision exhibited by the present Dean of Llandaff, when a similar attack was made on an earlier occasion on the monitorial system at Harrow, then under his wise and efficient rule. But Dr. Ridding's administration of the oldest of our public schools has on the whole been a successful one. We are entirely unable indeed to agree with the Times that "men who have succeeded as "schoolmasters have rarely failed as bishops"; and "the "fact that two successive Archbishops of Canterbury "have been men whose qualities were proved in the ad"ministration of great public schools" would in any case be an inadequate, and is for reasons to be stated presently an irrelevant, allegation in evidence of it, for we presume the reference is to Archbishop Longley and Archbishop Tait, as it would be obviously premature to formulate a verdict on a primacy only just begun. The cases have not been rare but frequent in the past—though it would be invidious to name examples here—of schoolmaster prelates whose pastoral staff has borne too visible a resemblance to a ferule not to suggest the incongruous idea of a mitred Busby or Keate; nor are the "qualities proved" in a successful headmastership by any means identical or coextensive with those required for a successful episcopate. "An accu"rate knowledge of the middle voice," for instance, as Sydney Smith long ago pointed out, is not only not the one thing needful—it is not that in either case—but is hardly needful at all in a bishop, though a far from undesirable accomplishment. And there are some qualities useful or necessary in the one office which are, as far as they go, an actual disqualification for the other. To take the example suggested by the Times, the mitis sapientia which marked Dr. Longley's primacy, and which made him through life beloved by all who knew him, was far too mild for the successful control of those unruly members who have always to be reckoned with in a large public school, and who more than once got the upper hand during his brief and somewhat turbulent reign at Harrow. The "qualities" which were found acceptable at Lambeth were precisely those which had not been proved—except in the sense of being proved inefficacious—in his magisterial career. And it would not be difficult, though it would obviously not be proper here, to name more than one meritorious headmaster or ex-headmaster of our own day whom no judicious adviser would recommend to Her MAJESTY for the bench. On the other hand, one very eminent and excellent member of the present episcopate was not altogether successful, though his shortcomings have been often unfairly exaggerated, in his magisterial capacity. But we do not at all mean to imply that a headmaster may not make a very good bishop, or that he may not have exhibited qualities in the one sphere—for instance an organizing capacity—which afford reasonable presumption of success in the other. And we know no cause why the anticipation should not be verified in Dr. RIDDING'S case. It may be added that in the formation of a new diocese constructive and administrative capacity is especially required. Dr. RIDDING is an excellent scholar—he gained a first class, the Craven Scholarship, and the Latin Essay at Oxford—but we are not aware that he possesses anything of that historical and ecclesiastical lore on which Dr. STUBBS has laid so strong a grasp. This, however, will not be specially needed for the consolidation of the new diocese of Southwell. It is not the special forte of the present Primate, also an ex-headmaster, who succeeded admirably in a similar work at Truro. Old Wykehamists will probably feel less anxiety as to the fitness of their chief for the sphere of labour he is about to enter upon than as to the appointment, now lodged for the first time in the hands of a reconstructed governing body, of his successor in the most ancient of the scholastic thrones in England. And even those who are not Wykehamists may be permitted to share the hope that a post so dignified at once and so important will not be less worthily occupied than under the former régime. It says something for the discretion of the superseded Warden and Fellows that their choice of a headmaster should twice running have received what may be called an independent ratification by his promotion to the bench, and that in a day when the old sneer can no longer be repeated, that to have edited a Greek play or been tutor to a nobleman was sufficient qualification for a mitre.

Dr. RIDDING will pass from beneath the shadow of one of the largest and grandest to one of the smallest of English cathedrals; Dr. STUBBS from the newest, as an edifice, to one of the most venerable, though it has only enjoyed its dignity as a cathedral for three centuries, having been before the Reformation a Benedictine Abbey. The Collegiate Church of Southwell, now for the first time to become the cathedra of a bishop, was plundered, like so many others, by that zealous Church reformer, HENRY VIII. L, but MARY restored a part of the stolen property, which it still retains. What means this may provide for the endowment of a Chapter we are unable to say, but it may be hoped that the new Bishop will see his way to securing somehow so desirable, if not essential, an adjunct to his episcopal throne. In the days, still well within living memory, when it was customary to say that "the Church of England was "dying of dignity," those who retailed the familiar sarcasm with a smile or a sigh were thinking especially of bishops and cathedral bodies. But it has long since become impossible for a bishop, and will ere long cease to be possible for a dean, "to "rust out," according to the elegant phrase attributed to Bishop RYLE. And when two or three Chapters have emulated the high standard presented to view at St. Paul's, there will be as little thought of reviving the laissez faire ideal of capitular life as of reproducing the episcopal ideal of the age before Bishop WILBERFORCE, when a bishop was supposed to see nothing except through the "eyes" of his archdeacons, and no more precise definition could be framed of the duties, ocular or other, of archdeacons than that it was their business "to discharge archidiaconal functions." The most perfect sovereign cannot rule aright without the aid of competent counsellors and representatives, and an increased and reawakened episcopate connotes, so to speak, a corresponding revival of cathedral life, the cathedral being so termed simply because it is the church where the bishop's chair is fixed. Not much has yet been achieved in this way at Liverpool, but something is already being done at Truro, and we may hope that something will ere long be done both at Southwell and St. Albans. Meanwhile there is a certain fitness in the first occupant of the See carved out of the previous diocese of Lincoln being, like Bishop WORDSWORTH, a Wykehamist. And there is a still more obvious fitness in the honoured, if somewhat archaic, representative of the solid theological learning of the Oxford of a past generation handing over the burden which increasing years had rendered too heavy for him to a successor, with whose theology he would have much in common, and whose learning is in some respects deeper, and for present needs more directly available, than his own. The name of Dr. STUBBS is one with which our readers have long been familiar, and which they have always been accustomed to see mentioned in these columns with the respect due to his unique literary services in a field he has made peculiarly his own. Henceforth they will look to him also for services, if not of a higher, of a more directly practical kind, and we shall hardly incur the charge of indiscreet prediction, if we venture to assure them that the expectation is not likely to be disappointed.

THE CARNIVAL IN ITALY.

THE first sight of an Italian Carnival is generally disappointing to all but the very young. In many of the larger towns all that the stranger sees of the celebrated festival are a few groups of shabby maskers, whose purpose is evidently profit rather than pleasure, and who endeavour to extract soldi from the pockets of the simple foreigner by the repetition of obsolete jokes and mechanical antics. In Rome and Naples, it is true, the processions are occasionally even more splendid than they used to be. Both cities depend to a large extent on their English, American, and Russian visitors. An unusual influx of these is what a remarkable vintage or olive harvest is to a country district; their rarity is dearth, their absence famine. As with the grape and olive, too, their quality is of greater importance than their quantity, and the innkeepers declare that the former has deteriorated of late. This is chiefly due to the increased ease of travelling. Formerly a journey to Italy was the great event in the lives of many men. It was the conclusion of a young noble's education, the cherished purpose for which poor scholars hoarded their scanty savings. And Rome was the place in which both were anxious to appear at their best. Did not the good, frugal wife of Herder insist that her husband ought to procure a violet silk coat—at Dalberg's expense, of course—in order that he might represent the Protestant Church of Weimar with fitting dignity in the city of the Popes? It may well be believed that whole batches of Gazo's tourists do not leave so much money behind them as one of the old "Milordi" who used to take princely apartments for the winter and surround themselves with large retinues. But, besides this, the Romans had a special cause of complaint. After the fall of the temporal power of the Popes, the splendour of the great religious functions of the Holy Week was overclouded. Believers who had no special business at the Papal Court shrank from visiting the scene of what they considered a great desecration; while one of its chief attractions for the mere sightseer was removed. Under these circumstances, great efforts were made to increase the glory of the Carnival; large sums of money were subscribed, and to take a conspicuous part in it was considered a sign of attachment to the new dynasty. Naples, the shrewd and somewhat envious rival of Rome for the affections of the moneyed foreigner, soon followed the example of the capital. Ever since the system of short Italian tours began, the innkeepers of each city have been able to assure their guests that a dreadful fever is ravaging the other. They are subtle and persuasive reasoners, and possess a medical and geological knowledge which it is rather surprising to find in a class which is not usually numbered among the learned professions. But like other great authorities they are unfortunately apt to disagree. While the Neapolitans have excellent grounds for asserting that an eruption of Vesuvius may take place at any moment and cannot possibly be delayed beyond a certain number of weeks, the Romans can prove by equally weighty arguments that, under the well-known and carefully ascertained conditions of the time, such an event is clearly impossible. Scientific differences of this kind frequently lead to social emulation, as we know by the sad fate of Heine's hero who was obliged to fight a duel to establish the fundamental doctrine of all theology. So as soon as Rome had a successful Carnival, it was clear that Naples must have one too; since then her efforts have been great, though somewhat spasmodic, and once at least the Southern city bore away the palm. The procession that moved through her streets during Victor Emmanuel's visit was probably the most magnificent that ever graced such a festival.

Though the most striking feature of the Roman Carnival, the race of the wild unridden horses from one end of the town to the other, has been abolished in consequence of an accident that happened a few years ago, the traveller who desires nothing but a spectacle will therefore find enough to satisfy him in either of the cities we have mentioned, if the weather be fine and the year favourable. Both on the Corso and the Toledo he may see masks as quaint and groups as varied as those that Goethe figured and described; the flowers and the sugar-plums fall as thickly as ever, and the plaster pellets sting as sharply as heretofore; and yet to many of us something seems wanting which the old poets and novelists taught us to expect. It is not merely that the glamour of romance is gone, that no queenly form beckons to the moody stranger, that no Fifish dwarf thrusts a love-letter into his hand; nor is it that we are old and lonely, and therefore find the bright scene wearisome, as Goethe told Crabb Robinson he himself had done. It is in the Italian groups that we look for something that is not there. Their costumes are far more costly than we had imagined they would be; but where is the thoughtless and innocent mirth, where are the wild outbursts of perfectly harmless fun? The form of the Carnival is with us still, has the spirit flown for ever? The only persons in whom it still seems to live are the youths and maidens of England and America, who pelt and chase each other wildly for an hour or two, and then go home to write rapturous letters to distant friends about the light-heartedness of the Italians. Why is this? Many explanations have been given; some say the people are ground down with taxes till all the old merriment is crushed out of them, and others that they were formerly children, but that politics have made men of them, and they have cast away childish things. Others again argue that the sight of foreign luxury has robbed them of their old capacity to enjoy simple mirth and inexpensive fun. You are so wearied and dispirited that you scarcely care; you get out of the crowd as quickly as you can, and wend your way to the "Wapping of Rome," where you know a little tavern in which a sound old wine may be had. There you cast aside your domino and mask. At the other end of the high damp vaulted room, or rather cellar, a number of respectable shopkeepers are seated round an oil lamp. They are celebrating their Carnival with an extra fiasco or two of the right sort. You will follow their example, only you do not want the light; it is pleasant to sit in darkness and moralize on the dreariness of all official holidays. You have hardly drunk your second glass, however, when a sound of suppressed tittering is heard at the door, and an old woman enters in her everyday costume followed by a bevy of masked girls. Their dresses have evidently been patched together out of old odds and ends, but they have the true old Roman grace and bearing, and you can see at a glance that the true spirit of the carnival is alive in every pulse. They can hardly restrain their laughter while their venerable leader demands the best and oldest wine, and they turn to drink it so that no one may recognize them when they lift the dark veil which hangs from their half masks and hides the lower part of their face. When they have finished, the old lady advances to the table and says to one of those who are seated there:—"Sir, I have the honour to inform you that you have been selected to pay for our wine. And, oh!" she adds, in a very audible whisper, "if you only knew who drank it, you would consider this the happiest day in all your life." A shout of laughter arises, and everybody wants to know the secret name. After a long apparent hesitation, during which all the girls have escaped, the crone reveals the Christian name of somebody whom the victim is supposed to affect, or, failing this, she boldly cites one of the greatest and most beautiful ladies in the noble families of Rome. It is characteristic of the Italians that this joke is never played off upon a stranger or a poor man, unless a priest happen to be seated among the rest, when he is selected as a matter of course; but in that case it is understood that the whole company pays the very inconsiderable tax.

But, if you have any of the electricity of the time about you, you have not waited to watch this scene, but have put on your cloak and mask and quickly followed the girls. If you find them laughingly crouching in some byway, do not seem to notice them, but keep them carefully in sight. After indulging in a good many jests, they will probably pass through a low archway, and, when you attempt to follow them, a porter will demand your ticket or your name. You answer, you are a poor brother of the Carnival—too poor, in fact, to possess either. In that case, he will tell you there is dancing in such or such a place, to which you will doubtless be welcome, but this is a private society. In the meantime, two or three of the young men who manage the affair will probably have made their appearance. You single out the most forbidding of them, and, turning to him, you say:—"Sir, I have a secret to impart; if you knew it, I think you would sympathize with me." He steps forward; and you continue, in a whisper as audible as you can make it:—"Pity me: I have fallen in love with a lady whose name and address I have no means of finding out, but who has just entered this gate. I only wish to speak to her for a moment. You would not like to be obliged to step over my corpse on leaving your ball—at least I think you would not." "But what kind of a lady is it?" he will probably ask, suspiciously. "An unmasked lady, who entered with a number of masked attendants a few minutes ago"; and here you must describe the duenna as graphically and satirically as you can, always adding when you have dwelt on her game eye, her hunchback, or her wry leg, that there is an indescribable charm in this which has captivated your heart. Some such jest is almost sure to secure your admission to any popular Carnival dance that is worth the visiting, at least in Rome. But you must keep up your part for the evening, and be prodigal and extravagant in your admiration of your partner, who will in all probability play the prude, the coy, the tender, and the offended maiden, by turns, with no inconsiderable skill. When you enter all the male part of the company will crowd round you with their glasses, and you must take a sip from each—not to do so would be an offence—then you must order wine and offer your own full glass to each in turn. That is the only expense you need incur; but it may be well to slip out in an hour or two and purchase as many sweetmeats as you can carry. The landlord will lend you a tray, and you and the lady of your adoration may carry them round and request the other ladies to partake of them in honour of your betrothal. A bottle or two of wine at the same time for the male part of the assembly would not be out of place; but, above all things, take care not to be ostentatious.

What renders such evenings possible is the extraordinary tact of the lower-class Italians. The old woman with whom you have carried on your mock flirtation may perhaps unexpectedly turn out to be your own washerwoman, but she will never refer to the subject unless you do so, nor will any of the merry company bow to you in the street unless you encourage them. But to continue the description. The ball-room is probably large and high, but it is furnished only with chairs hired for the occasion from some neighbouring church; the music is somewhat worse than middling, but the fun grows heartier and the dancing wilder from hour to hour. If you wish to take part in the latter, you must ask the dame of your choice to stand up with you. After she has hobbled a few paces and returned to her seat, girl after girl will ask her permission to dance with you, and you too are free to choose what partner you will. At last the moment for unmasking comes, and now you may admire not only the stately forms and graceful movements, but the dark, passionate, unfathomable eyes. Take care, however, not to look too deeply into any single pair of them; the youths around you, for all their soft manners and careless gaiety, have sharp knives in their pockets, and there are many dark corners between here and your lodgings.

TRAGICOMŒDIA POLITICA.

THE "comparatively very limited" throats (see Mr. Gladstone on Monday night) of the garrison of Sinkat have been duly cut, and the House of Lords has been informed that it "may be the worse" (see Daily News of Wednesday) for having dared to remonstrate with this method of educating Egyptians in the blessings of constitutional government. Some one has said (or if he has not we make him a present of the remark) that there would be no such roaring joke as politics if the thing were not so serious, and that the student of matters political would break his heart over their seriousness if it were not that politics afford such endless amusement. At the present moment there appear to be three distinct defences of the person whom they rudely call in Berlin "the author of the Soudan massacres." The first is that it was impossible to relieve Sinkat; it being perfectly well known to every expert that even after the 4th of January, when Lord Granville assumed absolute command over Egyptian policy in the Soudan and elsewhere, the garrison of Aden and Sir William Hewett between them could, without a man from Suez or from Bombay, have relieved Sinkat three times over. The second is that it was necessary that the comparatively limited extent of jugular should suffer in order that the absolute consistency of cowardice on the part of the Government should remain intact; on which it is unnecessary to make further comment. The third recalls exactly the argument of Caiaphas on a celebrated occasion. It was, it seems, expedient that the garrisons of Sinkat and Tokkar should perish in order that General Gordon might relieve Khartoum and the garrisons of Darfur, Bahr-el-Gazal, and the equatorial provinces sans coup férir. Here, also, it is not necessary to add a word. Those who are of the opinion of Caiaphas are fully entitled to the benefit of his highly respectable authority. They may even have overlooked this important leading case; and, if it be so, they are most welcome to it. We shall not discourse further of them from this point of view.

The garrison of Sinkat, two days' march from English territory—that is to say, the sea—have died fighting, and perhaps it is not good to dwell too much on their fate. They will add a contingent to the goodly army of shadows which, as has been before now pointed out, is ready to play a part in a new version of the last act of Richard III. Here in England we are quite helpless. A person of the name of Thomasson, who appears in Dod as a member of Parliament, and whose name has sometimes been seen in division-lists as an advocate of refusing grants to the Royal Family, of establishing atheism as the religion of Parliament, &c., is reported by the newspapers to have said that he is unable to see why we should go and kill one set of people in order to prevent their killing another set. It would be interesting to know whether, if Bill Sikes were in his house, Mr. Thomasson's views on the duty of the police would be wholly consistent with this remarkable utterance. But we are perhaps letting the tragedy, though it is certainly not without an obvious comic touch here, have the ground too much to itself. The present purpose is rather to survey the proceedings of the persons and the party who are responsible for the late massacres from a less serious point of view. "There is a superabundance of blood in the picture," as a certain critic remarked, perhaps rather wisecrely than wisely, of Campbell's "Lochiel," and it wants relieving. There is no lack of relief. In the first place, there is the Radical attempt, surely a pyramidal farce in itself, to play the old game of 1879. The poor old horses are trotted or stumbled out of their poor old stables. Once again we hear of the blatant clubman, of the wicked London press, of the carpet Jingoes who sit at home at ease and call for spirited policies. Surely this is a little reactionary on the part of the party of progress. Surely they might have hit upon something a little—only a very little—newer. Even their own prophet Lord Granville might have taught them a salutary lesson with his plaintive appeal to the doctrine of probabilities and his expostulation with those who, contrary to that doctrine, declare that the Ministry is always wrong. The very clubman, poor creature, who is alternately and consistently reproached with his bloodthirsty desire to gain "steps" in Egypt, and his cowardly determination to stay at home and send somebody else, cannot, according to Lord Granville, be always wrong. Even the ignorant metropolis, despite its notorious inferiority in intellectual and moral qualities to Kennaquhair and Llanpumpsaint, must, on the same authority, sometimes be right. And then, too, the facts happen to be dreadfully unmanageable. It is not the metropolis alone by any means that entertains a mild objection to the butchering of the allies and virtual wards of England within a few cannon-shots of Admiral Hewett's long-range guns. The immaculate provinces, despite the fact that their newspapers are, as a rule, much more under the immediate command of party influences than those of the capital, have been by no means behindhand with expressions of disgust at the sanguinary silliness of the Ministry. The calls for a firmer policy in Egypt come from the very quarters which four years ago furnished the forces wherewith to fight the wicked clubman and the luxurious Londoner. Our good friends of the party of scuttling and slaughter should have stuck to "great is Diana of the Ephesians." There is apparently some conjuring still to be done with that. The provinces might be conciliated by the suggestion that if Mr. Gladstone exactly reverses his policy he will still be the best man obtainable. But it is a bad way to conciliate them by calling names at those who express the very opinions which they express themselves.

But the attitude of the few partisans who have not feared to throw everything but party allegiance to the winds, and to defend the most cowardly blundering that any English statesmen have ever been guilty of, is less amusing than the behaviour of some of their leaders. The House of Commons at question time on Monday and Tuesday was for a cynic pure and simple the finest, happiest hunting-ground possible. The echo of Lord Hartington's celebrated announcement last week in two breaths that General Gordon is not in the service of the Khedive, and that General Gordon is Governor-General, by the Khedive's appointment, of the Soudan, dies away in the distance, and the fuller symphonies in prevarication and subterfuge which Mr. Gladstone and Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice executed on these two days fill the enraptured ear. Now it was Lord Edmond requiring notice of a question about already-printed telegrams and disclaiming cognizance of notorious communications. Now it was Mr. Gladstone remarking that the distance from the English army in Egypt to Sinkat is "a matter for debate and discussion." Then the Prime Minister continued with the comparatively very limited extent of the garrisons of Sinkat and Tokkar—certainly the extent of the garrison of Sinkat is now very limited indeed. By the grace of Mr. Gladstone, it is limited to four sick men. These things led up by a gradual crescendo to the magnificent Bunsbyism in which Mr. Gladstone announced that "the instructions and the actions of Her Majesty's Government would be conformable to their views and intentions." After this, even the coda that "no part of the case [especially the throats of the garrison of Sinkat] will be found to have been neglected" might have seemed merely a dying fall. But Mr. Gladstone had not done. He said in reply to Mr. Forster (who apparently cannot forget out of office that he was a humanitarian in it, while Mr. Gladstone is a remarkable example of a successful forgetfulness in the opposite conditions) that "a comment [he was not asked for a comment, but an answer] might probably lead to expectations beyond what he contemplated." Next day Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice outdid even his chief in the execution of a difficult movement. He promised to make an inquiry "immediately," and then he defined immediately as "in whatever way I consider best." One ought perhaps to be rather grateful to Lord Edmond for this last striking word. The definition of "immediate" by "in whatever way I consider best" is characteristic of Mr. Gladstone, and his young friend showed his fitness for a position in the Government by using it. Only it would be a great mistake to limit the phrase to this particular use. The right time to do a thing is the time that Mr. Gladstone and those about him consider best, and the time that they have considered best must have been the right time. They considered it the best way to let the garrison of Sinkat be massacred, and there is no more to be said on that point. They consider it (not without considerable pressure from without) the best way not to let the garrison of Tokkar be massacred, and that will be right too. They could not insist in the case of Hicks Pasha's expedition, because that would be to assume responsibility; but they did insist in the case of Baker Pasha's expedition, and yet that did not impose any responsibility upon them. Their actions and instructions will be conformable to their views and intentions; and, as their views and intentions are ex hypothesi infallible and impeccable, their actions and instructions must be ditto, ditto. This kind of verbal wriggling is called by their henchmen "high argument" ("high old argument" would be a slight addition and a considerable improvement). The garrison of Sinkat was such a little one! The improvements introduced by Mr. Clifford Lloyd in the Egyptian administration were so remarkable! It would be such a pity to spoil the symmetry of General Gordon's plan by drawing swords and charging muskets! High arguments indeed!

The political Democritus has quite the best of it on this occasion, and it is with very great regret that we acknowledge our own inability entirely to rise or sink to the level of his situation. It is very weak, no doubt, very childish, very un-nineteenth-century. We ought to do nothing but avail ourselves of the abundant pasture for the humourist which is presented by the spectacle of the honour of a great nation and the duties of common humanity dragged in the dirt to the accompaniment of Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice's definitions of "immediately," of Mr. Gladstone's emulations of Captain Cuttle's great oracle, and of the admiring applause of Radical newspapers. But in order to do nothing but this a man must forget that he is an Englishman; and then Englishmen who forget that they are Englishmen do not perceive the joke. So here is the eternal incompatibility. Si M. Schnadhorst savait—what a figure his chiefs are cutting; si nous pouvions—laugh at the figure which they make Englishmen cut! But Mr. Schnadhorst will still be Mr. Schnadhorst and keep his Schnadhorstian mind; and we for our part do not greatly envy him. The tragedy somewhat spoils the enjoyment of the comedy, but it is a tragi-comedy still.

THE NEW MARTINI-ENFIELD RIFLE.

THERE seems to be some difference of opinion as to the merits of the new 40-inch bore rifle lately reissued from the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, for trial and report. The arm as it now stands differs in some minor details from that issued experimentally in 1882, but the differences are of the nature of improvements which occur during the making of any new machine, and need not be noticed here. It is of more importance to consider in what respect, if in any, the new rifle is likely to prove a better infantry arm than the present service Martini-Henry rifle. The breech-loading action—namely, that invented by Martini on the falling block system—is the same in both rifles. It will be convenient in this notice to speak of the present service rifle as the Martini-Henry, and of the new experimental rifle as the Martini-Enfield.

The improvements claimed for the Martini-Enfield consist mainly of a new pattern fore-end, of several additional appliances which could, if desired, be fitted to any rifle, and of a very considerable reduction in the diameter of the bore and in the weight of the bullet.

The fore-end, it should be explained, is that part of the stock which is in front of the breech. In the Martini-Henry rifle a groove runs along the upper part of the fore-end, and forms a bed for the barrel. Held together by steel bands, the barrel and fore-end form the shaft of a pike sufficiently light and strong, whose point is the fixed bayonet. It is stated at Enfield that water finds its way to, and lodges in, the barrel-groove of the fore-end; that in this way many barrels get injured through rust, and in time become unserviceable. In order to obviate this liability to damage, the barrel of the Martini-Enfield is made to rest upon the fore-end instead of lying in it—that is, the exterior of the barrel is exposed to view both above and below—so that there ought to be no difficulty in keeping every part of it perfectly clean and free from rust. Time and a certain amount of wear and tear will be required to show whether the change is a good one. The necessity for any change in this respect would have been more clear had it been stated by the authorities at Enfield what proportion of barrels become unserviceable through the setting up of rust between the barrel and the present fore-end.

The Martini-Enfield is fitted with an improved pattern back-sight. The leaf, instead of being graduated for every hundred yards only (as in the Martini-Henry), is marked for every half and quarter hundred between 500 and 1,500 yards. There is also a sliding wind-gauge—the device of the Armourer Sergeant at Hythe—attached to the back-sight. These additions will doubtless be of great use in enabling the soldier to correct his elevation and allowance for wind. As at distances over 1,500 yards a man cannot (if the butt is in his shoulder) raise his eye sufficiently above the breech to get the required elevation, the Martini-Enfield is provided with a long-range sight, consisting of a fixed back-sight (on the left side of the rifle) and a long-range front-sight graduated from 1,000 to 2,000 yards. When in use, the long-range front-sight hangs down from the left side of the upper band. Thus elevation is obtained, not by depressing the breech below the line of aim, but by raising the muzzle above, and of course slightly to one side of, that line. When not required for immediate use, the long-range front-sight can, as a sailor would say, be stowed along the barrel and fore-end; when not required at all, it can be unshipped and stowed away in the pouch. It may be noticed that, in aiming at extreme ranges with the long-range sight, few men will be able to rest the cheek or chin on the butt of their rifle; the difficulty of aiming and holding steadily will be thereby increased at least twofold. This drawback might be got rid of by placing a pad between the cheek and the butt. In the Martini action the very act of loading places the rifle, so to speak, at "full cock."

To the breech action of the Martini-Enfield a safety bolt has been added. When the bolt is pressed back, the trigger does not act, and the action is thus kept, as it were, at "half cock." In order to make the rifle ready for firing, the bolt must be pressed forward. When it is intended to fire the rifle immediately after loading, there is, of course, no occasion to use the safety bolt. Thus in the Martini-Enfield action there are two methods of bringing the rifle to "full cock." Men used to guns will most likely consider there is some danger attending the formation of a double habit in the matter of cocking a gun. But the safety bolt, like the new pattern back-sight and the long-range sight, is undergoing trial. It is not improbable that the general verdict will be adverse to the safety bolt, decidedly in favour of the new pattern back-sight and sliding wind-gauge, and pretty evenly divided about the long-range sight.

The Martini-Enfield is chiefly remarkable for the reduction in the size of the bore and in the weight of the bullet. The bore of the Martini-Henry rifle is 0·45 inch in diameter, and is rifled on the Henry system. The bore of the Martini-Enfield is 0·40 inch in diameter, and is rifled with a ratchet rifling, the grooves being either seven or nine in number, and the twist one turn in 15 inches. The weight of the Martini-Henry bullet is 480 grains, that of the Martini-Enfield 384, the powder charge of 85 grains being the same for both. The effect of this reduction of about one-fifth of the bore-space and of exactly one-fifth in the weight of the bullet is to raise the starting or muzzle velocity, as it is called, from 1,315 to 1,570 feet per second.

The importance of the difference of these rates is apparent if we extend the comparison to the rifles of other countries. As regards muzzle velocity, the French, Austrian, Russian, and German rifles are all superior to the Martini-Henry, and all inferior to the Martini-Enfield. It is noticeable that the muzzle velocity of the French Gras, which is the lowest of the four alluded to, is higher by 100 feet per second than the muzzle velocity of the Martini-Henry; whereas the muzzle velocity of the German Mauser, which is the highest of the four, is lower—also by 100 feet a second—than the muzzle velocity of the Martini-Enfield. In all probability, the raison d'être of the experimental bore is due to the growing conviction that the English bullet ought to leave the muzzle at least as quickly as the bullet of any other infantry in Europe.

In order to take full advantage of superior muzzle velocity, it is absolutely essential that the bullet, when set in motion, should have in itself the greatest possible power of maintaining velocity throughout its flight. This power depends on the relation—conveniently termed sectional density—which exists between the weight of the bullet and its diameter. In this respect the Martini-Henry bullet is superior to those of all the Continental rifles, but inferior to the new ·40-inch bullet used with the Martini-Enfield. The new bullet has, in fact, a greater driving power in proportion to the surface directly opposed to the resistance of the air. From the combination of a vastly superior muzzle velocity with a most favourable sectional density, it follows, as a matter of course, that the new bullet—provided it has a rotation sufficient to ensure perfect stability—has a greater velocity, and consequently a flatter trajectory, throughout its entire flight than any other known infantry rifle. Stability of the bullet is ensured, and air-boring power still further augmented, by the increased rotation due to the higher muzzle velocity and the quicker twist of rifling. The Martini-Henry and Martini-Enfield bullets leave the barrel making respectively 720 and 1,250 revolutions per second.

What does not follow as a matter of course is that, when the bore is reduced, the accuracy of shooting should remain unimpaired. Hitherto experience has shown that the quicker the twist and the smaller the bore, the greater the risk of unmanageable fouling; and, if the fouling becomes excessive, the muzzle velocity will vary and the shooting will be uneven. But Enfield—if responsible for the cartridge as well as for the rifle—has been equal to the occasion. The modifications in the cartridge consequent upon the reduction of the bore appear to be perfectly successful. To begin with, a solid-drawn cartridge case is for several reasons a great improvement. The freedom from fouling—due probably to an improved wad—is most marked. The amount of recoil is very much the same as with the Martini-Henry—that is to say, if the rifle be held properly, it is insignificant. The accuracy of the Martini-Enfield at 1,000 yards is equal to the accuracy of the Martini-Henry at 500 yards. Beyond 1,000 yards no strict comparison appears to have been made. It would be interesting to the country at large, as well as to those more nearly concerned, if the accuracy figure of merit of both rifles could be taken at 1,500 and 2,000 yards with the same exactness as it has been taken at 500 and 1,000 yards. Perhaps the experimental range at Enfield does not admit of this; and in any case a horizontal area, say a tide-washed sand, would probably afford the most convenient target for determining how closely the shots will group at extreme ranges. The Martini-Henry, in spite of its comparatively low muzzle velocity, and in virtue of its good sectional density, more than holds its own when compared with any of the foreign rifles for long range and accuracy. It would, therefore, be most satisfactory if the comparison between the two Martinis were made as complete as possible. The inference to be drawn would be direct and valuable. It is probable that the new bullet, which is comparatively light and long, would of the two be more affected by a side wind. This, as bearing on the possibility of any further reduction of bore, seems to be a most important point. At all events, the trials to be thoroughly instructive should be carried on in boisterous as well as in still weather.

When it has been shown what can be done in this climate with a limited number of specially-made rounds, it will still remain to be seen what results can be obtained with ammunition which, having been made in bulk and carried for a time in the men's pouches, is afterwards expended in continuous firing under an Indian sun. If under these conditions there is no appreciable diminution in the accuracy of shooting, the Martini-Enfield must in the fundamental matters of barrel and ammunition, and in the adaptation of each to the other, be pronounced a far more powerful rifle than the Martini-Henry.

On the other hand, the Martini-Enfield is heavier than the Martini-Henry. The weight of the stock and the exterior form of the barrel are the same in both, but the greater thickness of barrel in the case of the smaller bore causes a difference of six ounces in weight between the two patterns. It is urged at Enfield that, since the Martini-Enfield ammunition is round for round lighter than the present Martini-Henry ammunition, the weight of the new rifle and seventy rounds is not greater than that of the Martini-Henry with a like number of rounds. It must be recollected, however, that, while a soldier can never part with his rifle, more or less of his ammunition can on occasion be carried for him. That the outside of the new barrel is of the same dimensions as that of the Martini-Henry is probably due to economical reasons. Alterations in the shape and dimensions of a machine-made barrel would entail a corresponding change in the factory plant. Perhaps, too, the extra thickness of metal is conducive to good shooting. But on this head it may be said that there ought to be no room for surmise. It should in fact be positively determined by sheer experiment whether the new Martini-Enfield barrel cannot without any serious loss of accuracy in shooting be made as light, or even lighter, than the barrel of the service Martini-Henry.

A contrivance called a "quick-loader" has been issued for simultaneous trial with the Martini-Enfield. It could be used, if desired, with any rifle; its efficiency does not affect the intrinsic merit of the rifle; still a short notice of it may not be out of place. The object of the "quick-loader," as the name implies, is to facilitate rapidity of loading. It is a case made of metal; and in shape and appearance is somewhat like a small pouch. When not required for use it can be slung from the waistbelt. When in use it is attached to the right side of the rifle, close to the breech-action. It contains six cartridges, which by means of a spring are forced up one after the other in a very ready manner to the loader's hand.

The most that can be said for it is that, after it has been filled and fixed to the rifle, a nimble man may fire the six rounds about four or five seconds quicker than he could when loading in the ordinary manner from the pouch. It is possible that some pattern of "quick-loader" may be introduced into the service, but no contrivance which involves the handling of the cartridge between each round can be compared for rapidity with a self-loading, or, as it is called, a magazine rifle.

By a magazine rifle is meant a rifle that contains within itself—presumably in the butt—a magazine or reservoir (holding a limited number of cartridges), combined with a mechanical action which, by trigger pressure only—or at all events with the aid of one other motion—performs all the functions of loading; so that, the magazine being filled beforehand, the firer can repeat his shots almost as quickly as he can aim and fire. In the hands of well-trained troops the odds in favour of a magazine rifle as against the ordinary breech-loader would, ceteris paribus, be very like the odds in favour of an ordinary breech-loader as against the old muzzle-loader. At present there does not appear to be any satisfactory pattern of a magazine rifle; but it is notorious that, so soon as some ingenious inventor can design a thoroughly efficient magazine action, one, at least, of the great European Powers is ready to adopt the system. This means, of course, that every other Power who can afford to follow the example set, or who cannot afford not to do so, will sooner or later re-arm their infantry in a similar manner.

Whether after further experiment, including trial of the wear and tear sort, it would be worth while to substitute the Martini-Enfield for the Martini-Henry as a general infantry arm, is a question which probably depends on the condition of the service rifles now in use, on the number of these not yet issued, and on some other considerations. It might be good economy to reserve the present stock of Martini-Henry rifles for issue to the Volunteers in exchange for the Snider. It may be imperative—no one can say how soon—for us to adopt a rifle of the magazine type; but in any case, if we have to re-arm the infantry of the line, the arm should surely in every respect be the very best we can make.

Opinions may vary as to the exact requirements of an infantry rifle. With regard to rapidity of fire it can of course be argued, as it was on the introduction of breech-loaders, that a magazine system will lead to much reckless expenditure of ammunition; but ammunition is meant to be expended, of course under proper control. Again, with regard to accuracy, in a letter to the Times (27th December last) an authority no less than General Boxer contended in so many words that because our soldiers have not sufficient skill to do full justice to the rifle they have, it would be unwise to give them one that shoots better. It may be true that in any infantry battalion there are not half a dozen men who can get the most out of the Martini-Henry; but the bulk of our soldiers can use their rifle with more or less effect; and the question is not, in fact, whether the skill of our men is up to the power of the rifle, but whether, on the whole, a better-shooting rifle will increase the chances of hitting. On this point all arguments must give way before the practical reason that we are obliged, as before hinted, to keep pace with our neighbours. If we are a little in front of them, so much the better.

In the hands of young troops—however well trained, but unused to war—it must be expected that the worth of a superior weapon must now and then be cancelled in the flurry and excitement of the first onset. But for English infantry, steadied down to their work, the best rifle must—weight and other things being equal—always be that which combines, when wanted, the greatest rapidity of fire with the greatest hitting power at all ranges. At the same time, it is well to be reminded that the best rifle in the world is of little use unless it be backed up, not only by sufficient skill in rifle-shooting, but also by sound training in the proper application of rifle-fire. In this latter respect we are perhaps somewhat behind our nearer neighbours.

LISBON

To write with any enthusiasm about a place which Fielding described as "the nastiest city in the world," and where Childe Harold found that might seem, at first sight, to require considerable courage or even audacity. But it must be remembered that "the father of the English novel" composed his Voyage to Lisbon some hundred and thirty years ago, and, which is more important, before the occurrence of the terrible earthquake which, destroying a great part of Lisbon, shook the hearts of all Europe. Fielding's death at Lisbon on the eve of that catastrophe saved him from the coming horror, but it also prevented him from seeing the rapid regeneration of the city which followed. As for "the Childe," he was in that unwholesome state of mind which leads the unreformed but blasé debauchee to flee from his fellow-creatures and all their works to recruit himself by the contact with silent nature. Had he visited Lisbon somewhat later in his course of travel he might very well have dealt more gently with its defects, or even have discovered beauty in the city, as he could not help doing in its surroundings.

> Hut and palace show like filthily,
> The dingy denizens are reared in dirt,

Anyhow, the traveller of the present day who visits Lisbon with Byron's description in his thoughts will be agreeably disappointed. It is a city with much to recommend it to the tourist, who will often like it better after a fortnight's sojourn than in the first glow of novelty. It is a city of contrasts, and therefore pleasing to various tastes. Old and new, crooked and regular, hill and level, garden and street, are in close juxtaposition. For those who love uniformity and geometrical plan there is the new and handsome central quarter on the ground where the earthquake played its fiercest havoc; for the antiquarian there is the rambling and tortuous Alfama district in the east, with the castle and cathedral, and Belem in the west; while he who would find the country in the town has only to mount a little way, to roam along the streets of upper Lisbon, over the seven hills which look down on Tagus flowing seaward. There is dirt in the more squalid parts of the city as there is in every capital; but certainly in these days, whatever may have been the case in the past, it does not soil the fair town promiscuously or make the tourist eager to flee from its highways and its quays to the open country. The extreme beauty of the surroundings of Lisbon affords a more than sufficient explanation of any neglect of the city itself. Lisbon is almost crushed by its proximity to scenery such as Cintra can show. Those who care not for a capital that does not possess celebrated pictures, museums, and art treasures generally, must go elsewhere than to Lisbon, for Lisbon belongs to that class of cities which are in themselves pictures, and so situated that they can be seen in panoramas; and it so happens that few of such cities have any wealth of art collections to show. To this class belong, among European capitals, besides Lisbon, Constantinople—with which city Lisbon has often been compared as regards situation—and to some extent the gem of the Baltic, Stockholm. Were the comparison with the former to hold good in other respects nowadays, the abusive utterances of Fielding and Byron would not seem obsolete, but might stand unchallenged.

Of the English travellers who visit Lisbon almost all approach it by water, and there is no doubt that this is the most impressive introduction to the beauty of the city and its neighbourhood. Nor does it involve any sacrifice, for the time taken in the sea passage is practically no more than that occupied by the overland journey from England; and, as a set-off to the possible miseries of "the Bay" and the worry of the quarantine inspection off Belem in the Tagus, the railway traveller will have to endure long and dusty drives in the slow trains of the Peninsula. Most of those, however, who do thus come to Lisbon only spend a few hours there on their way to South America or some island of the Atlantic, and have no time to explore the city thoroughly during their flying visit.

Still, a day of ten hours or so in Lisbon is a day well spent, and introduces the stranger to much that is novel to his eyes. He finds himself in a city which only misses being on the margin of the vast Atlantic by some seven miles of river, while the river itself in front of Lisbon widens to six or seven miles, forming a deep and spacious lake, in which all the monster vessels of the world can lie at anchor. From the quays he may often behold many an English man-of-war, along with vessels that wear the flags of all the countries of the world. He will have the Tagus with him wherever he roams, whether along the river frontage or on the higher ground of upper and suburban Lisbon, with Almada across the water on the south standing high against the sky. He will see the waggons, with their yoked pairs of patient bullocks and their solid wooden wheels, creaking and groaning in all their primitive springlessness, as though fresh come from some old Mantuan farm where Virgil had stepped aside to let them pass. Many a foot-passenger will brush by him in the graceful short jacket and turban hat common also in Spain; while the ladies of fashion will pass him dressed in Parisian style, but often carrying the large fan as parasol, and he will very likely wish that they still wore the mantilla, which would make a far more suitable setting for their dark brunette features. The negro and the mulatto he will often see, the African stock which has crossed back from Brazil, descendants of the Moor, Madeirans, and generally a great mixture of facial types everywhere. Carriages drawn by pairs of mules will dash past him in apparently reckless fashion down the steep streets, for Lisbon is all hill except near the river; and from time to time he will come upon some one of the chafarizes, or public fountains, fed from the splendid aqueduct of Os Arcos across the Alcantara valley, with its crowd of Gallegos, or Gallician porters from the North of Spain, filling their water-kegs from its spouts, which done they bear them off upon their backs to sell their contents to any householder along their route who may be attracted by the plaintive, prolonged, and nasal cry of "Agua-a-a."

These gallegos do most of the rough and menial work of the capital. It is said, indeed, that the Portuguese are too proud to undertake it themselves; however that may be, their imported servants bear in their figures and in their faces clear evidence of the dignity of toil, for they are the handsomest and best set-up men in the place, and now and then one sees among their number a very Hercules, brown-faced and brawny, with dark curling hair, especially in the numerous boats that keep up communication between the vessels in the river and the shore.

Modernized Lisbon lies in the centre of the city and is terminated towards the river by the Praça do Commercio, called by the English Black Horse Square, a handsome open space flanked on the east by the Custom House and on the west by the Marine Arsenal, both fine buildings. A triumphal arch on the north side introduces the vista of the Rua Augusta, one of the parallel handsome streets, crossed by smaller streets at right angles, which terminate northwards in the square which holds the chief theatre of Lisbon. Hard by this spacious quadrangle another smaller square is enlivened by a market, where in summer huge white standard umbrellas protect the market-women and their wares from the heat of the sun, and where the thirsty traveller can buy his melon and eat it on the spot. On the other side lies the Paseio Publico, a small but beautiful park, aromatic on a hot day in summer with the scent from the pepper-trees, which render a snuff-box superfluous and often induce a sneeze, while the ear is struck by the industrious strident note of some great green tree-cicala, rubbing his ugly body with his legs. Here, in the evening, a regimental band often plays while the Lisbonese sit drinking their black coffee with Brazilian sugar, of which a whole saltcellarfull scarce seems to sweeten it.

In the older part of the city, to the east, are the Cathedral, partially destroyed by the great earthquake, but since then restored, and the Church of St. Vincent, where are buried the sovereigns of the House of Bragauza. The tombs of these great ones of the earth afford a strange spectacle, as they are in the form of studded hair trunks, such as our grandmothers used in travelling when they were young. As one gazes at these unusual coffins, the droll idea will arise that their late Majesties have been packed up ready for conveyance ere long to the Stygian shore as personal luggage of the shrivelled sacristan who haunts their resting-place. This is the district of narrow, winding streets, where lean ownerless dogs lie about on the roadway, useful as scavengers of offal, but attractive neither by breed nor condition; here, too, the long brown cloak worn by the older women among the poor predominates, and the tall, pointed, blue woollen cap of the men, fishermen and others, its upper part drooping over and lying flat in front.

At the other end of the river-frontage the picturesque tower of Belem, a more euphonious contraction of Bethlehem than our word Bedlam, juts out into the Tagus, while near it is the monastery of Belem, or Church of the Hieronymites, a splendid specimen of highly ornate, though perhaps overloaded, late Gothic; the old Necessidades, and the newer Ajuda Palace, are also in this direction. Some fourteen miles to the west lies Cintra, whose beauties have been too often described to need further mention, and Collares, a place of vineyards overhanging the Atlantic seaboard by Cintra, while Torres Vedras is northwards from the other two.

No memory of Lisbon can be called complete which does not embrace the approach by water and the view of the city from the river. Only the brush of Turner could adequately describe the effect of a midsummer sunrise upon the lofty crags which look down on Cintra and the Tagus' mouth, lighting them up with golden, purple, and violet hues; while Cascaes, the favourite bathing-place of the Lisbonese, nestles on the shore under the protection of the mountain shadow. Beautiful, also, is the short stretch of river which lies between the city and the ocean, adorned as it is with the olive, the orange, the cork tree, and the vine; while along the heights are innumerable windmills, each with many arms. Belem is soon passed by, and then, on the right, Lisbon itself lies before us, looking out on the broad expanse of the river, with four miles of frontage, quays, and houses, behind which are its hills, crowned with churches and dazzling white villas, which are the prettier in that they have no chimneys, winter here being no colder than much of an English May, and fireplaces being missed only for three weeks or so in the year. As background to the whole runs along the ridge which ends near Cintra in the Rock of Lisbon, which ridge is so near the city that the traveller from the North is close over its houses before he can see them, just as one walking from the centre of the Isle of Wight to Ventnor comes suddenly upon that pretty town over the slopes of Boniface. The whole panorama may be described, without fear of contradiction, as one of the most beautiful in the world.

Nor is Lisbon by any means devoid of historical associations It was there that Columbus lived some while, and there, as he gazed on the great ships sailing to the unexplored ocean, the thought of Asia beckoning to him from the West flashed on his brain—a thought destined in the end to bear the rich fruit of a new hemisphere disclosed to the Old World, after many disappointments in Portugal, in Italy, and in England. It was from the beach in front of the Belem Monastery that a few years later Vasco da Gama put off to mount the vessel which was to carry him round the Cape of Tempests—now bearing a name of better omen—to India; while, in the words of the Lusiads,

> A gente da cidade aquelle dia,
> Huns por amigos, outros por parentes,
> Outros por ver somente concorria,
> Saudosos na vista, e descontentes.

For in those days they might well doubt whether they should ever see the bold mariners again. Perhaps, as they dropped down the river oceanwards, they got a parting God-speed on that memorable morning from the sardine-fishers returning, then as now, at early dawn from their nightly toil in the deep, their boats, with crossed lateen sails, looking like a flock of snowy sea-birds hovering over the pale green water of the Tagus, and dipping their breasts again and again in its waves. It was at Lisbon that young Camoens dwelt, and there he found his "Circe" in Catharina de Atayde; there also, after many years of adventure in the far East, he laid aside the sword and took the pen to complete his Rimas, "lived poor and miserable, and so died,' as the inscription on his grave in the church of Sta. Anna recorded, though less miserable than if he had lived for another year or two to see his "nobre Lisboa" become a provincial town of Philip II.'s Spain. It was from Spanish Lisbon that the great Armada sailed to be shattered on the Hebrides and the wild west coast of Ireland. At Lisbon the body of Henry Fielding still lies in Os Cyprestes, the English cemetery near the graceful domed church of the Estrella, the earthquake sparing his newly-dug grave. Memories of Wellington and the Peninsula War carry us to modern Lisbon, where, on the 8th of June, 1880, the Portuguese paid a tardy tribute to their mighty dead by transferring to the monastery at Belem the bodies of Vasco da Gama and the great poet who found in him the hero whom his epic should immortalize.

EDUCATIONAL SUPERFLUITIES.

THE people who complain that children in elementary schools are being "over-educated" do not know what they are talking about. So far from being over-educated, the children are under-educated and mis-educated by reason of the facts that their school life is very short, and that foolish attempts are made to teach an impossible number of subjects. We shall now prove this proposition, and, for the sake of clearness in argument, we shall suppose ourselves to be dealing with ordinary Board schools in London. On the time-table of an average school the following subjects may appear:—Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, Dictation, Scripture, Drill, Grammar, Geography, History, Social Economy, Physiology, Drawing, Music, and English Literature. In girls' schools one such subject as Literature or Physiology may be dropped, and Needlework taken instead. The time spent in school is 27½ hours per week for 48 weeks per annum, and the very utmost extent of time during which attendance is enforced is from the age of three to the age of thirteen. Now in London schools forty minutes per day must be taken up with Scriptural teaching; and five hours per week must be spent on drawing, music, and drill, so that boys have eighteen hours per week for the study of "special subjects," reading, writing, and arithmetic. Girls are much worse off, for they are compelled to spend at least five hours on needlework, and thus their time for book learning is very meagre. In London Board schools 23,000 children are examined in literature, 10,000 in domestic economy, 500 in botany, 4,500 in physical geography, 9,000 in animal physiology, 48 in mechanics, 450 in French, 213 in mathematics, 220,000 are taught drawing, 200,000 learn drill, and about 3,000 learn cookery. It is not necessary to take all the subjects required by the Education Code; but, if any teacher failed to earn the utmost possible amount of Government grant, he would very soon be required to go; and thus a multitude of subjects are taught in a scrappy way, and no one subject receives proper and exhaustive attention. The teachers cannot help themselves; some of them work overtime to an absurd and harmful extent; some of them cease to be educators, and become mere "drivers"; and all of them find the burden more than they can bear. They would be only too glad if they could succeed in over-educating any child; but they have not the chance of doing so. They can only struggle against heavy odds to impart such a smattering of knowledge as may enable their schools to pass muster with the Government Inspector. Let us now consider the nature of the superfluities which produce this educational deadlock. Drawing is taught to the children in boys' and girls' schools for about two hours per week. In some places the instruction is given in a really useful way; but in the majority of cases the drawing lesson is a mischievous and expensive farce. Let any one look through, say, two thousand of the papers collected in a school on the day of the annual drawing examination, and he will probably have something to remember for the term of his natural life. Not five per cent. of the children have real aptitude for the subject; very few of them have an acquired aptitude; and the gross results of the ninety-six hours' labour bestowed on special work are really distressing. Some papers show an insane collection of twirls; some are blurred hopelessly; some of the figures lean to the right, some to the left; some are extravagantly corpulent, some are unspeakably thin; a few are neat and free from smudges, but destitute of power or skill; and a very limited selection show natural taste and ability. But week in, week out, all these unhappy youths are taught drawing. They use millions of pencils, waggon-loads of paper and india-rubber, and they require thousands of compasses and rulers. For the whole country the Government pays in grants alone 35,000*l.* per year for keeping up this absurdity; and the London Board schools alone take 3,000*l.* of that sum. Besides this, some 30,000 prizes are given every year, and each prize must be worth at least half-a-crown. We are not far wrong if we say that the country spends 40,000*l.* a year on teaching children to draw, and we venture to say that not forty children leave school in a year who are capable of drawing a leaf from nature. If special pupils were picked out and diligently trained no one could find fault; but to take up the brief time of poor children in teaching insufficiently a subject which is useless is an unwise proceeding. It occupies hours that should be devoted to essentials, and it produces the scantiest results. A thoroughly equipped art school might be kept up with half the money now spent in encouraging the production of smudgy abortions by elementary scholars.

We may now return to our time-table. Let us suppose that half an hour per week is given to grammar, the same to geography and history, one hour to physiology, or French, or mechanics, or botany, one hour to another alternative "special" subject, and half an hour to such mechanical work as marking the rolls, we find that at the outside only 14 hours per week can be devoted to reading, writing, and arithmetic. In girls' schools not much more than eight hours can be given to those branches. What is the consequence? The ability of the teacher is frittered away; the child cannot learn anything thoroughly; and a dull round of hurried labour is substituted for genuine education. A good elementary school under an artist in the work of teaching is one of the most charming sights that can be seen. There is order everywhere, good humour everywhere, and an indescribable suggestion of "good tone" is conveyed to the most casual visitor; yet even in such model places the work is only superficial, for the simple reason that the teachers have to give twelve years' instruction to pupils whose school life rarely extends beyond two-thirds of that time. If the teachers were left alone, the result would be that boys and girls would receive a rational and solid education; but every crotchetteer wishes to have his own pet subject taught, the schoolmasters are worried with a multiplicity of requirements, and the consequence is that, instead of over-education, we have half knowledge, cram, and general triviality.

We may now give some suggestive figures. Out of 2,875,003 scholars above seven borne on the registers of aided schools in the whole country, only 591,000 were examined in Standards IV., V., and VI. of the Government Code. In the London Board schools, out of 300,000 scholars, only 2,222 have gone beyond Standard VI. according to the latest return. There is certainly not much "over-education" shown by these sad statistics; and the reason why so poor a general result can be shown is that the labour of the teaching staff is frittered away, instead of being concentrated. Ambitious attempts are made to perform educational miracles, and those in authority will not learn that to education, as to politics, the metaphor about driving six omnibuses abreast through Temple Bar applies very aptly. In order that it may seem how very far we are away from over-education, the Government requirements in the "essential" subjects for Standard VI. may be given:—"(1) To read a passage from one of Shakspeare's historical plays, or from some other standard author, or from a history of England. (2) To write a short theme or letter on an easy subject. (3) Fractions, vulgar and decimal; proportion, simple and compound; and simple interest.

Twelve millions have been spent in London, and we now have 2,222 children who can go beyond this stage. The "over-education" cry seems somewhat premature in the face of these significant facts. Had we tried to do less, more might have been done, and the sooner the lesson of simplification is learned the better for teachers and children, and for those unconsidered creatures the ratepayers and taxpayers. And now we may glance for a moment at some few of the children on whom these cramping and bewildering educational superfluities are inflicted. Last year a most brilliant report was written by one Mr. T. Marchant Williams. No more suggestive document was ever printed; and, although it was unaccountably suppressed by the London School Board, we are able to quote from a chance copy which was not burked:—

Ten are orphans, 10 are children of fathers who have deserted their homes, 69 are the children of widows, 6 are the children of fathers who are undergoing penal servitude. It would be mere impertinence to expand or make lengthened comment on these terrible figures. To such children we are trying to teach drawing, and history, and the rest; on such children we are bestowing educational superfluities. It does not seem quite wise. Some men are already tempted to despair when they think of such facts as those we have given; but there is no reason for despair. A little common sense, and a little contempt of benevolent platitudes are all that we require. Too much has been attempted; we should recognize the truth and try simplification before it is too late.

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE.

ONE is used to hearing as an ordinary exclamation of every-day life, "How small the world is!" To get out of the reach of the circle of one's friends and acquaintances is a work of almost superhuman difficulty. On the summit of Cotopaxi one finds oneself face to face with Jones of the Admiralty, and under the palm groves of Otaheite one is hailed by the strident voice of Smith. But though the world is so small a place and solitude so impossible to find, it is remarkable how many things occur in our immediate neighbourhood of which we are profoundly ignorant. We may know the exact number of moral pockethandkerchiefs and flannel-waistcoats that have been exported to Boriboolaga, and at the same time be altogether ignorant of what is being done in the lane behind our house. As a rule, we know nothing of the lives, the aims, the sorrows, the joys, the occupations of the immense populations with whom we share this great city. Here in the West-End the inhabitants are but a small and numerically insignificant item in comparison to the millions of the South, East, and Centre; yet in the principal daily papers the only mention made of the latter is the record of crime at the various police-courts. The readers of these papers would, no doubt, feel considerably surprised if they were to find under the heading of "Places of Amusement" a list of the entertainments at Rotherhithe and Bermondsey, at Shoreditch and Whitechapel. Perhaps their surprise would be much increased if they could know how large a place music has in all the amusements of the poor.

It has often been said that the English are not a musical nation. This remark has a considerable show of truth on its side. England has not had for a considerable period any distinct school of music of its own. The well-known English airs are nearly all very old; the best amongst them date back to perhaps the sixteenth century. From that time down to the present English music of a distinctive character has been, practically speaking, non-existent. National music, such as is possessed by Germany, Spain, Italy, and Ireland in so marked a degree, is not to be found in England. Whether the efforts that have been and are being made to develop musical instincts amongst the people will bear fruit and raise a distinct type of popular music, something better than a music-hall song, remains to be seen. Many enthusiasts believe it will; and, if such a success is arrived at, posterity will have something left with which to sweeten the memory of this terribly practical nineteenth century. Without, however, indulging in so far a look into the future, one may certainly congratulate the various musical Societies on the good results they have already attained. The English may not be a musical nation per se, but it is a pleasant fact to find that they are able to appreciate good music when they can get it. They are also capable of distinct discrimination between good and bad. "Lend me thine ear" has not been said to them in vain. Few things can be more utterly disheartening to a nervous singer at an East-End or South London concert than the dead silence of disapproval which follows doubtful singing. Cat-calls would be more tolerable, a storm of hisses would be a positive relief, to the dead-blank silence, broken after a pause by some small attempt at clapping on the part of the occupants of the front line of seats. They may be touched by the forlorn expression of the unfortunate singer, who bows and smiles in a sickly way before retiring from the platform; but the gods have no pity. They have paid their money to hear good singing and music, and they see no reason why they should not make it perfectly plain when they do not think they are getting their money's worth. They resent poor singing as a personal offence; for they imagine it implies that they are not capable of knowing the difference between a good and bad performance. But, if they are open in their signs of disapproval, they are equally ready to show their pleasure. They burst out into applause between each verse as if they could not help it, for it is instantly hushed for fear of losing a note of what follows; every person in the vast hall, crowded as it is, seems condensed into nothing but eyes and ears, and at the close of the last verse there is a unanimous sort of sigh of satisfied delight, which, with the thunders of applause that follow it, are something not likely to be forgotten by the favoured singer. If allowed, they would have an "encore" to everything that pleases their fancy, and even an encore of an encore is sometimes insisted upon in a manner there is no denying. The length of a concert by no means appals an East-End audience. With them there is no question of "going on" to some other entertainment nor of "keeping the carriage horses waiting." The more they can get of music which pleases them, the better they are satisfied, and if the concert has been a good one in their eyes, or rather ears, "God save the Queen" always seems to come before it is wanted. Their taste in music, as a rule, is decidedly sound, and by degrees, under the influence of the various Societies who provide music for the people, a love for certain kinds of classical music is being developed. Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn" or Handel's "Honour and Arms" will always evoke far greater enthusiasm than such ballads as "Lord Mayor Whittington" or "Mary of Argyll." As a rule, however, ballad music of a good kind is the most popular. Anything declamatory, anything dramatic, a story in song, will always find favour. The words of each song are printed at full length in the programme, and a most noticeable evidence of the interest taken is shown when a page has to be turned in the middle of a song. The rustling that ensues for a few seconds is like the crackling of dead autumn leaves under foot. Few greater compliments of an implied character can be paid by one of these audiences to a singer than a general indifference to and relinquishing of the programmes. A known favourite will generally receive this mark of favour. The audience know by experience they will hear every word he or she sings, and they are too anxious to listen with their eyes as well as their ears to have time to read their programmes. A fact worth noticing with an East-End audience is, that the more miserable a song makes them, the better they like it. Of this there is no sort of doubt; songs that tell of early death, of bitter partings, of shipwrecks, of sad memories, of regrets, of all things that are saddest in the world, seem to give them intense delight. To judge by the frantic and continued applause that greets songs of this description, one may truly say that, to please a South or East Londoner, one must begin by making him unhappy. To harrow his feelings is perhaps the surest way to his musical affections. This is all the more strange when one remembers that the music most easily within his reach consists of the songs of the music-halls which, among their numerous attractions, have not yet tried the one of making their audience sorrowful. The fact remains, though unexplained, that fictitious sorrow will please where fictitious joy falls flat. Perhaps it is that these poor people know by experience more of the former than the latter; and a song that brings home to them the belief that sorrow has a nobler lesson to teach than joy, comes as a ray of sunshine to gild the hardships of their lot. If through the means of music one can succeed in raising their minds from the dull level of their everyday round of toil, suffering, and endurance, it is no small step in the right direction. Even if the gleam be but transient, it may help to make their "set grey lives" a little more bright. The Societies, therefore, which are formed to give the people this mental sunshine as often as possible, are working in a good way to reclaim to civilization the lost tribes of the South and East of London. Their methods are different, though their end is the same. The People's Entertainment Society gives free concerts, to which the people are only admitted by tickets distributed by the clergymen of the various parishes where the concerts take place, by the managers of factories, &c. Occasionally a paying concert is given at the special request of the inhabitants of the district where it takes place; but these are exceptions, the distinguishing feature of this Society being, that the public is only admitted, as it were, by personal invitation instead of by payment. This Society has established choirs which, under the name of the Metropolitan Choral Union, have performed at many of the concerts given by the Society. Amongst the many good features of this movement of providing music for the people, none is better than this one of establishing choral classes. Those established at Clerkenwell, Bermondsey, and elsewhere by the Popular Concert Ballad Committee have had the most unvarying success. Many, in fact most, of the pupils are ignorant of the very alphabet of music, but by dint of good instruction and hard work their progress has been very rapid, and certainly proves the innate love of music which is in the English character. Instrumental classes have also been formed, and have had the same success. The delight of the girls when they found that they were allowed, as well as the boys, to learn to play the violin, was almost absurd, and at Bermondsey that instrument bears away the palm as the favourite of the pupils. A great effort is being made by the Committee to provide the pupils with cheap instruments which they can keep at home and practise on. It is easy to see the good these classes must do to the young people. Not only the love of good music must have an elevating and refining influence upon young minds at the very time when they are most open to receive impressions, but the necessity of practice, stimulated by competition and emulation, will keep them at home or at the class-room many a night when they would otherwise be roaming the streets or hanging about public-houses. And who shall say that to send forth music by the voices of children into the homes of the London poor may not do something towards revivifying that love of home life which of late years, owing to many deplorable causes, has grown so faint?

BENGAL LANDLORDS AND TENANTS.

IF Lord Ripon had not managed to absorb public attention by two measures, one the Ilbert Bill, and the other, called the Extension of Self-Government but more correctly the abdication of our responsibilities as governors of India, his policy regarding such vast subjects as occupancy, rent, and the position of landlord to tenant, must have attracted notice. But he has so cleverly contrived to offend the unofficial community by attempting to deprive them of a very just and reasonable privilege, and to disgust the district officers by depriving them of a portion of their work which is pleasant to themselves and profitable to the State, that little has been said about the new Rent Bill for Bengal. In ordinary times we should despair of conveying to English readers a just idea of the position held respectively by the Government of India, by the Zemindar, and by the Ryot; of familiarizing the average householder with the ordinary phraseology of landed interests in Bengal; of showing under what conditions rent has hitherto been levied and enhanced; and of proving that the high position, the wide influence, and the numerous manorial privileges of the landholder are by no means inconsistent with freedom of cultivation, and, in theory at least if not in practice, with that security of possession on the part of the tenant which is tantamount to a sort of ownership in the soil. But a generation which finds time to listen to the woes of Irish landlords on the one hand and to the wail of Highland crofters on the other, may spare a few moments for the antagonism of Ryot and Zemindar in Bengal and Behar. We start by affirming that, while the Ilbert Bill has been proved to be absolutely unnecessary and wanton, and the Bill for the Development of Self-Government, as it is called, is nothing less than a political abdication of the first duties of the ruling race, a Rent Bill in some shape or other has lately become a measure not to be put off to a more convenient season. No just regret at the revival of antipathies of colour and race, no amazement at the recklessness and obstinacy of the Indian Government, no detection of the party feeling barely concealed under the placid assurance of politicians that on all Indian topics Lord Lytton might to them be a perfect Whig and Lord Ripon an absolute Tory, ought to blind us to the struggle that for the last ten years has been going on in Bengal and Behar. It is more perilous than the oppression which led to the Rent Act of 1859 or to the Indigo Commission of 1860. In it are involved the welfare and contentment of the agriculturists of a vast and populous kingdom dependent almost entirely on agriculture. The guarantees given by Courts of Directors, Lieutenant-Governors, and successive English statesmen, are at stake. Even the Zemindars, when confronted by the determination of bodies of tenants no longer to submit to exactions, and to pay only their lawful rents, have reluctantly admitted that "something must be done." It is idle to talk of enlisting natives of character and ability in the work of local government, of placing in their hands conservancy, sanitation, and the construction of roads and bridges, while the main elements of Oriental society are threatened with dissolution, and one of the primary functions of an alien but beneficent Government is unperformed. We start by saying deliberately, after a careful perusal of two large Blue-books, a draft Act of two hundred and thirty clauses besides schedules and appendices, and some excellent speeches on both sides of the question made on the introduction of the Bill in March 1883, that a revised and improved edition of the famous Act X. of 1859 has become a paramount obligation. To prove this we cannot help going back nearly a century; in fact, to the origin of the revenue and rent system of Bengal, Behar, and a part of Orisse. When our first administrators were settling down to their task of ruling a land to which they had been admitted as merchants, they very properly did not discard the principles and maxims of their predecessors, the Moguls. To pay revenue or land-tax to the ruling powers is always the evidence of loyalty and the guarantee for order. And the first duty of any Power, native or foreign, is to say when, by whom, and under what conditions this tax is to be paid. We found that the Nawabs or Lieutenants of Akbar, Jehangir, and Shah Jehan, who under later Emperors were virtually independent of Delhi, had been in the habit of collecting the dues of Government from a set of men termed Zemindars. In several cases these Zemindars had sway over large portions of the Lower Provinces, and had enjoyed power and privilege long before the first Mohammedan mosque had risen side by side with the Hindu temple, or the first shrine of the Pir had attracted Musulman devotees. Of this kind were the Rajas of Nuddea, of Tippera, and of Bishenpore; and later in date there arose the princely houses of Burdwan, Beerbhoom, Nattore, and Durbhanga. But where such great personages did not exist it was not unnatural to supply the deficiency by appointing farmers of the revenue, or even by putting up the land-tax of certain districts to public auction. When Clive, Verelst, Cartier, and Warren Hastings began to lay the foundations of law, order, and civil government by a fair assessment of the revenue, they employed as agents in the collection both the old Rajas and the hereditary Zemindars, as well as farmers of the revenue, who might be Hindus, Mohammedans, or Englishmen. This stage continued for about twenty years, or from 1772 to 1793. Settlements were made for periods of five years; collectors were being gradually trained to understand the mysterious terms connected with an Indian Zemindary, the privileges and position of the Zemindar, and the substantial interest which the Ryot had in the soil. Then came a time of stricter inquiries and of long reports. Something was done to ascertain the capabilities of divers districts, and very much was written in favour of Settlements for periods and Settlements in perpetuity. At length Lord Cornwallis, with the approval of the Court of Directors, put an end to all discussion by a series of manifestoes, which took the form of the Laws of 1793, embodying the principles of the Permanent Settlement, and establishing revenue agencies or collectorates, and judicial courts all over the country.

That statesman took the Zemindars as he found them—ancient Rajas whose blue blood could be traced from times when Ayodha flourished and Kanauj was not a heap of ruins; later Mohammedan adventurers, who had supplanted Hindu nobles; tax collectors in whose families the office had become hereditary; and men of yesterday, who had engaged to collect the revenue of estates when the natural incumbents declined the responsibility, and were quite content to accept a sort of subsistence allowance calculated at ten per cent. on the collections. All these different classes were included in the title of Zemindars, and the areas for which they became responsible for the land-tax were termed estates. Lord Cornwallis assured them that no further increase would ever be demanded on the assessment fixed by Shore and himself for ten years provisionally, and then confirmed for ever; and he added that, as long as they paid their dues with punctuality, they would never be ousted or sold up. As far as language can make thought clear, as far as intentions can be deduced from ordinary phrases, or as far as theory can be confirmed by subsequent practice and experience, it is absolutely certain that Lord Cornwallis never invested them with complete ownership as we understand and apply this term in England and Scotland. He even contemplated a sort of dual ownership. He distinctly recognized the existence of other classes, whom he termed "dependant Talukdars, Ryots, and other cultivators of the soil." He reserved to himself and to his successors, by the clearest and most emphatic warning, the power to intervene at any time for the above dependant or inferior proprietors, should they need the protection of the law. And no reliance on loose and inaccurate expressions about "estates" and ownership, rights and "property," to be culled here and there from the Code of 1793, can convert a Zemindar into the likeness of an English squire, or justify us in comparing a Bengal Raja to either of those great chiefs of rival parties who have recently forced the public to admit that English aristocrats can excellently expound the duties and rights of landlords to tenants in the country, and propose a plan for bettering the dwellings of the poor who inhabit great towns. By all but the most obstinate partisans the theory of English ownership, once or twice claimed for the Rais and Choudaris of Bengal, is now given up. We could go further and show from the Regulations passed after 1793 and in the beginning of this century, that for years subsequent to the Permanent Settlement the Zemindars of Bengal were kept in leading-strings. They were not allowed to grant leases of sub-tenures beyond a certain term of years. Many restrictions were put on that sale and subdivision of estates which would naturally follow on the establishment of peace and order, or from the Hindu law of inheritance, partnership, and subdivision. The Zemindars were expected to confirm the Ryots in their holdings by giving them written titles for their plots; they were to be bound by the terms of such documents; and there was a general tacit understanding that, while the Zemindar was to improve his estates, clear jungle, and extend agriculture, the Ryot was not to be evicted or changed as long as he paid the customary rent.

There is no one law, series of Regulations, or Blue-book, or manual from which the actual position, rights, and privileges of a Zemindar can be deduced or wherein they are clearly and absolutely defined. They are, however, to be found here and there in the laws passed between 1793 and 1859, the year of the great Rent Act, in judicial decisions of the old Sudder and the present High Court of Calcutta, notably in that known as the rent case of 1865, and in that unwritten law and custom of the country which statutes try to embody, and which neither Collector nor Magistrate nor lord of great manors can wholly override. The following sketch will show what a Zemindar may do and still keep the windy side of the law. In the first place, he is entitled to a certain amount of rent from every portion of his Zemindary or Taluk tenanted by sub-proprietors, middlemen, mechanics, squatters, or artisans. The Bengal theory is that, as a given area with distinct boundaries constitutes an estate and is liable to the Government demand, so every resident and cultivator within that area is liable to pay a quota of rent to make up the revenue. Not only is the Zemindar at liberty at once to dispossess any rent-free tenant claiming under a grant of later date than 1793; but he can also sue in the Civil Court to cancel any ostensible rent-free title of any date or age, not covered by a genuine and valid deed given by some authority that had power to confer it. No prescription avails against a demand for ordinary rent, and no mere squatter, though he had cultivated unnoticed for the full limitation of twelve years which would bar any other action, can maintain a claim to sit without payment. All waste land belongs, as far as any land can belong to one person, to the Zemindar, who can cultivate by his own servants, or hand it over to cultivating tenants. All plots and homesteads vacated by death without heirs, by famine, pestilence, inundation, or oppression, revert to the Zemindar. Besides the ordinary rent due from the arable land and the homestead, from the rice-field and the garden, the Zemindar can exercise rights of fishing or give fishing leases in rivers, marshes, and lakes. He has a portion of whatever the jungle or the uncleared forest produces; trees cannot be cut without his permission; and when marshes silt up by the deposit brought down in the countless affluents and distributaries of the Ganges and become fitted for the plough, the new formation receives a tenant at the pleasure of the Zemindar. No right of fishing in a lake which by some slow process or some sudden freak of nature has become suitable for the spade and the mattock, can give to the fisherman any title to the land, though he and his family had set nets and weirs there for a century. In the discussions which preceded the Perpetual Settlement, it was for some time a grave question whether large markets for wholesale and retail—known locally as the Gunje, the Haut, and the Bazaar—were to be considered the separate property of the Government or were to form part of the Zemindar's estate. It was at length decided that they were part of the Zemindary assets. The Zemindar is entitled by custom having the force of law to levy a higher rate of rent on all the better kinds of produce, and on every shop and dwelling-house in a bazaar which contains thousands of inhabitants and is the centre of exchange for hundreds more of adjacent villagers; and he only can at pleasure set up new bazaars or Hauts. He can dig reservoirs, or allow them to be dug, cut canals to drain swamps, and make village and cross roads to serve as feeders to the highways. He can prevent the tenant from cutting valuable fruit and timber trees, or at least he can impose a cess or levy a fine for the permission to cut. This is not based on the theory that the Zemindar planted the trees or that the Ryot planted them for the Zemindar's sole use and benefit, but on the leading principle which pervades the whole law on the subject—viz. that nothing tending to reduce the extent or value of the land and its capacity for paying a certain rent as a contribution to the revenue, can or ought to be done without the authority of the landlord. The same reasoning applies to new tanks or roads, for which the Zemindar's consent is necessary. The culturable area of the estate is diminished when a road is cut or a tank dug; and to this diminution, however advantageous to the community, the consent of the Zemindar is required. Then the same person, now freed from the restrictions of the early legislation of this century, can grant leases for a term of years of areas embracing twenty, fifty, and a hundred villages and square miles of rice-field, swamp, garden, and bazaar, with all rights and privileges appertaining thereto. In some cases the lessee may be a native more acute and enterprising than the Zemindar himself. In others he may be an Englishman who seeks the prestige inseparably connected with land, in order to grow indigo or to carry out some other commercial end. The Zemindar can also charge his estate with permanent sub-infeudations, called puttunis. In this case the grantor becomes by his own action a mere rent-charger on his own lands, and the Puttunidar, for all practical connexion with village and agricultural life, becomes the Zemindar. By a law specially passed some sixty years ago to regulate dealings with these sub-infeudations down to the second and third degree, the Zemindar has no need to institute any suit, summary or regular, for rent against a defaulting Puttunidar. Four times in the year the Zemindar himself is liable to see his estate put up to auction and sold to the highest bidder if he defaults in his dues to Government; and, in his turn, twice in the year, without court pleadings or note of preparation, he may in the same way put up and sell the tenure of a recusant Puttunidar. One thing, however, he must not do. If he divides his estate with brothers and partners or sells a portion privately, due care must be taken that in the division or separation of the land each distinct portion shall bear its proper share of the revenue. There must be no unfair halving of the advantages and the burdens, as in the classical instance recorded by Tacitus of two chieftains in Thrace, who were in the exact position of our tributary Rajas in India. One got the jungly and barren and the other the cultivated land. Any area registered in the collectorate as an estate must bear its proper proportion to the whole of the original demand. The fundamental notion is that in all contingencies the Government dues fixed in perpetuity must be secured against collusion, trickery, and loss by all possible legal and judicial safeguards.

In the above view the Zemindar of Bengal, if not in the position of an English landed proprietor, has with his obligations great prestige, privilege, and power. Given his right to rent from every cultivated acre, to fisheries and forest and swamp, to new lands rising out of the marsh or cleared from the jungle, to an octroi in large and populous bazaars crowded with every article of produce that supplies the food and the few luxuries of a rustic population—given his power to cancel invalid rent-free tenures and to impeach for waste; and then add to these solid advantages a knowledge of law and procedure, the command of money and good legal advice, and the indefinable but well-understood consequence conferred by his position between the Government and the Ryot, it may well be asked what, on the other hand, is the status of that Ryot; what may he lawfully call his own; and what protection, with or without self-reliance or combination, does he find in the past pledges of English statesmen and the present administration of a select Civil Service? This, the other side of the vital question, we may explain hereafter.

RECITALS AND ENTERTAINMENTS.

THE first of a series of nine recitals by Mr. Clifford Harrison was given last Saturday at the Steinway Hall. A varied programme enabled the reciter to display to advantage versatile talent and a considerable range of expression. In delivery he makes free use of action, but never to excess; he is rightly content to regard it as auxiliary to the voice, the means by which impersonation acquires perfection and finish of vraisemblance. In fine quick changes of gesture, in the slightest shades of expression, and in all those delicate touches which are felt as much as detected, and indicated facially as well as vocally, Mr. Harrison showed genuine histrionic ability and the sensibility of an artist. In Stone's "Knight of Intercession" and Whittier's "Barbara Frietchie" Mr. Harrison's success was very striking. The touching story of the knight who rode, vizard down, through the world, taking no reward of those he benefited but the promise that they would pray for his proud lady-love, who denied him grace, was told by Mr. Harrison with exquisite grace and feeling. In the bare narrative his elocution was excellent; but when he told how the news of the poor knight's death was brought to the lady who had scorned but secretly loved him, the dramatic situation was presented with instantaneous force. Whittier's little poem is, in expression, like many of his ballads—simple, direct, almost homely. It is possible to read it without experiencing any great emotion, still more possible that it should be read—and well read—without producing such a result; but it is quite impossible, we think, to have heard Mr. Harrison's interpretation without being stirred to the depths by its passion and pathos and exaltation of patriotism. For his chief essay in humour Mr. Harrison chose Theodore Hook's "Practical Joke," and gave to it an excellently humorous rendering. The reciter's versatility was also well displayed in a spirited declamation of "The Revenge," by Tennyson, in the quiet, dry humour of Bret Harte's "Dow's Flat," and in Mr. Clement Scott's "Women of Mumbles Head." In "The Raven" Mr. Harrison was most impressive in the two stanzas beginning "Prophet, said I, thing of evil," where he got over the difficult suddenness of the passion by his clever simulation and the broken, troubled chords of the piano accompaniment. We must note, too, Mr. Harrison's use of the piano in "The Knight of Intercession," where a plaintive melody and the recurrence of certain chords were happily introduced.

Mr. Brandram began a new series of readings on Tuesday at Willis's Rooms with a remarkable rendering of A Christmas Carol. The series is to include scenes from Henry IV. and Henry V., The Cricket on the Hearth, Hamlet, Macbeth, The Merchant of Venice, and miscellaneous selections. Mr. Brandram has lost nothing of his old charm and power and astonishing memory; his reading of Dickens's work was wonderfully fresh and vivid. In none of his performances have we been more struck with the beauty and finish of his articulation. In those passages of the story where quiet narration follows impersonation and action, these admirable qualities of his elocution were excellently shown. In the Christmas Carol the reciter displays more of the movement and pantomime of action than is usual with him; and in the scene where Scrooge is confronted with his own tombstone, and also in his final interview with Bob Cratchit, his demonstration was a little excessive. Nothing, however, could be better than his reading of the humorous scenes, such as the dance at the Fezziwigs and the immortal dinner at the Cratchits'. The reality and nature, the fidelity of voice and expression and gesture, the spontaneity, with which these incidents were given have never been exceeded by Mr. Brandram.

Interest in readings seems to have kept pace with the awakening public sense of the educational importance of the art of speaking and reading. Elocution is now a generally recognized branch of study, and if it has not attained the position in the scheme of education which is its due, it is yearly receiving more consideration. To feel how neglected is this noble art we have not only to listen to the speech we have about us daily—the average oratory of the House of Commons, the pulpit, the treatment of blank verse at the theatres, afford lamentable instances. In a little brochure before us styled The Art of Speaking: or, the Principia of Vocal Delivery, by Mr. Harold Ford (London and Manchester: John Heywood), we find indicated with perfect truth the cause of this unpleasant fact. Most people assume that effective speaking is no more an art than good reading, that people are born good readers or speakers. What they mean is, that some are born with eloquence and quick apprehension, which alone, however, will never render them good speakers or readers. This primary truth is most lucidly set forth by Mr. Ford. His little manual is practical, sensibly written, and well proportioned; the rules and examples given should prove useful aids to those under tuition, and to people who indulge in the passion for mastering principles for themselves. Excellent encouragement is given by Mr. Ford to all who conceive modestly of their vocal organs, without having ever afforded them the advantage of training.

Mr. Charles Du-Val, who gives his entertainment at St. James's Hall, is an entertainer of the good old-fashioned kind, though his method is quite his own. "Odds and Ends" is the title of a variety entertainment in which the performer presents with great success a number of humorous characters that involve strongly varied contrasts and rapid transitions of costume. His aim is to amuse, and he succeeds admirably. In these portentous times, when the shadow of the Georgian democracy and a hundred attendant crazes threaten us with universal dulness, Mr. Du-Val's entertainment should be welcomed, especially by all who remember, with a sense of grim irony, one ancient characteristic of our country. Though we have little leisure to grow fat, we may still laugh and correct the serious tendency of our days with such whimsical impersonations as Professor Dulbore and Betsy Scrubbe, which indeed are excellent alteratives, as the medical men say. Mr. Du-Val's happy disguises and surprises, his pleasant humours and ready quips, should be quite as beneficial to the dyspeptic as the lights and glitter of the theatre, or the flinging of a stone—remedies so earnestly advocated by the ingenious Mr. Green in his witty poem of "The Spleen." There is no doubt about the heartiness of the laughter Mr. Du-Val provokes; it has all the contagious force of genuine merriment; in Professor Dulbore's scientific lecture the least elevation of the savant's eyebrow, and the slightest drop of the mouth, arouse those curious isolated outbursts, so full of individuality and so pleasant to hear, that fill the pauses in the general laughter like the explosion that follows the surrender of a long-held citadel. In truth, the lecture is irresistibly funny. Not less good, in another style, are the female impersonations. Mrs. Clearstarch, the laundress, who has had "fifteen childer and brought 'em up respectable," and who, in a moment, is transformed into Miss Dashaway, the belle of the ball, shares the honours with her successor. The young lady's singing of a parody of "Beautiful Star" is one of the cleverest illusions in the programme. Better than these, more racy, more complete and distinct, is the maid of all work, Betsy Scrubbe. Another notable feature in the entertainment is Mr. Pallette's exhibition of portraits, where the faces of prominent public characters are very cleverly imitated. The entertainment is altogether remarkable for its versatile humour, the never-failing spirits of the unassisted impersonator, and a commendable freedom from vulgarity.

NELL GWYNNE AT THE AVENUE—PAW CLAWDIAN AT TOOLE'S.

WHILE listening to M. Planquette's new comic opera Nell Gwynne at the Avenue Theatre the hearer will often be struck by the thought that such graceful music deserved a better book—a notion which will occasionally be weakened as M. Planquette degenerates into the commonplaces of the lighter French school. The book is certainly a very poor one, hovering as it does between opéra comique and opéra bouffe, with few good points from either. In spite of all that can be said against "pretty witty Nell," it seems a sort of degradation to her to make her the heroine of so feeble a play as Mr. Farnie has here constructed. The plot is a parody of Flotow's Marta, though a new motive is given for making Nell follow in the footsteps of the Lady Henrietta. Here Nell hires herself a waiting-maid at an inn, because the inn is kept by the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Rochester, who are in disgrace at Court, and thus beguile the period of their banishment; and Nell's desire is to charm the Duke, who has refused her a part in a new play he has written. She wants to convince him that she can act, sing, and dance, and this leads to an effective scene in the third act. But there is also a first act, and likewise a second act, which are padded out in a way that would be insufferable but that where the author flags the composer often comes to the rescue. Episodes are clumsily joined on to the thin thread of the story; the second act is wholly taken up with farcical business arranged after the fashion of modern opéra bouffe, and bearing little or no relation to the matter in hand. Then, again, the introduction of Nell Gwynne has caused the author to introduce Buckingham and Rochester, and these parts fall into the hands of two worthy young players who cannot be supposed by the wildest flights of fancy to bear any sort of resemblance, in speech, manner, or bearing, to those whose titles they assume. Any other name would have suited the piece as well as Nell Gwynne suits it, and any other names would have suited Buckingham, Rochester, and the unconsciously comic Charles very much better. There are at the Avenue two low comedians, and it was in the first place essential that they should be fitted with comic parts, or with parts as comic as they could be made. As the representative of stolid, self-satisfied stupidity Mr. Lionel Brough is always exceedingly funny; so he is made into an anonymous Beadle, and it is only just to him to say that the part, which has no real connexion of any kind with the plot, is made laughable by Mr. Brough's humour. Mr. Arthur Roberts, a recruit from the music-halls, is gifted with a vein of vulgar fun, but no character for him grew naturally out of the author's scheme, so he is tacked on to the story as a pawnbroker, who is supposed to drive a flourishing trade in the village where the action is laid. All this is very trivial and clumsy. The quaintness of Mr. Brough apart, the comic business is felt to be sadly forced.

The honours of the work are unquestionably carried off by M. Planquette, whose melodious fancy, already shown in Les Cloches de Corneville and Rip Van Winkle, is here again very favourably, sometimes very charmingly, displayed. It has pleased Mr. Farnie to portray Nell Gwynne as a highly sensitive and delicate-minded girl, with visions of a noble life and a deep appreciation of art and beauty. This was not the idea Pepys formed of her when he notes that "to see how Nell cursed, for having so few people in the pit, was strange"; nor were the experiences of the evening when, in the girl's tiring-room, he heard Knipp her part in Flora's Figgarys, calculated to support Mr. Farnie's view. The result of it is, however, a well-written scena, "Only an Orange Girl," scored with much taste, and sung at the Avenue with no little dramatic force by Miss Florence St. John. The chief success of the score is in the second act. In a rustic rondo, "Ah! work-a-day life's hard, but at ev'ning all passes," M. Planquette has caught a happy echo from an earlier century. This is a delightful melody, half-tender, half-humorous, but wholly picturesque. It will be remembered when the opera, as a whole, is forgotten. The "Song of the Clock," which follows, is also a flowing and effective number, for the singing of which Miss Warwick, formerly a member of Mr. Carl Rosa's company, merits a word of praise. There is good writing, too, in the finales to the first and second acts. No scope for power is provided, and it is useless speculating what would be the result if M. Planquette were called upon to set a work dramatically stronger. Here he does all that is possible. There is no lack of melody, and his orchestration is agreeably varied and ingenious, while happily free from tricks, meaningless in themselves, and devised merely to arrest attention. The scene in which some excuse is made for dragging Nell Gwynne into the opera, where the "maid" shows her "master"—that is to say, the disguised Buckingham—that she can sing and dance, and could, in truth, adequately fill the part she desires him to find for her on the stage, is remarkably well done by Miss St. John, who sings with taste and dances the minuet, the pavane, and a merry jig to the air of "Green Sleeves" with evident zest, entering heartily into the situation. If the plot had not been so much obscured that the significance of all this is almost lost, the incident would be extremely telling. In spite of lapses, the work will enhance M. Planquette's reputation.

We have had no hesitation in expressing a decided opinion with regard to Mr. Burnand's recent burlesques; that opinion having been to the effect that they were, for the most part, utter rubbish. It is the more satisfactory therefore to be able to speak of his new burlesque, which was produced on Thursday night at Toole's Theatre, in terms of commendation. It may be described as a really humorous piece of work. Mr. Burnand, with a keen eye for fun, has watched Messrs. Wills and Herman's play; he has noted those points in it which were open to parody, and these he has treated with a real sense of burlesque. Those who sighed at Ariel will laugh at Clawdian. That the piece is as good as it might be made is not to be asserted, but nevertheless in much it is good. Most of the principal characters of the play are introduced. Mr. Toole, his face strangely altered by a Roman or Claudian nose, has caught with considerable adroitness the manner of Mr. Wilson Barrett, his gait and movements, as he toys with Serena's hair or waves her feathered fan. Mr. Toole now and again speaks a line of the text as it is written, without missing two or three feet, or adding half a dozen; and this is something, for, quaint as the popular comedian always is, his ear for the rhythm of verse is very defective, and Mr. Burnand's lines seem to run smoothly. Serena—she is called Alserena in the burlesque—is a departure from the original, for she is shown as a strong-minded woman, the mother of a most commonplace boy instead of the beautiful child of the drama, and, far from being horror-stricken at her purchase by Claudian, she glories in the appraisement of her substantial charms. Mr. Ward, who has a decided capacity for burlesque, makes a really comic personage of the Holy Clement, here shown as a Cremorne hermit; he sings a capital song, and the curse is amusingly parodied. Claudian—who has slain the hermit—is doomed to play his part for ever, while a little black attendant "shall grow up and play Othello." All this is very good fooling, and Miss Marie Linden as Almida—Almi-i-da is the daring but not very successful attempt of the author to make something out of the name—admirably sustains the fun of the skit. Her voice is the voice of Miss Eastlake, whom she closely resembles in attire, in the fashion of hair and in general bearing. The earnest pleading manner, the ardent adoration, which the Princess's Almida shows for Claudian is reproduced with precisely the correct amount of extravagance at Toole's. Mr. W. Brunton likewise follows the original Agazil with good results. The earthquake is not well done or diverting. When fun depends on the stage carpenter, and it is here made to do for lack of fun in other quarters, the effect is rarely striking. The pillars of the chamber where Claudian and Alunda are conversing give way, and comic heads replace the capitals. Claudian is discovered, when the lights are turned on, in a four-post bedstead; and the events of the play are supposed to have been a dream. Here the author's imagination has greatly flagged. In other places Mr. Burnand has contrived to show, both in his lines and in his treatment of incident, that the spirit of humour has revived in him.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.

IT has often been our unpleasant duty to speak disparagingly of Mr. Long's pictures. When he painted single figures, such as the daughters of Saul, and a half-length in the Institute, his eye for colour seemed to have deserted him. It is therefore with a pleasure not unmingled with surprise that we notice the great work "Anno Domini" now being exhibited at 168 New Bond Street. In another room are "Merab, elder daughter of Saul" and "Michal," side by side with "A Question of Propriety," the gipsy dancing before the Inquisition, a picture which may be said to have founded Mr. Long's fame. It is therefore very possible to judge of his powers after a visit to this gallery alone; and their inequality will be found to be very striking. There is, in the gipsy picture, almost an excess of dramatic effect. Every face is individualized, and its expression carefully marked. At the same time the colour is brilliant and well arranged, and the composition is such that the story is plainly and naturally told. When we turn to the single figures all is changed. The faces are soft, and have a kind of sallow beauty, but without expression. The attitude and drawing are commonplace, the details very slight, and the drapery distinctly weak and without colour. When we remember how much of late Mr. Long has confined himself to this kind of work, and especially when we recall the half-finished details of "Egyptian Gods and their Makers," the brilliant colour, completeness, high finish, and easy composition of the "Anno Domini," our pleasure, as we have said, is mingled with surprise.

The design appears at first sight so simple that it is not until some time has been spent in study that its real complexity becomes apparent. In the foreground a little to the right is the Holy Family. The Mother holds her Child on her knee, and is seated on an ass, which, with head down and heavy footsteps, is driven by St. Joseph, a finely conceived figure. His robes are dark, but he has a yellow "kufich" on his head which brings him well out. Immediately in the path of the Family is a despairing mother with a dying child lying across her lap. A little negress holds a figure of Osiris to its breathless lips. This is, as the catalogue points out, an allusion to the beautiful legend that, when the Holy Family went into Egypt, the Virgin restored to health a dying child by taking it into her arms, and that the child grew up and became a robber, and hung, as Dysmas, the repentant thief, on the cross at Calvary. In the middle is a pretty group of children playing in the dust, a group which may be seen any fine day in a native village on the banks of the Nile. One of them holds up a figure of Pasi, the Egyptian cat-headed Minerva of purity, but the Holy Family do not notice it. A little higher are sellers of sacred images and beads, and quite to the left is a very charming group, representing a young lover who is clasping a necklace round the throat of such a lovely girl as Mr. Long can easily paint when he pleases. At the opposite extremity some equally lovely faces adorn the leaders of a long procession. Each girl bears a sistrum, and cries out in honour of the golden Hathor, whose image is being carried in at the gigantic portals of a temple. The procession winds far into the background, a Roman in his chariot taking part in it, and other temples, with their pylons, catch the rays of the sinking sun. In the furthest distance are the pyramids glowing in the sunset, and a reach of the Nile gleams below. All the details are thoroughly worked out. We do not know whether the Egyptians of this period or any period actually used the sacred emblems of their divinities as they are here represented, and let children and slaves handle images of the gods. But the painter is perfectly justified in assuming the point for the purposes of his art; and we note with great satisfaction the care with which Mr. Long has studied the forms and colours of the smaller objects, as well as the great reliefs on the temples and the giant figures by the entrances. It is perhaps hypercriticism to complain, as a traveller who has visited Egypt may, that it would be impossible to get any group of pyramids and temples into exactly this position; for, though the front of On, or Heliopolis, faced the west, the nearest pyramids are at least ten miles off, and on the other side of the Nile. This is not the spirit in which to approach a noble picture, well thought out and carefully finished to the minutest particular—a picture to which we may point when a foreign critic tells us that high art is extinct in England.

Messrs. Goupil have a gallery full of good things at their new house in Bond Street. There are several old favourites by Corot, Millais, and others; but the great attraction is M. Le Febvre's "Psyche." A nude fair-haired girl, seated on a lofty rock, her yellow hair blown about by the wind, a serpent creeping towards her foot, a dark abyss before her—such is the picture. The modelling and drawing are all that can be expected from the great French school to which M. Le Febvre belongs; but the colour is a little cold, and the modelling wanting in the softness inseparable from the idea of so youthful a figure. In short, whether the artist intended it or not, Psyche seems to be shivering as she waits for the Stygian ferryman. In the same room is a fine picture by Rossetti, of the ordinary later type, a giantess in blue, with a swollen throat, distorted thumbs, and the other peculiarities of the artist—in fact, a very characteristic example. A fine Herkomer and an Israels are among the other prominent pictures.

Another small exhibition is also in New Bond Street. It is open at Mr. Dowdeswell's, and consists of a series of cathedral sketches, chiefly interiors, by Mr. Wyke Bayliss. There are both oil and water-colour pictures, unusually complete in the architectural and archæological details. We cannot admire the "Sainte Chapelle" (23) as much, perhaps, as the skill evidenced in the painting deserves. The Chapel has been really rebuilt in living memory, and we cannot feel satisfied with the tawdry colouring and the dark crimson and steel-blue glass which were substituted for the beautiful thirteenth-century windows now at South Kensington. In "St. George's, Windsor" (39), the artist is at his best. The heraldry, the old transparency east window, and some other features now destroyed make this picture interesting as well as pretty. "Chartres Cathedral" (12) is very fine—the finest picture, perhaps, of all; but "Coutance" (11) comes very near it; and neither is injured by a spottiness to which Mr. Bayliss is sometimes given in his anxiety to preserve every architectural feature. Some of the pictures have sonnets appended to them in the Catalogue, presumably by the painter. One on Westminster Abbey is too good for the very cold and inadequate sketch to which it belongs. A large picture of St. Mark's at Venice (7) has been purchased by the Corporation of Nottingham; it is a grand work, but somewhat spoilt by want of room and by the pressure of so many other pictures by the same artist.

Mr. Pownell Williams exhibits at Mr. McLean's, in the Haymarket, as on two former occasions, the results of a year's sketching in Italy and the Riviera. They are all in pure water-colour, and are as vigorous and direct as skill and rapidity of hand and eye can make them. Mr. Williams does not quite please us in his bluer pictures. It is impossible, as any one who has studied the Mediterranean must know, to assert that the strangest shades of purple and indigo may not occasionally appear; but surely these deep tones are not so frequent as Mr. Williams seems to think. But we have nothing but praise for "The Land of Roses," a noble flower-piece, or for the beautiful vine-leaves against a yellow sky entitled "Evening in a Venetian Garden," or for the view of Mentone, hung at the end of the room, and probably the most highly finished and important of all the sketches.

In a second edition Mr. Stephens has considerably altered and improved his annotated Catalogue of the Reynoldses at the Grosvenor Gallery. Under No. 5 two important words are added to the sentence about the former exhibitions of this painter's works. A long note to No. 6, "Admiral Lord Anson," is inserted. The funny sentence in which Reynolds, Johnson, and Mrs. Abington were so curiously mixed up, as we noticed when the exhibition was opened, is left as it was, together with the erroneous date. Under No. 21, "The Dilettanti Society," we have an alteration for the worse. The sentence in the first edition stood thus:—"This picture was painted for the Society, but, if not all of the members, some of them severally paid Reynolds, each for his own portrait." This is, at least, intelligible. We have in the new edition this curious statement substituted:—"This picture and its companion were painted for the Society; each member being bound to present his own portrait, the whole were grouped in these cases." The groups in cases somehow suggest stuffed birds, but otherwise the meaning of the sentence escapes us. The statement that Miss Morris, who sat for "Hope nursing Love," was present at Reynolds's deathbed is repeated, although, as we pointed out, she was herself dead many years before. The names of the Countess Spencer's portraits are corrected. The "Young Lady, niece of Edmund Burke's Lawyer," is altered to "Young Lady, Miss Hickey, niece of Edmund Burke's Lawyer." To No. 177, "The Marchioness of Thomond, Mary Palmer, niece of Sir Joshua Reynolds, sister of Mrs. R. L. Gwatkin," a note is now appended in which the mistake as to Miss Morris is repeated. The "publisher" is left out of the description of the portraits of the "Macklin Family." Long notes are added to "Muscipula"; to "Mrs. Siddons"; to "Miss Cholmondeley," which is now designated, in full, "Miss (Hester Frances) Cholmondeley, afterwards Lady Bellingham, 'Crossing the Brook'"; to "Lord Althorp," "Mrs. Thrale," and several more, and could we but feel confidence in the accuracy of the details, they would add very much to the interest both of the catalogue and the exhibition.

THE MONEY MARKET.

THE course of the money market during the past twelve months has been very abnormal. At the beginning of last summer, the season when the rate of interest payable for the use of capital in the short-loan market usually falls, the Directors of the Bank of England found themselves compelled to raise their rate of discount to 4 per cent. And they had to keep the rate at that figure until the beginning of the autumn, when under ordinary circumstances the rate of interest payable for the use of capital in the short-loan market would have risen. At the end of September, however, the Directors found it expedient to reduce their rate of discount to 3 per cent. At that figure they kept it until last week, when they raised the rate to 3½ per cent., although we have now reached a period of the year when the value of money in the London market ought to be lower than in November or December. What is the cause of this curiously abnormal condition of the market? Trade is very dull, and all the indications point to increasing depression rather than to revival. At the same time there is no speculation. Consequently the demand for the use of loanable capital either by merchants or by speculators is exceedingly small. It might reasonably be expected, therefore, that the value of money would be low. But the internal causes affecting the market are overruled by external causes. As our readers are aware, the Bank of England holds the ultimate reserves of all the banks of the United Kingdom. Directly or indirectly those banks keep what passes for their reserve with the Bank of England, and upon the Bank of England, therefore, they have to draw in every emergency. The condition of the market, then, depends in the first place upon the amount of the reserve held by the Bank of England. But the Bank of England reserve itself depends upon the amount of gold held by the Bank. Now for several years past there has been a drain upon the gold held by the Banks of England and France. First on account of Germany, when she exchanged a silver for a gold currency; then on account of the United States, when they resumed specie payments; then on account of Italy, when it followed the example of the United States; and now a drain has set in on account of Australasia. The stock of gold held by the Bank, therefore, is much smaller than it was some time ago; so small, indeed, that the Directors of the Bank are obliged carefully to watch that it be not seriously diminished further. When, therefore, they see any reason to believe that a new drain is beginning, they are bound to adopt the only measure within their power for protecting their supply of gold; that is to say, to raise their rate of discount, and thereby increase the value of money in London. The step they took last week has now rendered the rate payable in the short-loan market of London higher than in any of the great Continental cities or New York. The first cause, then, of the enhancement of the value of money in London is the export of gold to Australia that has recently taken place.

How is it that gold has been sent from this country to Australia? Australia is a producer of gold, and hitherto has always been a seller of the metal. How is it that Australasian banks should have imported gold into England, and then exported it back again to the place of its production? To send it round the world in this way seems to be a very unprofitable business, and no doubt it must be so. That the banks have found themselves compelled to export gold notwithstanding the unprofitableness of the transaction is proof that they have not displayed very much foresight. Usually the value of the exports from this country to Australasia is much higher than the value of the imports of Australasian commodities into the United Kingdom. Consequently, the Australasian Colonies have to send gold here to make up the balance, every now and then borrowing to completely settle their account. But quite lately the position has temporarily changed so as to give the Australasian Colonies a command over the London money market, which they usually have not. There has been for several years past a very active speculation in the Australasian Colonies. The banks have lent money largely to "squatters" to buy their holdings, to "planters" to develop their sugar plantations, and generally they have increased largely their advances in every way. During the single year ended with September last the increase in their loans has amounted to over 7 millions sterling. But at the same time they have been allowing their supply of gold to diminish. The banks, of course, are able to make their advances to merchants and others only out of their deposits; that is to say, they themselves borrow in the first place the money they lend to their customers, and the deposits are repayable in gold. Some of our contemporaries have been pointing out that the coin reserves of the banks do not amount to one-eighth of their liabilities; but it is to be borne in mind that a large proportion of the deposits held by the Australasian banks are lodged with them for fixed periods of a year or more. They are not, therefore, repayable on demand, and consequently the banks are not bound to keep always a coin reserve to meet these deposits. Still it is evident from the fact that the banks have been obliged to send gold to Australasia that they felt their coin reserves to be insufficient. They had clearly been doing a risky business, using up their resources too fast without exerting themselves to replenish them, and they at length wakened up to the conviction that an accident might cause disaster. They have been enabled to send out gold to make up their reserves by a combination of favourable circumstances. The exports of wool from Australasia to this country are larger this year than last year; and at the same time the wheat harvest seems to be exceptionally good. It is estimated that the exports of wheat from the Australasian Colonies will this year exceed those of last year by about 6 millions sterling. There will, therefore, be a smaller debt due by the Australasian Colonies to this country than in past years. At the same time, the Governments and local authorities of the Australasian Colonies have during the past few months been borrowing very largely in the London money market, and the banks and mortgage Companies have also been borrowing deposits largely. The loans made to the Governments and the deposits received by the banks not only set off the debt due by the Australasian Colonies to this country, but leave in the hands of the banks a considerable surplus, which they are free to employ as they please; and several of them, as already stated, have found it expedient to ship a portion of this surplus in gold to make up their coin reserves. The amount so sent in itself is not large; and had it been remitted to Paris, or to any other part of the Continent, it would have had little effect upon the London money market. But for some time past we have been depending upon Australasia alone for any considerable gold supply. Since the resumption of specie payment in the United States, the whole yield of the Californian mines has been retained at home. And, since the adoption of a gold currency by Germany, the whole yield of the Russian mines has been retained in Russia and Germany. We have, therefore, been dependent upon the Australasian mines for our gold supply. And the fact that the Australasian banks have begun to take gold from us and send it back to Australasia shows that for some time to come at least this supply will be cut off. But at all times there are demands of greater or less amounts upon the Bank of England for gold. London is the centre of the banking system of the world, and demands are constantly coming upon it for Egypt, the Continent, North and South America, and elsewhere, which have to be honoured. Moreover, there are always possibilities of accident of one kind or another. A considerable war might necessitate the remittance of large sums of gold to pay the troops and provide provisions. Or a panic in Paris or New York might lead to a drain of gold from London. The Directors of the Bank of England, therefore, knowing that their supply of gold is small, that they have kept it up for some months past in spite of an export of the metal of over 3½ millions sterling solely by withdrawing gold from the home circulation, and that they cannot hope for a fresh supply from Australasia for some time to come, felt it incumbent on them to adopt measures to protect their supply, and if possible to attract gold from the Continent or New York.

Some other causes have, no doubt, had their influence upon the minds of the Directors. Since the failure of Messrs. P. W. Thomas, Sons, & Co. there have been apprehensions in the City that other embarrassments would come to light. There may, perhaps, be little ground for these rumours. In any event they probably are a good deal exaggerated. But the fact that they exist has to be taken into account. For the moment a shock has been given to credit, banks are cautious how they act, and all who have large liabilities desire to strengthen themselves. Furthermore, there have been rumours of financial difficulties of various kinds in the provinces. Under these circumstances it is desirable that the Bank of England should increase its reserve. Whenever the Bank's reserve steadily decreases, the City becomes apprehensive. In its present temper, when it had come to see that for some time to come no fresh supply of gold could be expected, it would have easily fallen into alarm had the drain of gold been allowed to go on. Merely then as means of restoring confidence the action of the Bank Directors is to be approved. Over and above all these causes, another influence has been tending to enhance the interest payable for loanable capital in the short loan market. When Mr. Lowe was Chancellor of the Exchequer he made a change in the collection of certain taxes which had for result to make the amount of taxes collected in the last quarter of the financial year much larger than in any other single quarter. As the taxes are paid into the Bank of England, the effect of this, so far as the money market is concerned, is to withdraw from all other banks of the country money that could be used in lending and discounting, and to transfer it to the control of the Bank of England. The other banks, therefore, have smaller resources than usual, and the Bank of England has larger resources. But the Bank of England usually charges a higher rate than the other banks, and, therefore, the mere fact that the Bank of England has a greater control over the money market than at other times tends to enhance the value of money. The Bank of England, of course, would not take advantage of this circumstance to raise its rate of discount. On the contrary, the Directors recognize that their privilege as bankers of the Government obliges them to give exceptional facilities at this season of the year to trade. But the fact, nevertheless, has enabled the Bank of England to act with greater effect upon the money market than it could at any other time. For the rates charged by the other banks being very nearly up to those charged by the Bank of England, when the Directors of the Bank of England found it expedient to raise their rate the other banks have been obliged to follow their example. The result is to make it more probable that the action of the Bank will be effective, and therefore that the Directors will not have again to raise their rate. But of course it is too soon yet to form any definite opinion upon that point.

REVIEWS.

HER MAJESTY'S "LEAVES."*

THE reviewers can necessarily have little to say on these later "Leaves" from Her Majesty's journals. For in their style and general arrangement they are precisely similar to those in her former book, and every one has read the Journal of a Life in the Highlands. Nothing could be a more conclusive proof of its popularity than the immense circulation it has obtained in cheap editions. And there are good reasons why it should have been permanently popular, independently of the notoriety assured by its authorship. It suggested to the many who are in the habit of feeling rather than thinking how Her Majesty has made herself universally beloved. It showed her in her home circle as the happy wife and mother, living and moving and sunning herself in the warm atmosphere of the affections. She felt the heavy cares and anxieties of her station; no doubt she had mourned the loss of some devoted servants; but till then she had been mercifully spared any crushing domestic bereavement. She had learned to lean, perhaps to lean too much considering the uncertainty of life, on the strong arm of a husband whose heart had always beat in unison with her own. It was to him she turned for advice in all circumstances, as he was the most cheerful and sympathetic of companions in the excursions both loved so well. Consequently in the former journal, from the beginning to the end, it was the Prince who was brought forward in every page; whose individuality in one form or another invariably lent those pages their gayest colouring. In the volume before us all is changed; the bright colours have faded out, and a long and lasting shadow has fallen over everything. The Queen, in her faithfulness to her beloved husband's memory, has striven to resume their former habits. She feels, as she told Dr. Norman Macleod, that changes of scene, with relaxation, are absolutely necessary if she is to fulfil the imperative duties of her station. She still goes on the long drives and rides through the most romantic scenery of the Highlands, and she is still happy in having affectionate daughters for companions. She can still endure her life, and can enjoy the beauties of nature. But an eternal sense of pain underlies superficial distractions, and the saddest associations are awakened when she revisits the most cherished scenes. Even when she makes acquaintance with picturesque spots where her husband had never been, she remembers how he would have delighted in all that excites her admiration. Such natural feelings must be altogether beyond the control of earnest natures that have attached themselves passionately, and it is a proof of the Queen's assurance of her subjects' sympathy that she has made no effort to conceal them. Yet, on the other hand, there is no morbid indulgence in grief; she not only perseveres in the recreations that may often be more trying than actual tasks, but her practical charity has been quickened by her own heartfelt afflictions. We see her by the bedsides of the sick and dying, as we meet her at the funerals of the relatives of her faithful servants; and she is just as ready to take a part in their homely merrymakings—to look on at a Highland dance or be present at a cottage christening. But our readers will probably be grateful to us if we pass on, to give some variety of extracts from the Journal.

The first of the entries, dated in August 1862, strikes the keynote of the tone of the melancholy which pervades the volume. It describes the writer's feelings when she had driven up the hills on Deeside in her pony chaise to examine the cairn which was being built in memory of her husband. "I actually drove in the little carriage to the very top, turning off from the path and following the track where the carts had gone. Grant and Duncan pushed the carriage behind. Sweet baby (Beatrice) we found at the top. The view was so fine, the day so bright, and the heather so beautifully pink—but no pleasure, no joy! all dead!"

And here at the top is the foundation of the Cairn—forty feet wide—to be erected to my precious Albert, which will be seen all down the valley. I and my poor six orphans all placed stones in it; and our initials, as well as those of the three absent ones, are to be carved on stones all round it. I felt very shaky and nervous.

A few days afterwards, on the anniversary of the Prince's birthday, she makes a pilgrimage to the "Old Cairn"; and the remarks of one of the gillies in attendance show the respectful freedoms she encourages in her "loyal Highlanders," especially when she knew them to have been attached to the Prince:—

We went to see the obelisk building to his dear memory; Bertie left us there, and we went on round by the village, up Craig-Gowan in the little carriage, over the heather till we reached near to the old cairn of 1852. Grant said:—"I thought you would like to be here to-day on his birthday"!—so entirely was he of opinion that this beloved day, even the 5th of December, must not be looked upon as a day of mourning. "That's not the light to look at it." There is so much true and strong faith in these good, simple people.

The visit paid in the following autumn to the Duke of Athole at Blair was a sad meeting on both sides:—

The Duchess was much affected, still more so when she got into the carriage with me. Lenchen and the others went in the boat-carriage, the one we had gone in but two years ago. We drove at once to the house which we had visited in such joyful and high spirits (October 9) two years ago. The Duchess took me to the same room which I had been in on that day; and, after talking to me a little of their dreadful affliction (the Duke was suffering from an incurable illness), she went to see if the Duke was ready. She soon returned, and I followed her downstairs along the passage, full of stags' horns, which we walked along, together with the poor Duke, in 1861. When I went in, I found him standing up, very much altered; it was very sad. He kissed my hand; gave me the white rose which, according to tradition, is presented by the Lords of Athole on the occasion of the Sovereign's visit; and we sat a little time with him. It is a small room, full of his rifles and other implements and attributes of sport, now for ever useless to him. A sad, sad contrast; he seemed very much pleased and gratified. . . . The poor Duke insisted on going with me to the station, and he went in the carriage with the Duchess and me. At the station he got out, walked about, and gave directions. I embraced the dear Duchess, and gave the Duke my hand, saying, "Dear Duke, God bless you!" He had asked permission that his men, the same who had gone with us through the glen on that happy day two years ago, might give me a cheer, and he led them on himself. Oh! it was so dreadfully sad. To think of the contrast to this time two years ago, when my darling was so well and I so happy with him, and just beginning to recover from my great sorrow for dearest mama's death—looking forward to many more such delightful expeditions; and the poor Duke then full of health and strength, walking the whole way.

The next visit to the widowed Duchess was in her cottage in the beautiful grounds of Dunkeld. In the getting there and the going back there was more excitement, as there was more roughing; and the expedition illustrates the way in which Her Majesty covers long distances in the Highlands, when the short cuts across moss and moor strike away from the regular and well-kept carriage roads. The party had started early from Balmoral in a threatening and misty morning; but when plans are arranged beforehand in the Highlands weather must never be suffered to interfere. They posted to Castleton of Braemar through steady rain. Then followed the long weary stage through the grim Spital of Glenshee, where all enjoyment depends on the doubtful chance of sunshine. There was a thick mist which obscured everything. Shortly after changing horses at the Spital, they pulled up to lunch in the carriage. On the Blairgowrie road they were met by a local laird on horseback, who guided them over the byways to a farmhouse, where ponies were in waiting by appointment. Her Majesty's Highland stables must be well appointed:—

We mounted our ponies (I on dear Fyvie, Lenchen on Brechin) and started on our course across the hills. There was much mist. This obscured all the view, which otherwise would have been very fine. At first there was a rough road, but soon there was nothing but a sheep-track, and hardly that, through heather and stones, up a pretty steep hill. Mr. Keir could not keep up with the immense pace of Brown and Fyvie, which distanced every one; so he had to drop behind and his keeper acted as guide. There was by this time heavy driving rain with a thickening mist. About a little more than an hour took us to the "March," where two of the Dunkeld men met us. . . . Here dripping wet (at Loch Ardie) we arrived about a quarter past six. It was dark already from the very bad weather. We went into a lodge here and had tea and whisky, and Lenchen had to get herself dried as she was so wet.

At Loch Ardie they left the ponies for a carriage. In a dense pine-wood they missed the road, and could only move forward through the darkness at a foot's pace, Brown walking at the heads of the horses, Grant going before with a carriage lamp. At last they saw lights in the windows of a keeper's lodge, and then they came out upon a good driving road. It was an agreeable surprise, even to the Duchess of Athole, who had altogether lost her bearings, though in her husband's "country." It was a quarter to nine before she welcomed her Royal guest into her "nice, snug little cottage" at Dunkeld.

Though the Queen lost her way in taking a short cut, that picturesque district between Blairgowrie and Dunkeld is familiar enough to the ordinary tourist. So are the shores of Loch Maree, where she spent a few pleasant days in the "Loch Maree Hotel"; and the wild valley of Glencoe, where she wandered about the scenes of the massacre. But she made her way too into the most remote nooks of the Highlands, given over to deer, grouse, and eagles, where the commonplace traveller seldom ventures. There is nothing more savage in Scotland than Torridon, to the north of the wild Applecross district, which has been broken up into sundry forests since it was sold by the late Duke of Leeds, who had bought it from the Mackenzies.

We came to the Upper Loch Toriden, which is almost landlocked and very pretty. In the distance the hills of Skye were seen. Village there really is none, and the inn is merely a small, one-storied, "hurled" house, with small windows. We drove beyond the habitations to a turn where we could not be overlooked, and scrambled up a bank, where we seated ourselves, and at twenty minutes to three took our luncheon with good appetite. The air off the mountains and the sea was delicious and not muggy. We two remained sketching, for the view was beautiful. To the right were the hills of Skye, rising above the lower purple ones which closed in the loch. . . . We were nearly an hour sitting there, and it was so fine, and such a wild uncivilized spot, like the end of the world. . . . An old man, very tottery, passed where I was sketching, and I asked the Duchess of Roxburghe to speak to him; he seemed strange, said he had come from America, and was going to England, and thought Toriden very ugly.

In scenery almost as savage, and of greater historical interest, the Queen's fancy would conjure up the history of the troubled past, and she was reminded of the political changes which made her present journeys so peaceful. On the desolate banks of the lonely Loch Shiel she remembers that

In 1746 poor Prince Charles was a fugitive hiding in the mountains on the sides of Loch Arkaig or Loch Shiel. As we suddenly came upon Loch Shiel from the narrow glen, lit up by bright sunshine, with the fine long loch and the rugged mountains, which are about 3,000 feet high, rising all around, no habitation or building to be seen, except the house of Glenaladall, which used to be an inn, and a large picturesque Catholic Church, reminding one, from its elevated position to the right and above the house, of churches and convents abroad, I thought I never saw a lovelier or more romantic spot, or one which told its history so well. What a scene it must have been in 1745! And here was I, the descendant of the Stuarts and by the very King whom Prince Charles sought to overthrow, sitting and walking about quite privately and peaceably.

Although, we are sorry to say, it was not always that she was permitted to walk about so peaceably and privately. On one occasion she was beset by a band of irrepressible reporters for the Scotch papers, who, having stalked Her Majesty's party like a herd of deer, lay down afterwards on the heather to study them leisurely through telescopes. The chief of them nearly passed from words to blows with the sturdy John Brown, who, we doubt not, was rather rough and peremptory under the strong provocation of the circumstances. And after the dedication we have already quoted, we need scarcely add that that trusted servant of the Queen figures conspicuously in many of her pages. He was always either seated on the box of her carriage, or walking at the bridle of her pony, and was never beyond call when she was in residence anywhere. On her rough-and-ready mountain expeditions he generally waited at table. And so entirely had his fidelity won on her confidence that it was Brown who was usually charged with the painful and delicate duty of breaking any shock that was sure to be painful. It was he who announced the death of Dr. Norman Macleod. It was he who brought the terrible news that the young Prince Imperial had been speared by the Zulus. Nor does Her Majesty ever miss an opportunity of expressing her gratitude for his devotion.

We have done our best to give a fair idea of the varied contents of the volume; but we feel that tearing a leaf here and there into tatters is unfair to any book, and we can only recommend Her Majesty's subjects to read Her Majesty's Journal for themselves.

THREE NOVELS.*

MR. PAYN'S latest novel differs widely, in many respects, from its numerous predecessors. Indeed, but for the jokes which he puts into the mouth of his much-tried Canon, and which sometimes sparkle up throughout the work, it may be doubted whether many of Mr. Payn's most constant readers would recognize The Canon's Ward as coming from the pen of one of the most popular of contemporary novelists. Hitherto the crimes committed by his villains have been of a robust nature, but Mr. Payn has grown weary of substitutions and impersonations and mere ordinary murders, and has decided to delineate the troubles in which a young lady involves herself by a clandestine marriage. Not that there is no murder here, but it is a mere hors d'œuvre thrown in by way of settling the villain. In his new task Mr. Payn's proverbial modesty of style has proved almost too much for him. He hints at the natural consequences of the marriage, and then, overcome with confusion at the sight of his own words, he covers his face, and makes his plot obscure, seeming to exclaim, "No, no, I did not mean that—I meant nothing but what was strictly proper." And the result is that the last page is reached before the reader can make up his bewildered mind whether the heroine's very precocious infant, answering to the name of "Willie," is the child of Sophy Gilbert's first or second husband.

As regards the love-making of the story, Mr. Payn has proved faithful to one of his own traditions. The oldest of the lovers in The Canon's Ward (we do not reckon Mr. Mavors, for he never has a chance) is presumably not three-and-twenty, for he has not yet taken his degree. This is the most advanced age at which Mr. Payn will allow the tender passion to be felt with any reasonable prospect of success, and most of his heroines are wives and mothers before they are out of their teens. Miss Sophy Gilbert has, however, passed her twentieth birthday before we make her acquaintance. She is living at Cambridge with her guardian, Canon Aldred, and his maiden sister, and as a pretty, lively girl possessed of twenty thousand pounds, and blue or hazel eyes (compare vol. i., pp. 35 and 238), is the object of adoration of the whole university. Her guardian has looked with disfavour on the attentions of Mr. Herbert Perry—known as Pink Perry, from his complexion—the handsome and disreputable stroke of the Third Trinity boat (Third Trinity is not wholly composed, as Mr. Payn thinks, of Eton men), and is anxious to incline the heart of his ward to his own protégé, hatchet-faced Mr. Adair, a villain of the old type. Adair has been witness of a meeting between Perry and Miss Gilbert in the Roundabout, and has drawn conclusions highly unfavourable to the young lady. He does not scruple to let her know this fact, and to make use of his hold over her by compelling her to consent to see him in spite of her terror. Matters are in this state when Mr. Perry threatens one day to disclose their private marriage to his father, and actually goes home and writes the necessary letter. It is never sent, however; for, before it is posted, he drowns himself accidentally, and the letter is stolen from his table by Sophy's maid, Jeannette, whose baptismal name was Susan (vol. i., p. 158), yet who was "née Jenny" (vol. ii., p. 86). This Jeannette is the kind of waiting-maid with whom old English plays and modern French dramas have made us familiar, only she has not half the intelligence of her prototypes. She had been the solitary witness of Sophy's marriage, and the confidante of the subsequent interviews of husband and wife; yet she does not understand the unfortunate Sophy's real predicament, though she continues to urge her union with Adair. This, at least, is what we gather from the conversation between mistress and maid in vol. ii., p. 135; but it may really be only Mr. Payn's modesty again asserting itself. Anyhow, Sophy prefers marriage, with a man whom she hates and despises, to a confession to her indulgent guardian of a love affair which, though silly and sly, was not criminal. And, what is even more astounding, she postpones the ceremony till Adair has taken his degree, six months after she became a widow. We are not told how the world regarded the excessively precocious appearance of Willie on the scene; but, as far as we can make out, no one seems to have given a thought to this unusual circumstance. Adair goes rapidly downhill from the moment of his marriage. In real life, Sophy's position would have been infinitely worse than if she had made no second marriage. In five years we find him swindling the public by means of bubble companies, inducing the Canon, as trustee of Mrs. Adair's fortune, to advance him fifteen thousand pounds to buy himself a partnership, and then reclaiming the amount on behalf of Sophy's child; and finally insuring the child's life for a large sum preparatory to poisoning him. Of course all these diabolical schemes come to nothing in the end: Mr. Payn knows better what is due to the feelings of the British public than to permit the wicked to prosper. So a boy's eye applied to a hole in the curtain (what a premium on untidiness!) discovers the murderer; an ancient admirer of Sophy's restores the Canon to affluence by a legacy; and Adair, while seeking to escape to the Continent with his ill-gotten gains, is tracked by an accomplice, and murdered in a cellar near the river. It is not every woman who can boast of having lost two husbands by violent deaths, and of being thankful to be rid of both of them. In spite of the absolute impossibility of the main facts of the story, and the unattractiveness of the heroine, The Canon's Ward is an amusing and exciting book. The very obscurity of which we have spoken keeps our minds on the stretch, and a far duller work would be redeemed by descriptions like the following of Mr. Adair:—"He was certainly thin, thinner in his suit of evening clothes than usual, and still thinner in comparison with Mr. Mavors, who not only towered above him, but appeared on either side of him, giving the young scholar for the moment the remarkable appearance of having four arms." The tale is full of good things and good stories. The character of the Canon, with his unfailing humour and consolatory quotations from Milton, is admirable; admirable, too, is the young lawyer Irton, and there is much amusement to be derived from Mr. Payn's unconcealed dislike of law, mathematics, and athletes who are nothing but athletes. Still a heroine of Mr. Payn's who is sournoise, and who steals letters, is so startling, and so unlike Mr. Payn's general method and favourite fair ones, that we confess we have derived more pleasure from other works by the same diverting author.

In vol. iii. p. 293 of Susan Drummond there occurs this sentence, which forms part of a soliloquy indulged in by the hero Nicholas Gayre:—"One short year ago had any one said, 'You will behave to the girl you love like a cad, you will try to shirk your duty to your neighbour, and strive to skulk by on the other side if you can; you will ask a woman for money who you know has always hoped you would marry her, and accept substantial help, though you are well aware you never had a feeling of affection for her.'" These words are a fair summary of the story of Susan Drummond, a fearless sweet-natured girl, lovely to look upon, who was first seen by Nicholas Gayre, formerly colonel, now banker, riding through Hyde Park. For love of her this commonplace representative of the most conservative of banking houses neglects his business, and frequents the society of his brother-in-law, Sir Geoffrey Chelston, and his beautiful daughter, old friends of the fascinating Susan's. This is more of a sacrifice than it sounds, for the baronet is a gentleman of the most disreputable type, who is introduced to us in the beginning as lacking even one redeeming quality. In the course of the story, however, he develops quite a reasonable number of virtues, and most readers will greatly prefer him to the excessively rude and sneering Mr. Gayre. We hear about "plain-spoken men of business," but if many are as "plain-spoken" as Mr. Gayre, murders will become more frequent and duelling revive. He addresses an acquaintance, Mr. Sudlow, in these terms:—"You do not amuse, and you do not instruct me. I have no daughter I want you to marry, and I have money enough of my own without trying to rob you of any of yours. If you discover why I am civil to you, tell me." Instead of cutting Mr. Gayre's acquaintance on the spot, Mr. Sudlow begs for an introduction to that gentleman's niece, Miss Chelston, to whom he subsequently proposes. When, however, he realizes that the damsel will have nothing but her beauty, and that Mr. Gayre by no means intends to make her his heiress, he shows symptoms of backsliding, upon which the furious banker threatens him with an action for breach of promise. Surely the British army and the banking confraternity will not remain quiet under such an imputation on one of their order. No censure is, however, passed on Mr. Gayre.

The banker is, however, remarkably unfortunate in his love affairs. Not only is Miss Susan Drummond quite indifferent to his passion, but she makes use of it in order to obtain the release of her lover, Mr. Oliver Dane, unjustly imprisoned for forgery and theft. In fact, she treats poor Mr. Gayre as the heroine of The Scrap of Paper treats her lover, and declines to think or speak of anything till the banker has obtained Oliver Dane's release. At last a very improbable series of events gives Gayre the clue; but he wrings a consent from Susan to be his wife as the price of her lover's freedom. It is not from any return to virtue on Gayre's part that the compact is not fulfilled, but merely because in order to get money to carry on the business, he applies to a rich widow who has long been in love with him, and proposes to her as her reward for the loan. We are glad to say that the widow soon finds out that they are unsuited, and we leave Mr. Gayre in the last chapter still sneering, and on the point of marrying a third lady.

In spite of a very faulty construction of the story, of occasional slips in grammar, and of a frequent clumsiness in style, the success of Mrs. Riddell's last novel is ensured by the leading character, Sir Geoffrey Chelston. He stands before us, from the first page to the last, perfectly consistent with himself, though not with the original description of him, always attempting to take care of number one, yet always coming to grief in the process. He represents himself to the world as the victim of circumstances, and notwithstanding his exterior (which is that of a groom), succeeds in taking in various people who hope to make money out of him. His good spirits are unfailing, and his sense of humour tolerably keen, and it is with some satisfaction that we see that the inherited instincts and tact of a gentleman come to the surface even in this reprobate, for he knows how to console Susan in her trouble, while the good intentions of the others only irritate the girl. Sir Geoffrey is one of the cleverest portraits that has been drawn for many a day, and Mrs. Riddell deserves all the more praise for her work, from the fact that he is entirely unlike the hard-working City men with whom her pen has made us familiar. Sir Geoffrey, who is at first described as a kind of Sir Francis Clavering, develops humour and affection and tact as the story goes on. The author obviously delights in him (his is a part for Mr. Arthur Cecil), and so will all her readers. His presence makes up for the almost total eclipse and absence of the chief lover, Mr. Oliver Dane, who is a kind of invisible prince, a character spoken of, not seen, like the widow in Forget Me Not, after the widow's part was cut out by an economical management. The heartless, false daughter of Sir Geoffrey is a clever study. Mrs. Riddell thinks apparently that an "old Elzevir" is necessarily a thing of price. All novelists think so; but half-a-crown is a fair average tariff for Elzevirs.

The Building of St. Barnabas has almost every fault which a novel can have. It is often ungrammatical; it exhibits no knowledge of life; it is occasionally coarse; but, above all, it is dull—so dull that we doubt whether any one, not inspired with a strong sense of duty, could ever arrive at the last page. The plot is simple. Michael Warner is lying on his death-bed, and sends for his lawyer to make his will. Being a spiteful old man, he resolves to keep his nephew and natural heir in suspense as to his intentions as long as possible, so bequeaths 5,000*l.* to build a church, and 7,000*l.* more for the same purpose, provided the church is finished within four years of his death. Should the church not be completed, all the money, except the original 5,000*l.*, is to go to Stephen Rushworth, the nephew. The reason given for the name of the church is characteristic of the book, and is a sample of the humour it contains. "They say Barnabas was the son of consolation, and I intend it to be awfully consoling to that scamp Stephen when he hears my will read."

From this point the whole story is a dreary and prolix record of attempts to raise enough money to ensure the building of the church within the required time, and the unwilling reader is dragged to vestry meetings attended by men with such names as Basso, Dipink, and Riskall, or forced to assist at lengthy conversations between Mr. and Mrs. Dittany, the vicar and his wife. The choice or invention of such names is a true indication of the style of the book. Then we have interminable descriptions of the town of Thoroton, where the church was to be erected, and of the local quarrels. Some of these descriptions read like a schoolgirl's translation of a German philosophical work, as, for instance, the sentence on page 6, vol. i. "But the chief pride of Thoroton was the river, which was crossed just before the shops began by a noble bridge, erected, as strangers sufficiently were informed, by the proud inhabitants, by the great Telford himself." Nowhere is there a spark of humour, of true insight, or of human interest. Everybody is low and sordid when they are not criminal, and we certainly could wish for a little of Mr. Payn's shyness in the story of the fall of Mary Lowbridge. The incident is hinted at in the crudest way, and without a single excuse for either of the sinners. Altogether The Building of St. Barnabas is to be avoided by every class of reader.

FIFTY YEARS OF IRISH CONCESSION.*

WE do not suppose that any one will quarrel with Mr. Barry O'Brien's general principle that "English politicians, publicists, and legislators, who speak, write, and vote on Irish questions, should make an effort to understand those questions." But when Mr. O'Brien instances Mr. Bright as a perfect and almost unapproachable example of the successful study of Irish questions, it becomes painfully obvious what Mr. O'Brien means by understanding. Mr. Bright studied the Irish question as he studied the Crimean War, the American Civil War, the Indian Mutiny, and every other public question of the kind, down to the bombardment of Alexandria the other day, with, as starting-point, the general axiom that his own country was in the wrong. If this is a necessity of mental attitude, we for our part, who yet venture to think that we have studied Irish questions and Irish history with some care, acknowledge freely that we cannot satisfy Mr. O'Brien. To give him his due, he promptly disavows any intention of reviving disagreeable recollections. He wishes that "whatever there is of unpleasantness should be forgotten," and so forth. This is very creditable, but how, for instance, does this philosophic and amiable temper square with Mr. O'Brien's description of such a man as Lord Clare? Mr. Fitzgibbon or Lord Clare was one of the most distinguished of all Irishmen. His rancorous enemies themselves acknowledged his extraordinary ability. It is granted even by those enemies that the Union for which he did so much not only did him no good but practically deprived him of a perpetual Viceroyalty in his own country. His temper, no doubt, was harsh and unconciliatory, and the measures which he advocated were only defensible in such times as the time of the accomplished French and the attempted Irish Revolution. But he himself explained his position in a famous speech which Mr. O'Brien quotes. His belief and his justification was that nothing but Protestant ascendency could give Ireland herself prosperity and tranquillity, or the Empire political union and strength. He might be right or he might be wrong in his methods; but loyalty to the Sovereign and the Constitution of Ireland were the unquestionable motives which actuated him. Now let us hear Mr. O'Brien's character of this great man:—

> The grand passion of this extraordinary man's heart was a consuming hatred of the land which had given him birth. But let justice be done to him. His hate was impartial. Catholics and Protestants, landlords and tenants, were all equally and thoroughly the subjects of his dislike and anger. To have been born an Irishman, no matter of what class or creed, was all sufficient to earn the lasting enmity of John Fitzgibbon, Earl of Clare.

This insane diatribe is followed up by another in which Lord Clare, after compliments to his intellectual abilities, is described as "animated by not one pure and noble sentiment, and influenced by not a single just and honourable principle." This has the familiar, the wearisome, and, above all, the hopeless ring of Irish political controversy. For it all means simply this, that John Fitzgibbon was a loyal Irish-Englishman who took facts and history to be history and facts, and did not believe with Mr. O'Brien that provincialism was patriotism, and that an imaginary Irish nation which never has in any solid fashion existed historically from the foundation of the world ought to absorb the devotion of Irishmen. Mr. O'Brien himself carefully avoids extreme Separatist or Nationalist expressions. But his whole book is pervaded by the grand Irish fallacy that a man who accepts the historical and inevitable relation of the smaller of the British islands to the larger is somehow a traitor and a scoundrel. All over the volume there is the silly railing at "the Castle" which is characteristic of this fallacy. As Mr. O'Brien has been good enough to indicate the spirit in which the history of Ireland should be studied, we may fairly in our turn retaliate. Neither he nor any one else will ever study the history of Ireland to any purpose unless he keeps before him the following facts—first, that, save in semi-mythical and semi-savage ages, Ireland never has been a single, independent, substantive nation: secondly, that for seven hundred years of authentic history it has been a part of a single, independent, and substantive nation; thirdly, that England, in the narrow sense, has (doubtless often in a very injudicious fashion) unceasingly striven to introduce good government into Ireland; fourthly, that a section of the inhabitants of Ireland have unceasingly striven to substitute anarchy therefor. These four historical facts all the leagues, all the platform eloquence, all the newspaper abuse in the world will never disprove; and no one who refuses to recognize them, however pure his intentions, however untiring his labour, will ever succeed in taking a true view of Irish history or of Irish politics.

Mr. O'Brien's prejudices have, however, done more than lead him into occasional absurdities like the above horns-and-tail portrait of Fitzgibbon. They have led him to some curious oddities of arrangement. His book is entitled Fifty Years of Concession, the terminus ad quem being 1881, and this volume takes him nearly to the end of the first decade. But he has considered it necessary to prelude the discussion of concessions in Irish education, economics, and franchise law by an elaborate account of certain events towards the close of the last century, which he thinks useful for the understanding of the later history. Unfortunately this lengthy exordium deals only with the comparatively orderly and constitutional agitation for the franchise, which was terminated by the concessions of 1793. Now there is something to be said in favour of the proposition that it would have been not unwise to grant not merely the franchise but complete emancipation early in the revolutionary period. On the one hand the Protestants of the North were honeycombed with republican sentiment, had but recently behaved in something not unlike a treasonable fashion, and by their attitude in the independent Parliament had shown a very considerable lack of patriotism. On the other, the Roman Catholic clergy were thoroughly hostile to Republicanism, the Roman Catholic aristocracy were thoroughly loyal and trustworthy, and the mass of the Roman Catholics of lower rank had been well disciplined by a century of firm government. This view, however, with the few historic facts necessary to illustrate it, might have been put very briefly; while Mr. O'Brien's actual course has the singular result of giving the constitutional agitation fully, and passing over entirely the rebellion and the anarchy which marked the last years of the century. No doubt he is entirely guiltless of any attempt at suppression. But you cannot take a slice of a history and give it to the reader, telling him when he has finished that he shall have another slice cut out of a different part. All history is continuous, and all history requires continuous knowledge to explain itself.

These grave drawbacks of spirit and of plan do not, of course, prevent the book from containing much useful information. Beginning nominally, and with the curious excursus already quoted, at 1831, Mr. O'Brien has nothing to do directly with emancipation. He starts with the Irish Reform Bill of 1832, and with the education arrangements of the previous year. The history of the education question is curious, and worth reading. Afterwards he takes up the tithe war, of course adopting the utterly illogical position that it was wrong to tax Roman Catholics for the support of another Church, and forgetting that in reality the farmers and peasants paid their land subject to a certain impost, and that the destination of the amount of that impost no more concerned them than it concerned them whether the recipients of the tithe bought blue coats or brown ones with the money. Then we have the Poor Law, and then the Municipal Reform Act of 1840. Except that Mr. O'Brien has a bad habit of making his quotations at second or third hand, he is a careful and, as far as his abiding prejudices will let him be, an impartial historian. Impartial, unfortunately, those prejudices will not let him be in any considerable degree. His expostulation with Whately (a person whom, for our parts, we have no very great care to defend), "Did he think that the Irish people were to be denationalized and Anglicised," &c., shows that pretty clearly. So long as any man thinks that Anglicizing is for an Irishman denationalizing, so long will he be in a state of outer darkness about the facts of the case. But Mr. O'Brien's natural fairness (a quality which we have the greater pleasure in acknowledging in many, perhaps the majority, of Irish writers, in that we have frequent occasion to stigmatize the fatal delusions which make that fairness of none effect) is shown by his very frank statement that Wolfe Tone "hated England profoundly." Mr. O'Brien is so scrupulously fair that he quotes as a testimony to the wrongs of Ireland the following absurd sentence, in which the egregious M. Duvergier de Hauranne says, that in established churches in Ireland "the ringer rings the bell for the curate and the sacristan, the sacristan takes up his halbert for the ringer and the curate, and the curate preaches for the two," perhaps one of the most delightful instances of the way in which Frenchmen carry France everywhere that can be found. A curious outbreak against the author's namesake—Sir Lucius O'Brien—on p. 571, deserves to be consulted by readers of the book, for it is characteristic of the author's attitude, as is his remark that in a certain commission "only Englishmen or ascendency men had been appointed; no popular appointments had been made." Nor is it unsymptomatic that Mr. O'Brien, apparently without the faintest idea of what he is doing, quotes pages of the impertinent personalities, alternated by withdrawals as soon as the situation became serious, of which O'Connell set a constantly copied example to a series of Irish patriots who have not succeeded in reaching even his own level of patriotism or conviction, and that he describes one of Shiel's gaseous orations as having crushed (whom does the reader think?) Lord Lyndhurst.

We part from Mr. O'Brien in no unkind spirit. In the first place, he has given us in this volume, and is pretty certain to give us in his next, valuable instances of the characteristics which make his countrymen utterly impossible as conductors of their own affairs, and thus he has done a service. In the second, he has shown the pluck, the manful fidelity against rhyme and reason, the generous if rather scatter-brained loyalty to ideals, and the gratitude to even very dubious benefactors, which are among the numerous private merits of Irishmen. He has arranged a valuable, if not an extraordinarily well-planned, collection of those facts of Irish history which are mortal to his own cherished desires; and, last not least, he has recalled public attention to that admirable speech of Fitzgibbon's which is at once the most complete defence of the much-reviled English rule during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and the strongest argument against the system of concession which has been pursued during the nineteenth. We may not now agree with everything that the great Irish lawyer and statesman then said; we may think that his policy was too nakedly coercive, his attitude too uncompromisingly hostile; but his triumphant reply to the Bishop of Killala—a reply to which Mr. Froude has done rather less than more justice than should be done—contains the end and the beginning of Irish government according to rational principles and to the teachings of history.

SOME BOOKS ON LOGIC.*

WHEN, about seven years ago, Mr. Bradley published his Ethical Studies, he confessed in his preface that too much of his book was polemical. At the beginning of his new book on logic he makes the self-same confession. Now confession without contrition is naught, and we cannot bring ourselves to believe that he is really contrite. We heartily agree with him that he is too polemical, and will add that he has thereby done much towards spoiling his two books. He seems to have persuaded himself that his fellow-countrymen lie in bondage to the system of J. S. Mill, and that it is his duty on all occasions to raise his voice loudly and harshly against the tyrant. So, just when we are beginning to interest ourselves in his intricate arguments, he breaks away from us to denounce for the twentieth time the superstition, the prejudice, the fatuity of empiricists, utilitarians, and other "advanced thinkers," of what he calls the English school, the dominant traditional orthodox school. Surely this is all nonsense. We do not believe that there ever was a time when, among Englishmen who cared for philosophy, there was less agreement than there is at present, or less disposition to regard any question as finally, or even provisionally, answered. Mr. Bradley protests to us that a Hegelian school exists only in our fancies. Be it so; but this provokes us to ask, Where exists that orthodox English school which he is for ever belaboring? The joys of heterodoxy are doubtless sweet, and pleasant it is to call one's adversaries fashionable and "advanced thinkers"; but we doubt whether Mr. Bradley is fairly entitled to these delights. Transcendentalism, like empiricism, has its unintelligent adorers; and, if all we hear be true, there are circles in which a contempt for Mill is already considered a distinctive note of the higher culture. The typically deep young man of Mr. Gilbert's play was, if we remember rightly, a transcendentalist, and a score of love-sick maidens drank in his philosophy. In all seriousness though we are getting a little tired of being told that ever since the days of Hume English philosophy has been off the true track, that "we live in an island" and are growing insular, that just across the sea, in Germany, they have a philosophy "which thinks what the vulgar believe" and does many other remarkable things too numerous for mention. Mr. Bradley, and the English writers with whom he has most in common, have already succeeded in perceptibly loosening the hold that Mill once had of the English mind. But this they have done in the name, not of impartial scepticism, or of unreasoning faith, or of unsophisticated common sense, but of a sounder philosophy. Yet until last year we had no continuous statement, no instalment even, of the promised philosophy, only historical criticisms, hints, and suggestions. With the appearance of Professor Green's posthumous Prolegomena to Ethics, a new period seemed about to begin in which controversy was to be happily subordinated to exposition. We know now what the great critic of Locke and Hume, and of their English followers, would have us substitute for the ethical parts of the systems which he attacked. There is a good opportunity for similar constructive work in the field of logic; and on opening Mr. Bradley's book we hoped that he had seized this opportunity and followed the excellent example set him by one with whom he agrees, at least on very many questions. We are disappointed, therefore, when he begins again that scolding of Mill of which we have already had almost enough. And Mr. Bradley's scolding is not of a very good kind; it is often very bitter, and not always very fair. In the substance of his criticisms we can often agree; many of them are not very new; but when we read, for example, that "these touching beliefs in a pious legend may babble in the tradition of a senile psychology, or contort themselves in the metaphysics of some frantic dogma," we cannot imagine what good purpose such a strident passage can serve. Mr. Bradley may have had some provocation to anger. He cannot properly be called a Hegelian, but still he holds Hegel in high honour, and it is to be feared that Hegel has too often been jeered at by those who have not been at pains to read a line of his writing. Still, philosophy is one thing and hereditary blood-feud another. Mr. Bradley will gain nothing and lose much by throwing about such explosive phrases as "self-righteous innocence and blatant virtue."

Two books have come to our hands along with Mr. Bradley's which sufficiently show that these boisterous outbursts against Mill are not needed. We ought perhaps to apologize to Mr. Rogers and Mr. Alfred Sidgwick for introducing their names in this parenthetical way, but their works are much less ambitious than Mr. Bradley's, which, therefore, must be our main theme. Mr. Rogers, an Australian school inspector, has made two remarkable discoveries about which he is modestly triumphant. One is the true definition of a verb, and this we must pass by, though the world has been in want of it "not for centuries only, but for two thousand years." The other is that the copula as anything distinct from the predicate has no real existence, "but is a mere myth and fabrication of certain logicians." Mr. Bradley's own phrase is only a trifle more emphatic; "the necessity for the copula is a sheer superstition." Mr. Rogers again goes about to show that Mill's pet doctrine concerning the ambiguity of the verb to be is a delusion. Here again he is in agreement with Mr. Bradley, and yet to all seeming Mr. Rogers has not studied the Germans, at least does not tell us that he has done so, and he lives, if not in England, yet in another island. He indeed supposes that Mill and Hamilton still share between them the allegiance of English-speaking logicians; but this does not prevent him from believing also that he has sapped the foundations of Mill's system. Mr. Alfred Sidgwick has added to the International Scientific Series a pleasant and sensible book about Fallacies. His object, when compared with Mr. Bradley's, is humble. He writes less for students of philosophy than for readers who may wish to know what logic can tell them about the practical means of avoiding error. But, as it were by the way, he has much to say about inference which, whether quite new or not, is certainly not traditional, and as certainly not derived from Mill. This we must pass by; probably it would teach Mr. Bradley nothing, for he has never found any English book on logic, save only that of Mr. Jevons, of any great use to him. But Mr. Sidgwick, though he confesses a debt to Mill, says against so prominent a point of his system as the five methods of induction all or nearly all that Mr. Bradley, declamation apart, can say. They are of value, says Mr. Sidgwick, "rather as systematic hints for tentative discovery than as methods of proof at all." Mr. Bradley uses almost the same words of one of these methods; it is "most useful as a tentative means of inquiry, but unsound and imposturous if you take it as proof." Really, we are not quite so stupidly conservative as he supposes, and if we are at times a little deaf, the worst thing that he can do is to shout at us.

We the more regret that he should have given himself good cause for considering his book too polemical, for to this seems due the somewhat fragmentary and incoherent manner in which he states his own opinions. He had a very difficult task to perform, for in the end we discover that he had no complete system to explain. In his preface he says that his metaphysics are really very limited. "On all questions, if you push me far enough, at present I end in doubts and perplexities." On a first reading we regarded this statement as the graceful but purely formal disclaimer of omniscience familiar to the reader of prefaces. But we soon found that it has a more real meaning. Mr. Bradley is very confident about the quality of some metaphysics; indeed "bad metaphysics" is his favourite phrase of condemnation. Thus he is sure enough that the metaphysics of Mr. Huxley and the orthodox Christian are bad, and bad for the same reason. But of some other metaphysics he reserves judgment. At the end of his book we leave him face to face with the Hegelian identification of reality and reason. He can find no warrant for it; he shrinks from it as "cold and ghostlike"; though dragged to the conclusion, he cannot embrace it. Reading his book backwards, with this final doubt as a starting-point, the many passages in which he abruptly breaks off a discussion with the remark that we must not trespass on metaphysics gain a new significance. No lover of metaphysics, as he rightly says, will judge him hardly because of his doubts and perplexities, and we gladly welcome his frank avowal of them; such avowals are not so common as they should be. We may be a little uneasy in following a guide who confessedly does not know whether the reality to which he leads us will be "some spectral woof of impalpable abstractions or unearthly ballet of bloodless categories" (we use his own picturesque words), or will be something of which no more can be said than that it is not reason; but at least he does not offer us mere verbal solutions or a delusive show of knowledge. Now it may well be that fragmentary conclusions are the best that can be had. Even if we are not sure of the right road, it may be satisfactory to know that Mr. Huxley and the orthodox Christian are in the wrong. But it is difficult indeed to lay down principles of logic when one is not only very uncertain about the nature of reality, but fully conscious of the uncertainty. Mr. Bradley has read and thought too much to set about drawing a definite line between logic and metaphysics, and is too much in earnest to be content with such beggarly elements of logic as can be had by one who will not face metaphysical questions; indeed, he seems to us to have proved sufficiently that such elements must be even more beggarly than is usually supposed. A very cautious and perspicuous method of exposition might possibly have triumphed over these difficulties and shown us exactly what the author regarded as proved, what as merely probable. But Mr. Bradley was also intent on giving battle to Mill all along the line, and so lays himself open to the charge of maintaining for controversial purposes a theory about reality which in the end he pronounces unsatisfactory. Very possibly such a charge would be untrue, but it would at least be plausible, and he is too deeply engaged in controversy to guard himself against it. He compels us to say of his book that the whole is less than the sum of its parts. Many of its parts are valuable and very original; we may mention in particular a chapter on the association of ideas. Mr. Bradley is well read in recent German philosophy, but is no retailer of other men's thoughts, and adopts no opinion without fairly making it his own. But we cannot bring his theories into connexion with each other. He seems to have given us, not his philosophy, but the materials of which his philosophy is or might be made. If asked to define his position we could only do so by reference to Mill. Mr. Bradley, we should say, disbelieves every single principle which Mill would have thought of first importance to his system, and accepts as true, or possibly true, every opinion which Mill would have considered a quite fundamental error. The principle of contradiction is indeed the vital principle of his logic, and it is because work moulded by that principle can never be perfectly successful that his book as a whole will have less influence on English philosophy than many of its parts deserve to have. Our present clothes may not fit us, may be ragged, old-fashioned, and generally disreputable; but we shall not cast them away until a new suit is ready, for few of us are hardy enough to live in nude scepticism. This may be a weakness of the flesh, similar to that weakness of the flesh which, as Mr. Bradley hints, makes him hesitate about the identity of reality and reason; but at any rate it is a fact, and philosophers must make the best of it. As yet we have been shown not the new suit, nor even the pattern of it, but only cloth out of which it might possibly be made. Still the book is full of good arguments, which will have weight with those for whom philosophy is a serious pursuit. Mr. Bradley evidently has a very genuine love for hard metaphysical thinking which is as rare as it is admirable. He knows that the metaphysician's first, perhaps only, duty is not to hunt for the occult and the mystical, but to describe the obvious as precisely as possible, "to think what the vulgar believe." Having called him a lover of metaphysics, we must add, to prevent misunderstandings, that he is no dreamer of dreams, but has quite as much respect for science and experience and plain matter of fact as any of the sensationalists against whom he argues; and without accepting his opinions it is quite possible to prefer his open, unblushing metaphysics to the covert metaphysics which are often offered to us in the name of positive science by those whose chief boast is that they are not metaphysical.

FORMAN'S KEATS.*

MR. FORMAN has been engaged for many years on the preparation of these volumes, which are admirably edited. The bibliographical talent which he displayed in bringing out first the Poetical Works and then the Prose Works of Shelley has found more scope in Keats than we should have imagined possible in the case of a young man who died at five-and-twenty, and who was on the spot in London when his three volumes of poetry were passing through the press. If anything is to be blamed in Mr. Forman's manner it is a certain narrowness of sympathy, exemplified in the very small circle of writers to whom he turns for citation. The name of the late Dante Gabriel Rossetti is mentioned, as we think, too often, in consideration of the absence of reference to elder and contemporary names. For Rossetti's poetical gifts we entertain the greatest respect, but we do not hold him to have been a good critic of poetry. His published letters show that he was narrow in many of his views, narrow as Mr. Forman himself is narrow. The opinions attributed to Rossetti throughout these volumes rarely appear to us as just, and never as very penetrating. It is curious and interesting, not so much for the student of Keats as for the student of Rossetti, to be informed that the latter poet preferred the cancelled preface of Endymion, with its affectations and cockney self-consciousness, to the stately and eloquent sentences that Keats eventually substituted. The predominance of this one poet, and of some of his very feeble imitators, as set against a total absence of reference to what other and greater writers, down to Mr. Matthew Arnold, have said about Keats, is almost the only fault which we have to bring, in this instance, to Mr. Forman's charge. The absence of reference to Mr. Arnold, who has written the best existing study of Keats's quality as a poet and a man, is very marked. Can it be that Mr. Forman has not forgiven Mr. Arnold's sharp reproof of the publication of the letters to Fanny Brawne?

The doggerel of the great poets is a branch of poetry which has not received hitherto its due amount of investigation. A very droll little volume of the nonsense and occasional verse of the accredited poets might be formed with a great deal of propriety. In most other languages, it may be remarked, not to be flippant, such a collection could not be formed without a great deal of impropriety; but the English mind has happily found it possible to be gay and eccentric, and yet decent. In such a volume we should have plenty of Byron, with "Huzza, Hodgson" in a front rank, Coleridge's "body-and-soul-stinking town of Cologne," Wordsworth's "The Cock is Crowing" and "O who would go parading," with several grim fantastic things from Shelley; but perhaps the most copious contributor would be Keats. It seems as though Keats was never metrically at rest. He wrote a great deal of serious verse in his very short life, but he was not content with this; he was for ever keeping his instrument in tune, and trying its powers in odd experiments. It bears out all that we know of his thorough apprenticeship to the art of poetry to find that he did so, and one of the most interesting features connected with Mr. Forman's edition is that it gives us an opportunity of observing Keats in the full swing of his practice, when anything interested him very much, of pouring verse, serious and doggerel, around it. We refer to the recovered verses which the poet scattered broadcast during his little Scotch tour in July 1818. He seems to have scribbled verse almost every day, some of it quite serious and good, like the exquisite octosyllabics on "Staffa," and some of it mere fantastic folly, always, however, with a certain touch of style. In a letter here first printed he says to his sister, "Since I scribbled the song we have walked through a beautiful country to Kirkcudbright, at which place I will write you a song about myself," which Mr. Forman gives, and a very odd song it is. But we see the principle—for every new incident, for each new scene, a piece of verse, good, bad, or indifferent.

It is true that Lord Houghton had already picked out the best, and that what has been left for Mr. Forman are mostly indifferent. But in the case of Keats so much interest accompanies the action of his unique imagination that we are not scandalized, but only very much diverted, at seeing it throw off its coat and play at leap-frog in the corner. Mr. Forman has found nothing unprinted which is so good of its kind as "God of the golden bow," or "Spirit here that reigneast," nothing so good even as "Little child o' the western wild." He has found some elegiacs, assigned to the year 1814, on "Death"; some terrible sing-song beginning "O come Georgiana," which belongs to the year of Keats's curious apostacy to the style of Tom Moore, 1816; a piece written January 31st, 1818, beginning "Hence Burgundy, Claret and Port," of which this passage may be quoted as characteristically Keatsian:—

I retreat of a pitiful rummer
My wine overbrims a whole summer;
My bowl is the sky,
And I drink at my eye,
Till I feel in the brain
A Delphian pain—
Then follow, my Caius, then follow;
On the green of the hill
We will drink our fill
Of golden sunshine,
Till our brains intertwine
With the glory and grace of Apollo; and a rather brilliant piece of reckless rhyming called "Sharing Eve's Apple." Besides these his only contributions to the verse of Keats are the series of pieces to which we referred above, written during the Scotch tour.

The new letters in the present edition are mainly those addressed by the poet to his young sister Fanny, now the sole survivor of the family. They are very pleasant and quiet, and have none of the hectic excitement which spoils the reader's enjoyment of so much of Keats's correspondence. The first is addressed from Oxford, in September 1817, when Keats was hotly engaged in finishing the third book of Endymion. He says to his sister:—

I am living at Magdalen Hall on a visit to a young man [Benjamin Bailey] with whom I have not been long acquainted, but whom I like very much—we lead very industrious lives—he in general Studies, and I in proceeding at a pretty good rate with a Poem which I hope you will see early in the next year. Perhaps you might like to know what I am writing about. I will tell you. Many years ago there was a young handsome Shepherd who fed his flocks on a Mountain Side called Latmus—he was a very contemplative sort of a Person and lived solitary among the trees and plains, little thinking that such a beautiful Creature as the Moon was growing mad in Love with him. However so it was: and when he was asleep on the Grass she used to come down from heaven and admire him excessively for a long time; and at last could not refrain from carrying him away in her arms to the top of that high Mountain Latmus while he was a-dreaming, but I daresay [you] have read this and all the other beautiful Tales which have come down from the ancient times of that beautiful Greece.

This letter from Oxford contains a great deal that is pleasant and valuable to us; but we note that the poet proposes that his sister should carry on a copious correspondence with him, that on each side they should speak quite freely of all their interests and avocations, and that each shall preserve the letters of the other till they each hold "a good Bundle." Nothing would be more delightful than such a bundle of Keats's letters, describing his doings during this his healthiest and brightest time; but perhaps his sister did not find time to carry out her part of the plan, for there is no other letter to her preserved until July 1818, when her brother again writes to her to her school at Walthamstow. He is by this time in the midst of his Scotch tour. His letters to her now become more frequent. He attempts to wean her from a preposterous design she has formed of learning to play the flageolet, and all through Tom's fatal illness he gives her news of him with great tenderness and delicacy. So much has been said about the character of Keats, as though he were merely what has been elegantly called "a saddling hedonist," that it is really acceptable to find him in these unconsidered notes to his young sister so manly and so full of wholesome common sense. In 1819, when he is already in his fatal illness, he writes thus to Fanny, who had just left school:—

I recommend you to keep up all that you know, and to learn more by yourself, however little. The time will come when you will be more pleased with Life—look forward to that time, and, though it may appear a trifle, be careful not to let the idle and retired life you lead fix any awkward habit or behaviour on you—whether you sit or walk, endeavour to let it be in a seemly and, if possible, a graceful manner. We have been very little together; but you have not the less been with me in thought. You have no one in the world besides me who would sacrifice anything for you. I feel myself the only protector you have. In all your little troubles think of me with the thought that there is at least one person in England who, if he could, would help you out of them. I live in hopes of being able to make you happy.

He looks forward to a time when he and she will be "corpulent old folks, with triple chins and stumpy thumbs" together, pathetically unconscious that his own grave lay right before him, and that more than sixty years later his "little Fanny" would still remain, a living link between the neglected poet and his modern admirers.

In addition to the novel elements to which we have drawn attention, this edition of Keats deserves praise for the care with which it collects and reproduces all the authentic portraits of the poet, portraits which certainly have never been brought together before. That the face of the young man must have been singularly striking and attractive is obvious from the fact that, although he lived an isolated and obscure life, so many persons were found who made it a privilege to request him to sit to them. We agree with Mr. Forman that the mask, which it is almost certain that Haydon took from the life, is of paramount value; and we believe that when a monument is erected to Keats, as must certainly happen sooner or later, the sculptor who accomplishes the task will find it more serviceable to him than any other portrait. There is no doubt that Severn was tempted, as years went on, to idealize those replicas of his friend's head which he was frequently solicited to produce. Some of Mr. Forman's appendices are very curious and interesting. He has shown a genuine spirit of research in ransacking the periodical press of that time for passages which throw a collateral light on the career of Keats. We are glad to see that he holds, and supports with his great knowledge of the facts, the same view with regard to the relation of Leigh Hunt to his friend which has always been held in these columns, and which has lately been controverted with more flippancy than erudition. He reprints the most famous of the reviews of Endymion and of the other volumes, and such portions of the poems of John Hamilton Reynolds as are indispensable to a full comprehension of the poems and letters of Keats. He gives a great deal of correspondence, some of it never printed before, from Haydon, Charles Armitage Brown, and Severn. In short, he brings together the whole body of material necessary to the full comprehension of the situation of the poet among his immediate contemporaries.

It would be an exaggeration to say that these volumes will do anything to improve the position which Keats holds in the history of literature, because by universal consent that position has long ago been assured. Keats modestly said, "I think I shall be among the English poets," and, as Mr. Matthew Arnold has finely remarked, "He is—he is with Shakespeare." But it may be admitted that the present edition was well called for. The text of Keats was far from settled, and, by constant careless reprinting it had become more and more corrupt. The original editions of his three volumes, which once lay like a drug upon the market, have increased in value until there is perhaps no modern English poetry, except some of Shelley's, which is so hopelessly out of the reach of a collector with a slender purse. It was therefore high time that a careful bibliographer, and Mr. Forman is eminently trustworthy, should prepare a final collection of Keats. It must be confessed, at the same time, that these volumes are bulky, and they are also, of course, costly. We are therefore pleased to see that Mr. Forman promises us a further edition, of the text alone, without notes. For ordinary readers this will be everything which they can desire. We hope that Mr. Forman will take care that the type is clear and large enough, and that there is a good index. The type of the edition now under review is excellent, it is even luxurious. We can hardly expect that of the cheap edition to be as good as this; but we look to Mr. Forman to make it as satisfactory to weak eyes as he can. The microscopical editions of the classic writers now in vogue may be pretty, but they are almost useless.

THE writing, as well as the reading, public is generally pleased to devote itself simultaneously to the same subject; its interest seems to run in seasons, as it were. Just at present the Great Pyramid seems to be again a favourite. For no less than three new books have lately appeared on the subject—The Solution of the Pyramid Problem, by Robert Ballard; a little book by Mr. Proctor, called The Great Pyramid, in which the author has left, for the moment, his usual line of merely popularizing knowledge already acquired by experts, and has given us a theory which, so far as we know, is entirely new, and which seems to us to be the most plausible solution which has yet been suggested of the great mystery; and, most important of all, The Pyramids and Temples of Gizeh, by Mr. Petrie. This last is an elaborate collection of facts, and gives the results of an accurate survey and measurement of the site and masonry of the Great Pyramid, and, to some extent, of the other Pyramids and the temples of Gizeh.

"The materials of the present volume," the author tells us in his introduction, "have been selected from the result of two winters' work in Egypt." The portions of that work dealing with numerous minor points and less important buildings have been already published, or are about to be published, elsewhere; this volume deals simply with one time and place—the buildings of the fourth dynasty at Gizeh. And, even so limited, it must not be regarded as a treatise on the subjects with which it deals, but rather as a complete description of those facts which can be ascertained by measurement, and which have been either neglected or misstated in the more ambitious publications of Colonel Howard Vyse and Professor Piazzi Smyth.

All previous investigations were wanting in accuracy. Some of them, like Howard Vyse's, consisted rather in exploration than observation—exploration, moreover, in too many instances, carried on with a wanton destructiveness that calls to mind the mediæval Arab in search of treasure, rather than the modern European in search of truth—some of them, like those of the Prussian expedition, were concerned with inscriptions rather than measurements; others, like those of the French expedition, proved sterile, because the measurements made attained to a less degree of accuracy than was achieved by the original builders; and others again, like Waynman Dixon's and Piazzi Smyth's, consisted solely of measurements of the masonry and neglected survey by triangulation. In none of them were the measurements verified by check observations, nor their limits of probable error ascertained and recorded. One only attempt at an accurate survey had been made before Mr Petrie's work was undertaken. During the transit expedition of 1874, Mr. Gill, now Astronomer Royal at the Cape, and Professor Watson spent three days in making a survey of the Great Pyramid base, as Mr. Petrie says, "in true geodetic style," and with abundant check observations; but, unfortunately, these observations "were not reduced till five years after, and then by an entire stranger to the apparatus" employed, and hence their results can scarcely be regarded as trustworthy.

In a paper, published in the thirteenth volume of the Edinburgh Astronomical Observations, Professor Piazzi Smyth gave a summary of the measurements that still remained to be made at the time that Mr. Petrie set out on his expedition. He pointed out that the interior had been already fairly investigated, and that all that was likely to be obtained in that direction was still greater accuracy. The exterior had, however, been scarcely touched. The points he specially put forward for determination were—the exact position of the original entrance doorway on the north side; the remains, if any, of the pavement, which was supposed to have originally surrounded the Pyramid, and a bit of which Howard Vyse cut down to through the rubbish heaps accumulated on the north side; the levelling of the base; its true corners; its orientation; its squareness; the lengths of its sides; and the slope of the original plane sides of the Pyramid. For these determinations Professor Smyth advised extensive excavations in the rubbish heaps which surround the base of the Pyramid—the cost of which, however, he enormously overestimated—and he pointed out, for special examination, the sockets in the rock, which were generally supposed to mark the original corners of the Pyramid's base, and to have held its corner-stones. All these points have been determined by Mr. Petrie, and recorded in the volume before us. In order to carry out this work, Mr. Petrie lived at Gizeh from December 1880 to the end of May 1881, and again from October 1881 to April 1882. He occupied the rock-hewn tombs previously used as a dwelling-place by Waynman Dixon, and he obtained the services, as his servant, of Ali Gabri, who has assisted Gill, Smyth, and Dixon in their investigations, and even began at the age of four as basket carrier for Howard Vyse in 1837.

To avoid the possibility of mistakes the observations taken each day were reduced the same evening; but to the special care taken in the measurements, the many check observations made, the accuracy of the instruments, with many peculiar contrivances devised and actually constructed by Mr. Petrie himself, we have not space to refer; and indeed the subject is too technical for the pages of this Review. Suffice it to say, that all these precautions have enabled the author to attain a degree of accuracy and certainty unapproached by any previous investigators. His work is indeed an admirable performance; and it will be long before theory will have overtaken the mass of facts he has recorded in his book, and any further observations will be demanded. In all cases the probable error is stated; the linear measurements are given in inches, and are generally carried to the second place of decimals, and the angular measurements to a single second. "The horizontal measurements outside the Pyramid," as the author tells us, "were entirely performed by triangulation, and this included in a single system the bases of the three larger pyramids; the pavement of the Great Pyramid, the trenches, and basalt pavement, on the E. side of the Great Pyramid, and the walls around the second and third Pyramids."

The most important extension, or correction, of our previous knowledge that Mr. Petrie has made is the determination of the true original base of the Great Pyramid. The pavement originally running round the Pyramid, and portions of which were found by Howard Vyse, has been traced on all four sides. It appears, from the few bits still remaining, that the casing originally rested on the pavement, which is twenty inches thick, and not on the rock beneath. The corner sockets in the solid rock are therefore below the level of the original pavement: they no doubt held the lowest corner-stones of the casing, which, therefore, unlike the rest of the lowest course of casing stones, must have passed through the pavement and rested on the solid rock; greater firmness could thus have been obtained for those stones the accuracy of whose positions was most important. These sockets in the rock are not all of the same level; and hitherto it has been usual to reduce the sockets to the level of the pavement orthogonally, and to assume that the corners of the original base were at the feet of the perpendicular from the sockets on the pavement; but taking the base as determined by the few base casing stones that remain in situ, it is found to lie twenty or thirty inches inside the base formerly accepted. This suggests that the corners of the true original base are to be determined by the points where the lines drawn from the sockets to the apex of the Pyramid meet the pavement, and this base is found to agree with those portions of the sides which can still be traced on the pavement, by the few base casing stones remaining, and, strange to say, is far more accurate in orientation and squareness. The levelling of the pavement was not examined with the same care as was devoted to most other points; but, from the observations which best indicate it, it appears that the greatest distance of any part examined from the mean level plane was ·7 of an inch. The mean length of a side of the base was found to be 9068·8 inches; the east side is most in error, being 1·1 too short; and the mean error of all four sides is only ·6. The accuracy of the angles is even more remarkable. The mean inclination of the sides to those of a mean square is only 12″; and the greatest error is on the north side, which is inclined 23″ to the corresponding side of the mean square. The orientation is, however, far more in error; the east and west sides of the mean square being directed as much as 3′ 43″ to the west of north.

The slope of the sides has an important bearing on the general plan of construction followed by the builders, and 51° 52′, with a probable error of 2′, seems to be the most probable value. This gives the height as 5776, with a probable error of 7 inches.

With regard to the inside of the Great Pyramid, the edges of the original doorway are, of course, gone with the casing, and it is therefore impossible to determine by direct observation what method, if any, was used originally to close the Pyramid. The fact, however, that interior passages have been found plugged has led, of late, to the general belief that the entrance passage was permanently closed with a block of stone. Yet Strabo, in his account of the Pyramids as they were in his time, says:—"The greater one, a little way up one side, has a stone that may be taken out, which being raised up there is a sloping passage to the foundations." Mr. Petrie has found unmistakable traces in the doorway of the South Pyramid of Dahshur of a stone flap-door, which must have been opened in a manner exactly suiting the description of Strabo. This, then, was probably also the method by which the Great Pyramid was entered.

The length of the entrance-passage has been carefully re-measured, and Smyth's results have been found to be too short by about one inch on the whole length. The mean inclinations of the entrance and ascending passages are found to differ by about 8″; but it is important to notice that in the immediate neighbourhood of the junction of the two they are much more nearly equal. The azimuth of the entrance-passage was found to be —3′ 44″, with a probable error of only 10″; and the most probable value of that of the ascending passage is —4′, although here there is the large probable error of 3′. The grand gallery itself has been found, again, to have been measured by Smyth about ·8 inch too short. It is worth mentioning here that Mr. Petrie has discovered a relation between the lengths of the short and long slits alternately bored in the ramps on each side; the horizontal length of a long hole is found to be equal to the sloping length of a short one, both being equal to one of the pyramid cubits determined by Mr. Petrie.

Of the ante-chamber Mr. Petrie's observations enable him to say, "The rough and coarse workmanship is astonishing, in comparison with the exquisite masonry of the casing and entrance of the Pyramid"; and, he adds, "the main object in giving the 'details of its measurements' is to show how badly pyramid masons could work." Of the King's Chamber accurate measurements are difficult, owing to the fact that the whole chamber is shaken larger, probably by an earthquake, which has broken every one of the roof-beams across near the southern side. It is, however, just here that Mr. Petrie's measurements are of greatest importance as bearing upon the Pyramid theories. An American gentleman, he tells us, a warm believer in Pyramid theories, came to Gizeh while he was there, and after two days left him with the words, "Well, sir, I feel as if I had been at a funeral." We have not space to give Mr. Petrie's numbers, which overthrow so many of the theories. We will therefore merely state what theories have been overthrown.

Taking the King's Chamber and its coffer first, the King's Chamber does not contain 20 millions of cubic "Pyramid inches"; nor does it contain 1,250 cubic "sacred cubits." The lower course of the King's Chamber does not surround a volume equal to fifty times the interior contents of the coffer. It is, however, just within the limits of probable error that "the outside of the coffer fills $\frac{1}{50}$ of the volume of the chamber up to the first course." The coffer itself does not show the accurate workmanship hitherto attributed to it:—

> It is not finely wrought, and cannot in this respect rival the coffer in the second Pyramid. . . . On the N. end is a place, near the W. side, where the saw was run too deep into the granite, and was backed out again by the masons; but this fresh start they made was still too deep, and two inches lower they backed out a second time, having altogether cut out more than $\frac{1}{10}$ inch deeper than they intended. On the E. inside is a portion of a tube drill hole remaining, where they tilted the drill over into the side by not working vertically. They tried hard to polish away all that part, and took off about the $\frac{1}{20}$ inch thickness all round it; but still they had to leave the side of the hole $\frac{1}{20}$ inch deep, 3 long, and 1·3 wide. . . . They made a similar error on the N. inside, but of a much less extent.

All this forms a strange comment on Piazzi Smyth's enthusiasm over what he calls "a regularly formed and exquisitely prepared specimen of ancient mechanical art." After the quotation we have just made, it is perhaps superfluous to notice any of the theories of exact relations in the coffer; yet we may mention that its hollow contents are not equal to its solid bulk; nor is the bulk of a side and end equal to that of the bottom; nor is the volume equal to the cube of a double Egyptian cubit.

Coming back now into the ante-chamber, we learn that its measurements have been found to be so inaccurate that there is no ground for believing any theory of exact relations to be true. "The granite leaf," says Mr. Petrie, "which has been so much theorized on is but a rough piece of work, and the 'boss' on it is not only the crowning-point of the theories, but is the acme of vagueness as well. To seriously discuss a possible standard of 5 'Pyramid inches' in a thing that may be taken as anywhere between 4·7 and 5·2 inches in breadth, or a standard inch in a thickness varying from ·94 to 1·10, would be waste of time." And Mr. Petrie goes on to give a very unromantic, but probably true, explanation of it. He says it "is merely a very rough projection, like innumerable others that may be seen, left originally for the purpose of lifting the blocks. When a building was finished these bosses were knocked away (I picked up a loose one among waste heaps at Gizeh), and the part was dressed down and polished like the rest of the stone"; and he then adds many instances of complete or partial remains of similar bosses to be found in the Great Pyramid, of which fifteen or sixteen are in the King's Chamber alone.

As to the theories of the construction of the Queen's Chamber, there is too large an error for truth both in the theory that the contents of the Queen's Chamber are 10 million cubic "Pyramid inches," and also in the theory that the circuit of the floor is one-third the circuits of the King's Chamber side walls; and "the theory of the wall height being $\frac{1}{365}$ of the Pyramid base is quite beyond possibility." Neither the breadth of the top of the niche nor its excentricity are one "sacred cubit" in length, though the latter is nearer this theoretic quantity than the former; and "the 'shelf' at the back of the niche being merely a feature of its destruction, and not original, cannot have any connexion with the original design."

As to the position of the chambers within the Pyramid, their levels are now found not to have been determined by the square equal in area to the vertical section of the Pyramid, nor by the square inscribed in the vertical section of half of the Pyramid; nor are the chambers placed at vertical intervals of 40 cubits.

The entrance of the Pyramid is not 12 cubits east of the middle, as has been supposed, and of course the discovery that each side of the base is some 30 inches shorter than was formerly believed has upset the strange theories founded on its former value, and consequently those founded on the magnitude of the height of the Pyramid and also those relating to its weight.

Owing to Professor Smyth's mistaking the rock bed for the floor of the Pyramid, and thus counting the lowest course as two, his theories relating to the peculiarities of the thirtyfifth and fiftieth courses of masonry break down in so far as the numbers are supposed to have any significance. But, of all the new facts and assertions that will most stagger Professor Piazzi Smyth and his disciples, is the one that "there is no authentic example that will bear examination of the use or existence of any such measure as a 'Pyramid inch,' or of a cubit of 25·025 British inches."

NEW LAW BOOKS.*

MR. MONTAGUE LUSH, as becomes one of his name, has published a law-book of solid excellence. The law relating to the property of married people may, since the Act of 1882, be considered to have attained as nearly permanent a form as it is given to any branch of English law to reach. The effect of that Act, stated in the fewest possible words, is to give a married woman as nearly the same rights over her property as if she had remained single as is found practically feasible. The marriage settlements of to-day are required, not to prevent the Common Law from handing over to the bridegroom all the property of the bride, but to save the bride from the temptation of making him a present of it, by putting it out of her power to do so. Mr. Lush's book is not, as so many new law-books are, with such disastrous results in the hands of the incompetent, a digest, but a treatise at large in the old style. This is, perhaps, not to be regretted. The proper compilation of a digest is a most difficult and laborious task; and, when it is done, it supersedes the materials on which it is founded only for those who already know the materials pretty well. The digests of Sir James Stephen and Mr. F. Pollock are as useful, when properly understood, as they are skilfully written; but they have before now proved a snare to second-rate authors and superficial readers. Accurate and exhaustive though Mr. Lush's work is, we have not found in it any mention of a defect in the new Act which in our opinion calls for a remedy. This is that no provision is made to give a husband a successory right to a share of the separate property of his wife upon her decease intestate, corresponding to that which the wife has upon the decease of her husband under the Statute of Distributions. Under the new Act, however, a more just arrangement is made than those of its predecessors as to the liability of a husband for his wife's debts and other obligations incurred before marriage. The law relating to the property of married people is sufficiently definite to require a treatise to itself; and Mr. Lush's book, which satisfies a distinct want, will probably become the standard work on the subject.

Mr. H. A. Smith has published a second edition of his arrangement of the Act to which we owe the appearance of Mr. Lush's work. The book is portable and convenient in form, and the sections of the Act are followed by brief notes explanatory of the principal points that may arise under them.

No critic could approach with a hard heart the consideration of a treatise, expanded from a prize essay, of which the preface modestly concludes, "It is a commonplace of criticism that no good thing can come out of a prize essay, the 'Holy Roman Empire' of my friend Professor Bryce supplying the exception that proves the rule. I dare hardly hope that the following pages may escape this sweeping judgment." Mr. Scrutton's book on The Law of Copyright gained the "Yorke Prize" at Cambridge in 1882, and, though we doubt not that its success was well deserved, it contains many of the faults from which a prize essay might be expected to be free. The style of the original reflections upon the place in the cosmic entity occupied by the law of copyright, and upon the first principles which form its foundation, is extremely bad. When we meet with "which have mainly reference to," "The return for the author's intellectual labour thus is obtained by," and "He asks that such unauthorized communication be restrained," in the small compass of one largely-printed octavo page, we cannot attribute all these blemishes to the pardonable haste of a man of less than seven years' standing from his first degree, which is the condition of candidature for the Yorke Prize, to get his work before the public. And, though it makes them less startling, it does not make them more agreeable, to be told that "the question here is whether the protection granted to printed works should also be extended to spoken lectures . . . . or, shall a hearer be allowed," &c.; that something "may satisfy a demand which would otherwise have purchased the original work," and that the laws of certain countries make it piracy to translate without authority "any work from a dead language into a living one," before we are one-sixth of the way through the book. We also regret to have to state that most of the speculations about utilitarianism as the theoretical if not the actual basis of legislation, and what is and is not the aim of the State, are perfunctorily written and unprofitable reading. In fact, the whole of the chapter of jejune philosophy which is headed "Principles of the Law of Copyright" is almost as uninteresting from the ornamental as it is unimportant from the business point of view. But the reader who is not disheartened by this unpromising beginning will have his courage rewarded when he comes to the statements of hard facts whose sources are accessible to any industrious person who chooses to study the subject. The chapter on the "History of the English Law of Copyright," and the following one, giving an account of the existing state of the law as to copyright in books, are particularly good. The subject is manageable, as the statutes passed from time to time have been few and not very complicated, and the reported cases that preceded and followed them are capable of being brought well within Mr. Scrutton's limits. Following chapters give lucid and sufficiently accurate accounts of copyright in plays, musical compositions, and works of art respectively, and we are glad to notice in passing that the chapter on "Principles of Artistic Copyright" is quite inoffensive in spite of its title. The questions of Colonial and International Copyright are briefly dealt with at the end of the book. The author gives in each chapter the recommendations of the Copyright Commissioners upon the branch of the subject under discussion, and his own not always very cogent reasons for approving or disapproving of them. If the book consisted only of the good part of it (about three-quarters) it would be a highly praiseworthy performance, and not only more useful but much more convenient in size and shape. Mr. Scrutton is not a profound or a very accurate philosopher, but he is laborious and exhaustive, and states simple facts simply and pleasantly. He would do well, in future works, to be less free with his italics, and to refer in his indexes to pages and not to articles.

If a manual means a book that can be conveniently carried or held in the hand, Mr. Joel's Manual of Bankruptcy and Bills of Sale Law is rather misdescribed by that title. It contains, however, as complete an account of the Bankruptcy Act of last year as could be given before there had been any decisions upon it, and is enriched by the Rules for the administration of the Act which were published at the end of December, and by a goodly collection of forms, scales of costs, &c. It also enables us as literally as possible to obey the behest of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, that "this Act shall, so far as is consistent with the tenor thereof, be construed as one with the principal Act [that of 1878]"; for the two Acts are printed together, section for section, the repealed parts of the Act of 1878 being printed in italics. This arrangement makes it possible to ascertain the law on any point with great ease and quickness, and altogether the great size of the book is the chief fault we have to find with it. The writers of law-books have cause to bless Mr. Chamberlain—a singularity of which they should be proud.

Though books on bankruptcy are very common, we doubt whether there are not almost as many books on the Agricultural Holdings Acts. We noticed two of them a few weeks ago, and now we have a second edition of Mr. J. W. Willis-Bund's excellent work on the Law of Compensation for Unexhausted Improvements, with the Act of 1883 duly annotated, and an appendix containing forms of a lease, an award of compensation for improvements, and every conceivable kind of notice. The chief feature of the book, however, is the short account given of "the custom of the country" in every county in England and some in Wales, which, presuming them to be as accurate as the appearance of a second edition seems to indicate that they are, can hardly fail to be of use to those concerned in agricultural litigation.

The rapidity with which a second edition of Messrs. Hood and Challis's book on Conveyancing has followed the first makes it unnecessary for us to say more than that it appears to have been adapted to recent legislation with all the care which the merits of the book and the learning of the authors would lead us to expect. The new features in this edition are a considerable addition to the disquisition on the law of real property generally with which the book begins, the text of the Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts of 1882, the rules incident to those Acts, and a useful summary of the provisions of the latter of them. It is a book which no conveyancer should be without.

Mr. Reid, Q.C., prefaces with a graceful note a voluminous work on the Judicature Acts and Rules written by his brother-in-law, the late Mr. F. P. Tomlinson. The book contains the text of the Acts of 1873 and 1875, and of the Rules, those parts of them which are now being indicated by different typographical devices. The appendices contain vast wealth of forms, and the whole book betokens so much patience and industry that every one must share Mr. Reid's regret that the author's life should have been cut short at the moment of the accomplishment of his design.

Considering how very many books on the New Rules have been published, we cannot confidently predict any overwhelming measure of success for Mr. Woodfall's Guide to the New Rules and Practice, for the merit for which it is chiefly conspicuous—that of brevity—has been attained by the simple method of "not printing the Rules in extenso . . . but omitting all those which are identical with the former Rules." We fear that those practitioners who know their Rules so well as never to want to refer to those parts of the present code which are only re-enactment are too great and good to have need of any books at all.

In reading Messrs. Boyd and Pearson's book on the Factors' Acts it is impossible not to feel a constant assurance that it was written only because the authors had nothing better to do. The body of law of which it treats practically assumed its final shape as long ago as 1842, since which time it has remained unaltered, save by a short and not very important Amending Act of 1877. Under these circumstances, and considering that the law about factors is tolerably well ascertained in the somewhat limited circle of those habitually engaged in its administration, we cannot hail this little book as one likely to be of great service to the profession. The authors are worse than Mr. Serjeant Sullen with which they have scattered italics throughout their volume.

Mr. Morton Daniel publishes an edition of the Patents, Trade Marks, and Designs Act, with the rules, and a number of forms. His introduction gives a careful account of the still not otherwise than complicated things which a patentee should do to secure his rights. His book is very complete, and will be useful to patentees.

The Law Students' Annual is now published by Mr. J. A. Shearwood for the second time, and must therefore be presumed to have been useful to somebody. It consists of copies of all the papers set in the various law examinations for admission to the Bar and to the roll of solicitors throughout the year, with hints for answering them. Mr. Shearwood recommends some very surprising text-books to intending candidates, which makes the success in tuition of which his advertisements boast all the more praiseworthy. We are more sorry than surprised to read in a chapter called "How to Answer Examination Questions" that "there are some points, more particularly in Common Law, which are based on common sense." For we have ever held facetiousness in law-books to be the lowest form of humour.

AFTER years of delay, we are now fairly embarked in the way of having a real English Dictionary. What! the reader may exclaim, have we not Johnson, Richardson, Latham, and Webster's Unabridged, and more also? Yes, good reader; all these are certainly with us. There is Johnson's great original work, a truly "path-breaking" work, as the Germans say, with its preface which no scholar at this day can read without sympathy and reverence; a work not free from the faults of its age, nor from other individual defects known and admitted, with characteristic frankness, by the author himself, but in the main a vast and worthy monument of honourable toil. Its methods and its philology are, of course, those of the eighteenth century. To say this is to say that it cannot suffice to the nineteenth century, even as a groundwork. Almost nothing was known in Johnson's time of the real history of our language. Its evidences were obscure, and in great part unfinished. Etymology, wherever doubt was at all possible, was at best lucky guesswork, for scientific philology was not yet born. Johnson's Dictionary, like Blackstone's Commentaries, deserved and won lasting fame for the man who could, single-handed, make so much of order out of a chaos. But a century does much to change law and language themselves, more to change the scope and the methods of our knowledge concerning them. If we would truly honour the work of our fathers, and effectually satisfy our own needs, we must do in our day what our fathers did in theirs, not patch and boggle their work, but begin orderly anew. This consideration alone would dispose of Latham's Dictionary, which is to Johnson as Stephen's Commentaries to Blackstone—a performance doomed by its conditions to be timid and meagre, unpleasing in form, and savourless for want of any root of individual substance; and yet meritorious in its way, and useful until the time be ripe for something better. Then there is Richardson, that curious mixture of wide reading and happy literary illustration with philological perversity; perversity we must say, for in the second quarter of this century a man who dealt systematically with the English tongue ought to have made some advance on Horne Tooke. And there are those who put their trust in Webster; of which there is only to be said that it does not even pretend to do real service for philology, or to be more than a copious word-book for common use. It has discredited, so far as in it lay, much that had good warrant, has given credit to things without warrant, and has corrupted the spelling of half a continent. There are dictionaries of another class, such as the "Imperial," which add a certain amount of general information to the explanation of words, making, in fact, a compromise between a Dictionary and a Cyclopædia. For that very reason it is not possible that they should deal adequately with the language as language.

As long ago as 1857 the plan of a scientific and historical English Dictionary was laid down, Archbishop Trench being the first mover in the matter, by the Philological Society. Considerable preparations were made in the methodical reading of books, especially the earlier books, by various workers, and in digesting the material thus collected. But partly for want of funds, partly for want of an editor and publisher, the scheme languished for many years. At last the editor has been found in the person of Dr. Murray, and the other difficulties have been removed by the Clarendon Press undertaking the publication. Perhaps the lapse of time is not wholly to be regretted. For there has appeared meanwhile the great French Dictionary of Littré, which is not only, like Johnson's, a marvellous achievement for one man, and great for its time, but (we think it may be said without exception) the most absolute masterwork in that kind yet accomplished by human learning. In divers ways this has manifestly furthered the work in England. First, it has shown what is possible to be done, and that by one man, in illustrating a modern language; it has fixed a standard for emulation, and refuted the cruel saying of Charles Lamb. So far from being of those books which are no books, Littré's Dictionary is a book whose one fault is that it is dangerous for a busy man to use, for one can hardly leave it; one lingers and expatiates in it, and feigns to oneself plausible reasons for looking out another word. And of such, or, if possible, of greater interest (for the field is wider and the materials richer), the new English Dictionary likewise will be. Another gain more positive and tangible than this, though hardly greater, is the weight of knowledge and authority contributed by Littré for the history of such words extant in modern French as have at any time passed into English, or have a common origin with distinct English words. Add to this the store of experience offered to us ready made by Littré, the pattern and details of a master's handling set forth in complete execution. If we say, in one word, that Dr. Murray and his fellow-workers are giving us an English Littré, we shall give a better summary notion of the Clarendon Press Dictionary than by a laboured description. We almost fear, indeed, that to some competent judges we may seem to say too much; but, knowing something of the work and the workers, we do not think the parallel overshoots the mark.

In one material respect the present plan is of greater scale than Littré's. That admirable scholar, being single-handed for the main stress of his enterprise, limited himself to French words yet living in current usage. Our English Dictionary, the full harvest of many reapers, draws no such line. It "aims at exhibiting the history and signification of the English words now in use, or known to have been in use since the middle of the twelfth century." This period is fixed as being approximately that when English had ceased to be a fully inflected language, and had lost most of the native words that were destined to disappear. When, however, a word is once included as having been in use since 1150, its history is traced back as far as possible, it may be to the very first records of Old English. The philological advantage of this enlarged aim is obvious; for oftentimes the history of a living word can be fully made out only by the help of words akin to it in root, meaning, or construction, which have themselves become obsolete, as well as obsolete meanings and construction of words that survive in other usages. For the rest, this is but one of the points on which the scholar will find information in the pages of "General Explanations" prefixed to this first part, which should be read if only to appreciate the carefulness with which the plan has been worked out. One thing, however, is not explained. Dr. Murray dates his Preface from "The Scriptorium." What is the Scriptorium? Is it an inkhorn term for the kind of room our great-grandfathers called a closet, and we call a study? Not so; Dr. Murray is too good an English scholar to use Latin words for nothing. It is a temporary house in Dr. Murray's garden at Mill Hill, in externals much like a greenhouse, wherein the rest of the Dictionary is a-making. (The Dictionary s.v. A, prep. = on, par. 13, says this use of the verbal substantive is archaic. So much the worse for the Dictionary, and let this be our first criticism.) This house or hut, then, is lined with what seem book-cases, only the cases are divided, not into common shelves, but into rows of pigeon-holes. Every pigeon-hole is assigned to some portion of a particular letter of the alphabet, and is full of slips containing illustrative quotations, which have already gone through a first process of sorting according to date and signification. The bundle of slips relating to any given word is the skeleton of the article on that word which will appear in due course in the Dictionary. How the bundle of slips is converted into the finished article (the harmless ambiguity of the phrase is unavoidable and will be excused); with what anxious care doubtful points have been sifted by correspondence and discussion; how unexpected lights have been found, or a suspicious word left under a cloud only after all ways had been exhausted; how, now and again, a mere vox nihili of earlier dictionary-makers (see Abacot in this part) has been run down to its original error and exploded—all this will, some day, make a most curious record, and we hope to see it either as an appendix to the Dictionary or as a separate publication. Littré's example is not wanting for this also. But the time and the manner are for Dr. Murray to determine, not for us. We perceive, moreover, that we have said next to nothing of the contents of this first instalment, of whose quality we are bound to give some taste. To satisfy our readers in this behalf must be the office of a further notice.

THE RETURN OF THE GUARDS.*

LOVERS of fine verse will hail with pleasure the republication of those stirring ballads which Sir Francis Doyle first gave to the world some fifteen years ago, and to which he has now added several new poems. Sir Francis Doyle's claim to be considered one of the direct contributors to the poetic achievement of the age is based upon the success with which he has treated modern heroic themes. The poetry of a nation must, indeed, be decadent if none of its singers dare to handle the deeds of courage and devotion which take place in the world around them. Yet were it not for a few writers like Sir Francis Doyle and Sir Alfred Lyall, we should hardly escape this reproach. The author of The Return of the Guards seems to have the power, as Scott and Macaulay had, of realizing intensely the emotional elements in historic events. This power is quite apart from that of the dramatist, and, if it has no name, is easily recognizable in the failure or success which waits on those who attempt to write ballads. All who love ballads and the ballad spirit in poetry, have only to read Sir Francis Doyle's poems to recognize the true ring in the swift and loud-resounding verse which tells of "The Charge of Balaclava," "The Red Thread of Honour," "The Private of the Buffs," or "The Wreck of the Birkenhead." There are many other good ballads in the volume, but the four just named are by far the best. "The Charge of Balaclava" is one of the most spirited battle-songs of modern literature. Throughout Sir Francis Doyle's poem the metrical expression fits closely round the thought, and the rhythm changes and develops as the action changes and develops in a way which greatly enhances the effect. There should be no need to introduce our readers to such lines as—

> But still against the wondering foe
> In stubborn silence onward go,
> Unchecked, unslackening, undismayed,
> The living of the Light Brigade.

Yet we give ourselves the pleasure of quoting them. In "The Red Thread of Honour," it is impossible to congratulate the poet on so complete a success in the manner in which he has treated his subject, though the emotional effect he has produced is even more remarkable. It would be a distinct improvement if the long lines which are here employed to give somewhat unnecessary explanations were left out. They break the unity of the ballad. Fortunately they adhere so loosely to the vital stock of the poem that its noble and chivalrous numbers can be easily enjoyed without reading them. "The Private of the Buffs" is another of those poems which are certain to be remembered for their power of touching those emotions which respond to the record of deeds of chivalrous devotion, of sacrifices for the sake of personal honour or of patriotism. "The Wreck of the Birkenhead" appeals to such emotions in their simplest form, unmixed with what by comparison seems sophistication, the mere ideals of military honour, pride of race, or unwillingness to yield to force. Who could treat a subject of such chastened sublimity with adequate words. Still Sir Francis Doyle has told the externals of the story well, and has written a poem of great tenderness and nobility of expression.

In two other poems on modern subjects, "Robin Hood's Bay" and "The Doncaster St. Leger," a less distinct success is achieved than in the four poems already touched on. "Robin Hood's Bay" is the most important of the additions to the present volume. The story is another of those themes of modern heroism which the poet so rightly chooses. It is simple enough in scheme. A fisher lad carries a girl in safety through the surf. She had been one of a party of pleasure-seekers caught by the tide. He saved her in the discharge of duty. The point of the poem is the exaltation of both actors by the accident of their situation. The development of this motive leads the poet to general reflections and reviving hopes which, if not particularly remarkable in expression, are at least the result of noble and generous aspirations. Still, the poem is very pleasant reading just because it is full of these aspirations, which, spread as they are throughout his poems, give Sir Francis Doyle's work so simple and honest a character. In "The Doncaster St. Leger" Sir Francis Doyle essays to be the Pindar of the Yorkshiremen. Surely there needs no kind of apology for such a choice of subject. Yet the author is asking us all through not to "sneer" at his poem. It is this and the contemplative or critical attitude which he adopts which spoil what might have been a fine ode on a fine subject. Directness, simplicity of mood, is what we want, but the poet all the time is not really entering into the spirit of the Yorkshire crowd, but telling us instead how interesting it was to watch them, and how keen they were. Of course they were keen, but our Pindar of the Moors will not write like this:—

> And during all that anxious time
> (Sneer as it suits you at my rhyme)
> The earnestness became sublime;
> Common and trite as is the scene,
> At once so thrilling and so mean.

It is impossible not to regret that so large a part of Sir Francis Doyle's work should have been devoted to classical subjects. Those of the classical subjects which he treats in the ballad form, like "Caius Manlius Capitolinus," "The Mother and Daughter," or "The Athenian Battle Hymn at Marathon," are indeed full of spirit; but we could well spare "The Vision of Er the Pamphylian," or "Demosthenes," if the poet instead would tell us how Gillespie led his troopers from Arcot to Vellore; or how Baird, remembering his chains and the dungeons of the Sultann, stormed sword in hand the palaces of Hyder. This is, however, a very ungracious way to thank the poet for work like the elegy which gives its name to the volume. Nor is the vision of "Er the Pamphylian" anything but an interesting poem. The numbers are harmonious and the language is elegant and scholarly throughout. Couplets such as are enough to show that the poem has a raison d'être of its own. The tale of the Lower Empire called "Gythia" also displays the qualities of careful versification, and makes a fine story; but again the thought returns of the ballads which might be enjoyed in its place.

> Unkindled yet the war-god's altar flame,
> And his red planet flared without a name,

NAUTICAL HANDBOOKS.*

THE neat little word-book which Mr. Clark Russell has published may prove a useful glossary to some of his own novels, and may also be useful to others than readers of romance. He says in his preface—which, notwithstanding that it is the preface to a dictionary, is a great deal more entertaining than prefaces usually are—that his work is "offered to the public because many might be glad to possess a cheap book of convenient size that would enable them to satisfy themselves without trouble about the meaning of nautical words often met with, but not always intelligible." Here, no doubt, he is quite right. Sailors' language is a strange mystery to those who have had the misfortune to pass their lives on dry land, and a short and simple key to it is likely to be appreciated by a good many people who occasionally want to know the meaning of nautical terms mysterious to them as the symbols of the mathematician. The word-book of the late Admiral Smyth is in many respects an excellent one, and in speaking slightingly of it the present author certainly shows no great wisdom; but it is a very elaborate work, and there is room for a smaller and cheaper one, which may be useful to not a few who have to give a little study to the strange words that sailors use. Mr. Clark Russell specially refers to lawyers as needing some knowledge of sea talk, and being occasionally sorely puzzled by it, going so far as to say that, "of all the various features of procedure in marine courts, nothing is so curious as the bewilderment excited in the legal breast by the statements of nautical witnesses." It may be doubted whether he is altogether right here; and probably, if he ever has the misfortune—which we trust he never may have—to be cross-examined by a counsel practising in the Admiralty Court, he may discover that the barrister who has been stimulated to learn by heavy fees is not by any means so ignorant or so helpless as he imagines him to be. It can fairly be admitted, however, that there are few barristers who would not be puzzled by the words he cites in his preface; but, in endeavouring to show how the ignorant lawyer may be bewildered, he unfortunately succeeds in showing how even the high nautical scholar may go wrong. He gives a specimen of the kind of sentence that puzzles counsel, and in it makes mention of "spritsail gaffs." Vainly will the anxious reader bent on deciphering the enigma turn to the glossary to ascertain what a "spritsail gaff" is. No enlightenment will he find, and he will be driven to the conclusion that Mr. Russell is like Hegel, who, when asked to explain one of his own sentences, said that he had forgotten the meaning. Possibly he may also come to the conclusion that a writer who does not explain a term to which he draws attention at the outset is not a very able guide, and that, in this case, the tutor is not those two pages ahead of his pupil which, according to good authority, a competent teacher ought to be.

Such a view, however, would be unfair to Mr. Clark Russell, who has a knowledge of sea-terms not always possessed by those who have left the sea for some time, and has in some respects evidently been very careful in compiling his little book. Unfortunately in others he has been careless. He says very modestly in his preface that he does not pretend that his catalogue is exhaustive, that scores of words of which he never heard are no doubt wanting, and that any sea-terms and definitions addressed to him will be gratefully received. In this he is, perhaps, too diffident. It is difficult to suppose that he is in any way ignorant of the most esoteric portion of a sailor's phraseology. Of the more recondite words, of those least likely to fall on a landsman's ear, he seems to have full knowledge. He may very possibly please inquirers who want to plunge deep into nautical lore; but, strange to say, he is not so likely to please those who desire information of a simpler kind. A good many men who would not care to know the meaning of "boot topping," or "pazarie," or who would be even indifferent to a rendering of the mysterious spritsail gaff, may want to know what a main-deck is, or what a maintopsail is, or what the main-boom of a fore-and-aft craft is; but on these points Mr. Clark Russell cruelly refuses to give information, though he describes the two divisions of the topsail under "upper" and "lower." He certainly ought to explain what a main-deck is, because the word is so often used, and, strange to say, is not always used in the same sense by naval officers and by merchant officers. The maintopsail is, on the whole, the most important sail in a ship, and it is not enough briefly to describe the topsail yard without mentioning the sail; and it is curious that the author should ignore the main-boom, as he once showed great regard for that spar, and overlooked the fact that it is generally rendered powerless for good or evil in a gale of wind and the modest trysail substituted for the mainsail. Other omissions mar the value of the work. Although the words "lee" and "windward" are by no means unknown on shore, landsmen on board ship are sometimes much puzzled by the constant repetition of the terms "to windward" and "to leeward," and get confused over them, jumbling them up with port and starboard, and suffering much in consequence before the truth is revealed to them. Mr. Clark Russell defines "leeward"—not particularly well—but does not define "windward" or "to windward." In like manner he gives no definition of "lie to" or "lying to," and does not explain what is meant by the expressions "carrying lee helm" and "carrying weather helm," which frequently bewilder those who have got through elementary difficulties. On another point of interest he is also unfortunately silent. The cat-o'-nine-tails is now laid up for good, but, considering its long and valued services, it ought certainly to be described in a dictionary of sea-terms, and not merely mentioned incidentally.

With regard to sea language of a lighter and more sportive kind Mr. Clark Russell's dictionary is also at once excessive and deficient. In his anxiety to teach everything, he gives words which can hardly be considered as being specially sailors' words, while he omits one or two time-honoured expressions. "Swig," for swallow, is an old word, originally identical with "swidge," and no more belongs specially to sailors than it does to labourers or artisans. "Tight" as indicating drunkenness is merely old and very vulgar slang, quite as common amongst cockneys as amongst those who dwell in the forecastle. "Slewed," with the same meaning, is no doubt a sailor's word, but it belongs to very dull nautical slang, and might well have been left out. "Bully for you" is, unless we are much mistaken, an Americanism, and, though it may now be common amongst sailors, it was not originated by them. These words should not appear in the vocabulary; and, on the other hand, two or three words which certainly should be there find no place in it. "Shellback," that most expressive term, meaning a sailor, whose back, owing to constant pulling and hauling generally becomes more or less convex, is not given in the body of the work, though attention is drawn to it in the preface. The clumsy expression "sleep in," indicating slumber during the whole night, or during what ought to be a watch on deck, is given, but the phrase "all night in," which tells its own story so well, finds no place in the Index; and that quaintest of terms, "sky pilot," whereby a seaman means a priest, who knows how to steer the right course aloft, is not given in "sailors' language." It must be added that one or two words are inserted which are obsolete, while some of the explanations are not full and accurate. Mast-heading, the amiable practice of captains of former days, was put a stop to by the Admiralty many years ago. Main-topmast studding sails, which the writer describes, may still be used in merchant ships, but they were discarded long since in the navy as doing more harm than good. To define "beam" as meaning the point of the sea or horizon abreast of the midship section of a ship may in one peculiar sense be accurate, but it is most eccentric and misleading. "Beam," one of the commonest expressions amongst sailors, usually means a vessel's breadth, and it is used in this sense by Mr. Clark Russell when describing a Baltimore clipper. For defining "athwart our hawse," as being said of a ship crossing another's bows, Mr. Clark Russell may have authority, but surely the expression properly relates, as his definition of "athwart hawse" tends to show, to the case where a vessel, or a boat, or a spar has drifted across the bows of a ship at anchor. It is difficult indeed to see how the word "hawse" can be rightly used about a ship which is under sail. Even, however, if this definition is accepted, it can hardly be maintained that Mr. Clark Russell is correct when he says that "fetch" means to "reach or arrive at by sailing or steaming, as, We fetched the harbour"; and that to "fetch out" means to get out of harbour by beating or sailing close. The word as commonly used on board sailing ships refers to a vessel's getting past a point, or to windward of or close to a lightship or buoy, or into or out of harbour, without making a tack. Such mistakes as this and the others we have pointed out ought not to occur in the work of a writer who has great knowledge of the sea, and has given much attention to sea-terms; and we regret to have to point out another which calls for graver reprobation as showing a slight forgetfulness of good taste. Mr. Clark Russell defines a freshwater sailor as "A yachtsman. A green hand." As in The Lady Maud he made some mistakes which any competent yachtsman would have corrected in a moment, he had better have abstained from this feeble joke, which can only be attributed to the fact that he knows nothing whatever about yachting. A good many yachtsmen neither are, nor pretend to be, sailors in the very least; but some, on the other hand, are excellent fore and aft seamen. Quite lately one amateur, Mr. Hartley Burton, has sailed a schooner of ninety tons round the world, while another, Mr. E. F. Knight, has sailed a thirty-ton yawl to Buenos Ayres, and thence to the West Indies—a feat which it would puzzle many a certificated master and first mate to perform. Appreciation of these facts, and of a good many others which the author will discover if he will turn his attention to a subject of which he is at present ignorant, will doubtless induce him to expunge this pleasantry in a second edition. To a second edition his book may very possibly be destined. It has, as we have shown, considerable faults, but, on the other hand, it is by no means without merits, and is likely to be consulted by many. By careful revision and correction of sins of omission and commission it may be made a really valuable handbook.

Of a very different order from Mr. Clark Russell's compilation is the remarkable Sailor's Handbook, by Captain F. G. D. Bedford, R.N., of which a new edition has lately appeared. We live in days of epitomes, but, as a rule, those who produce them are indifferent to bulk, if indeed they do not prefer bulky books; and it is something new to find an epitome which gives a vast amount of information, but takes the shape of a small, handy volume. Most singular, indeed, is the amount of practical and useful knowledge shown in this book, which, like others, happily gives proof of the unswerving diligence with which naval officers of the present day study all that relates to their profession. Captain Bedford treats of parts of the coasts of North America, the West Indies, South America, Africa, China, Japan, and Australia, and of the Pacific. He mentions the principal lines of steamers to the great ports, briefly sums up sailing directions, states what charts and books are required for various seas, and gives a good deal of pertinent information in a wonderfully compact form about the various seaports, about the money current at various places, about the weights and measures in use, and about other matters. In many respects is Captain Bedford's book, containing so much in such a small space, likely to be useful to mariners of all kinds and degree; but in one respect it is almost certain to be pre-eminently useful. Steamers are more and more thrusting out sailing, and seem likely before long to monopolize the traffic of the world, and for the owners and captains of steamers the question of coal supply is all-important. Captain Bedford states, in many cases, where coal is to be obtained, what the prices are, and is so careful as to explain how it is brought on board. The price, of course, must necessarily vary from time to time; but no doubt the prices mentioned fairly represent the average, and at all events they will give the captains of ships some idea of what they will have to pay for restoring the vitality of their vessels. By giving information on this point and on so many minor, but by no means unimportant ones, Captain Bedford has earned the gratitude of sailors; and if his book is as accurate as it appears to be, it will certainly take the place which he modestly claims for it, and, "while principally useful for those who are paying a first visit to a station," be found "a handy book of reference for all."

THE FOLK-LORE OF SHAKESPEARE.*

MR. T. F. Thiselton Dyer's Folk-Lore of Shakespeare contains a mass of information and quotations diligently brought together, much of which is curious, much amusing, and some useful. We cannot say, however, that the scholarship and general knowledge brought to bear on the work are such as they might have been, or even such as might be, fairly expected. Thus in one paragraph two impossible derivations of the word "gossamer" are quoted from different sources; the true one, given in Mr. Skeat's Etymological Dictionary, which every student and worker in English literature ought to have at his elbow, is not mentioned. The note on "sagittary" reads as if the writer had never met with Centaurs in art or mythology, nor with the signs of the Zodiac in an almanac. The transmigration of souls is described as a "primitive superstition" which "is almost effete amongst civilized nations," but still "retains an important place in the religious beliefs of savage and uncivilized communities." Neither Brahmanism nor Buddhism is effete by any means, nor can the races and nations of India, China, and the Indo-Chinese countries be disposed of as "savage and uncivilized communities." Perhaps a compiler is not to be censured for being content to quote Nares without addition; but it is the fact that the custom of swearing by the sword is much older than the Crusades in both Europe and Asia.

These are perhaps venial faults of omission; but we cannot help being surprised by the curious want of relation to common knowledge of modern things which frequently crops up in Mr. Dyer's remarks. On "gaudy days," he notes, "feast-days in the colleges of our universities are so called." For "our universities" read

"Oxford." The term is not in use at Cambridge. Football is described as a "once highly popular game"; and we are told that "at a comparatively recent period it was played in Derby, Nottingham, Kingston-upon-Thames, &c." Our own belief is that "at a comparatively recent period"—say any day this winter—it has been played in these and a great many other places, including Oxford, Cambridge, and (from the end of the Midsummer to the beginning of the Christmas holidays, or, in some cases, till Easter) every public school in the kingdom, to say nothing of the rest. Then one need not be much of a naturalist to know that the slow-worm is not "a little snake with very small eyes," not being a snake at all; and if the "ancient belief that sorrow shortened life" has been disproved, it is a very strange though welcome piece of news. The game of stool-ball, the rudimentary form of cricket, though supplanted in renown by its offspring, is not extinct, but still flourishes as a rustic pastime in Surrey, and elsewhere for aught we know. A quotation from "Mr. Blackstone's" Commentaries looks odd at this time of day. Apart from the tolerably familiar fact that Blackstone became a judge and was knighted, we do not cite Mr. Gibbon or Mr. Hume. But most singular of all is this elucidation, which the judicious reader will appreciate without comment:—

Small-pox. Such a terrible plague was this disease in the days of our ancestors that its name was used as an imprecation.

On the whole, we fear the author of Folk-Lore of Shakespeare must have either written in great haste or amassed a plentiful lack of things generally known.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE saying that "one shall be taken and the other left" is strikingly illustrated by the respective literary fortunes of Wilhelm Vatke (1), the subject of Professor Benecke's copious and handsome biography, and his early friend David Friedrich Strauss. Both came forward at the same time with equal hopes and equal learning to apply the principles of the Hegelian philosophy to historical exegesis; but while Strauss's Leben Jesu has produced an immense direct and a still greater indirect effect upon opinion, Vatke's "Biblical Theology" never penetrated beyond professional circles, and was never completed by the author. Other and more successful critics may probably have been largely affected by Vatke's views, but he scarcely survives as a distinguishable first-hand influence in theology. His career was in other respects more fortunate than his friend's. He was neither unsettled in his circumstances nor unhappy in his domestic relations; and his activity as teacher at the University of Berlin was for a long time highly important. It was eventually paralysed by the intrigues of Hengstenberg, who, backed up by a reactionary King and Ministry, systematically intimidated students from attending Vatke's lectures. The latter, however, maintained his position nearly till his death; studying incessantly, but publishing nothing. We gather that he came to distrust his old teacher Hegel; his negative views in Biblical criticism underwent no change. He was a man of sterling worth, firm, sensible, and benevolent. His most remarkable friends were Strauss and Zeller, the historian of Greek philosophy. The numerous letters from Strauss are perhaps the most interesting things in the book. They exhibit his wonted eagerness and candour, with the shade of petulance habitual to him. Vatke was an accomplished musician, Strauss a passionate admirer of music; and the account of the friends' joint pursuit of their favourite recreation is almost pathetic, with that touch of drollery from which German pathos is sometimes not exempt. Professor Benecke's biography is ably and impartially written, and, barren as Vatke's life was of external incidents, hardly seems too long. One of its most valuable chapters is an analysis of the "Biblical Theology," laying special stress on Vatke's views on the fusion of Jewish and Persian religious ideas during the Captivity.

Lukasz Gornicki (2) was one of the most distinguished of the Polish humanists who in the sixteenth century introduced into their country a refinement of taste destined to be obliterated in the next age by the bombast and pedantry of the Jesuits. He had the advantage of passing his youth in Italy, and after his return adapted Castiglione's Cortigiano to the needs and capacities of his countrymen. It is significant that he found himself obliged to place the portions of the dialogues assigned in the original to ladies in the mouths of male speakers, and to omit allusions to pictures and statues, with which his untravelled countrymen were totally unacquainted. He also translated Seneca's Troas and De Beneficiis; and composed poems, political treatises, and minor essays in an elegant, though diffuse, style, which contributed much to the refinement of his native language. A master of form, but destitute of original talent, a patriot, but a willing servant of the great, he was a perfect type of the character most frequently produced by the Renaissance.

Professor Hermann Schumacher (3) seems to have spent some years at Bogota as director of the National Observatory, and to have thus had ample means of making himself acquainted with the labours of the few distinguished men who, in the face of every discouragement, have laboured to introduce science into one of the most intellectually backward portions of Spanish America. Three typical personages have been selected by him—the botanist Mutis, the astronomer Caldas, and the geographer and naturalist Codazzi—whose biographies, interspersed with copious references to their scientific coadjutors, constitute in some measure a history of Colombian science from 1760 to 1860. All were meritorious men. Mutis, a Spaniard, despatched on a scientific mission, formed a great botanical collection and founded the observatory, which Caldas, a self-taught astronomer, greatly improved. Caldas also founded the first literary and scientific journal in the country. Codazzi, an Italian by birth, did wonders in topographical and geological exploration and surveying. All were unfortunate: Mutis was neglected until, in his old age, the respect shown him by Humboldt enlightened his fellow-citizens as to his merits; Caldas died a martyr to the independence of his country; Codazzi's labours were allowed to remain unpublished. Professor Schumacher's volume, though over-bulky, and not very clearly arranged, is well adapted to excite interest and sympathy for these men and others like them who have contended with the ignorance and turbulence of South America. It is accompanied with copious notes, containing a great amount of most interesting scientific, biographical, and bibliographical information.

A new journal devoted to cuneiform studies under the editorship of MM. Bezold and Hommel (4) will form a welcome medium of intercommunication among the select body of the learned devoted to this interesting and difficult pursuit. In the first number Schrader, Oppert, Sayce, and Hommel appear as contributors, and Bezold, Halévy, and Strassmaier as correspondents. The most generally interesting papers, perhaps, are Hommel's on the date of the dynasty of Khammarabi, and Oppert's translation of a Babylonian contract for the sale of landed property.

Gustav Körting's "Encyclopædia" of the philology of the Romance languages (5) threatens to deserve its title, if an opinion may be formed by the extent of preliminary matter comprised in the first part, much of which seems wholly superfluous. Herr Körting's fault, however, is rather irrelevance than tediousness. He writes clearly and forcibly, and two chapters of his work are very excellent—his history of the philological study of the Romance idioms, and his admonitions respecting the spirit in which it should be prosecuted.

The Genealogical Almanack of the Dresden Court bookseller (6) is a useful compendium for those who find the Almanach de Gotha too extensive; it is, however, a serious defect that, being limited to families actually reigning, it contains neither Bourbons nor Bonapartes, while full justice is done to Lippe and Monaco. The feature of the present volume is a portrait of the King of Spain in his renowned Uhlan uniform, in which he certainly appears to advantage.

Dr. Hasbach's treatise on mutual insurance among the English working classes (7) is one of those exhaustive monographs which compel students to resort to Germany for information about their own countrymen. With marvellous industry, and a lucidity no less admirable, Dr. Hasbach has digested the entire history of English Benefit, Provident, and Friendly Societies, and of the legislation relating to them, from a mass of Blue-books and Acts of Parliament; deriving, no doubt, great assistance from the Reports of Mr. Ludlow and other labourers in the same field. His ultimate conclusion is that the amount of insurance must be increased by seventy per cent., involving a nearly corresponding augmentation in the rate of wages, and its management much improved, ere the English working class can be regarded as beyond the dread of want. He does not despair of this result, but considers it more likely to be realized by the mutual sympathy of classes than by compulsory legislation.

Professor Du Bois-Reymond (8) has collected into a little volume three of his elegant orations before the University of Berlin. The subject of the first is the defence of Frederick the Great against the harsh judgment of Macaulay. Macaulay unquestionably coloured too highly here as everywhere else; yet we must think that here, as elsewhere, his error is rather one of form than of substance. Professor Du Bois-Reymond's attempt to retort the charge by taunting the English nation with the misdeeds imputed to Warren Hastings is sophistical. The actions of Hastings are not incapable of defence; yet, granting them all that Professor Du Bois-Reymond would have them, they were still dictated by hard necessity. But Frederick's motive was sheer rapacity; he was under no kind of compulsion to appropriate Silesia or partition Poland. The brief parallel between Copernicus and Darwin lays hold with great sagacity of the fundamental point of resemblances between the two philosophers—that they shifted the central points of their respective sciences, and substituted one simple principle for a number of ingenious refinements called into existence to account for the apparent absence of such a principle. The oration on the statues of the brothers Humboldt is as long as the other two together and a masterpiece of elegant exposition. It is but natural that a physicist should find more to say of Alexander than of Wilhelm, who, if a less conspicuous and imposing figure, probably possessed more exalted and refined mental powers.

We are highly indebted to Dr. Veckenstedt (9) for the diligent collection of the materials of a remarkable popular mythology, interesting from its own picturesqueness, from its relation to kindred mythologies, and as embodying the traditions of the only branch of the Aryan family who have possessed their primitive speech as a living language. Sanskrit, Persian, Greek, Latin, exist as spoken languages only in philologically degraded forms; but the speech of the Zamaits or Lithuanian Lowlanders, better known in this country as Samogitians, is probably in grammar and structure much the same as when their forefathers settled by the amber-giving Baltic. How far the traditions themselves are primitive is another question. It is somewhat startling to find the stories of the Flood and the destruction of Sodom combined at the very outset of what purports to be a national epic setting forth the divine origin of the Zamaite nation. If the tradition is really authentic in all its main features, it points to deep primitive affinities between Aryan and Semitic mythology; if it is merely borrowed, then its introduction into Lithuania must be comparatively recent, and the scientific importance of Lithuanian folk-lore is altogether much diminished. In any case, the interest and picturesqueness of the collection are extraordinary, and many traits are almost certainly original; such as the helplessness of the Zamaites when first dismissed from their Rasselas-like seclusion to make their way in the world, and the simplicity of their proceedings, recalling the works and ways of the wise men of Gotham. These details form a portion of the great national epic recalling the origin of their race and the exploits of their King Dungis, and their sorceress-queen Zamaite. The remainder of the Lithuanian traditions may be divided into the strictly mythological, survivals of their primitive Pantheon, and the local stories and popular superstitions. The former class are especially interesting in their points of affinity and difference with Greek and Indian mythology. Elemental worship is their sum and substance; of animal worship little trace is to be found. It is frequently difficult to determine how far the various mythological personages are to be regarded as divinities and how far as genii, or ministers of the supreme Deity; but it is evident that the Christian influences to which the popular belief has been exposed for so many centuries must have tended to obliterate the traces of original polytheism. There does seem, however, to have been always a broad distinction between the thunder-god Perkun and the other divinities. Perkun's attributes are nearly those of Indra, and on the whole the Lithuanian religion may perhaps be not unfairly taken to represent the Hindoo creed in a state of arrested development. The minor folk-lore of spectres, cobolds, nixes, and the like is full of most entertaining stories, but does not materially vary from the general character of popular superstitions elsewhere. Dr. Veckenstedt points out its affinities with the Russian, and the support thus accorded to the theory of the original identity of the Lithuanians and the Slavonians. The value of the collection is enhanced by an excellent glossary and index.

"From Two Worlds" (10) is in every sense a very pretty volume, though it scarcely gets beyond the prettiness of mere sentiment. A young lady, fascinated by the book of a German professor, initiates a correspondence with him, which, beginning with raillery and mystification, speedily becomes serious, and leads up to a betrothal, a marriage, all kinds of misunderstandings and misfortunes, and finally a happy dénouement by reason of the serious peril of the young wife, who reconciles everybody by the simple and not altogether unheard-of expedient of first falling ill, and then getting well. Instead of a funeral, therefore, the book ends with a christening.

The Queen of Roumania's works follow each other too rapidly for an enduring reputation. If any excuse can be made for this over-fecundity, it is in the case of a pretty little volume like her "Sketches" (11), where the execution is professedly slight, and where at the same time its negligence is compensated by ease and vigour of treatment. There is, indeed, no slight literary merit in these careless sketches, hastily outlined as they are, and fanciful as is their implied parallel with various styles of pictorial art. They evince real dramatic power, with a decided talent for the vivid representation of scenes and persons. The situations are always powerfully imagined, and Her Majesty may yet produce an excellent novel if she possesses the powers of invention and construction which cannot be fairly tested by her present experiment.

It is a pity that Turgenieff's recollections for some time past in course of publication in the Rundschau (12) should be broken off just as they are becoming really interesting. The former instalments have dealt principally with insignificant persons little known out of Russia; in the present we have Turgenieff's impression of the moody and Byronic Lermontoff, of the taciturn Kriloff, of Iwanow, the unfortunate painter whose fine ideal faculty was condemned to impotence for want of technical skill. More interesting still are Turgenieff's revelations of himself, his profound astonishment and disappointment when the character of Bazaroff in Fathers and Sons was interpreted into an attack on the tendencies of the Russian youth, and his avowal of general sympathy with Nihilism. The most important of the other contributions is an essay on the Pergamenian remains by Professor Milchhoefer, directing attention to the originality of the sculptures at the time of their execution, and to the remarkable affinity of sentiment between them and some modern works of art. Philipp Spitta's pleasant article on Spohr's opera of Jessonda traces the plot to its source in Lemierre's Veuve de Malabar. Fiction is represented by two novelettes translated from the Italian of Salvatore Farina, who seems to be rapidly acquiring a European reputation; and "Handsome Valentine," a promising tale by Helene Böhlau, depicting a German youth on his travels, a theme invariably attractive.

The continuation of Fritz Lemmermeyer's "Alchemist" in Auf der Höhe (13) deals chiefly in the horrors of mediæval prosecutions for witchcraft, a subject so shocking and repulsive that the author's unquestionable success in harrowing the reader's feelings affords no real criterion of his power. "Above the Clouds," by Jenny Schnabe, describes with considerable spirit a young lady's ascent with a young aeronaut, with the consequences to be anticipated. Karl Hannemann's account of the Basques is full of interest; and the translations from Paul de Mont introduce us to a Flemish poet of considerable merit.

The German Literary Calendar (14) continues its useful course, with its list of living German authors and literary societies, necrology, texts of the year's copyright conventions and legislation, and other matter of importance to literary men.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. DE MAUPASSANT'S edition of Flaubert's letters to George Sand (1) consists of two parts, the first of which, the editor's long notice of the great novelist with whom he was so nearly connected, is worthy of the second. Except for a natural, but certainly rather unjust, protest against M. Maxime du Camp, and a totally uncalled-for fling at M. Cherbuliez, this notice is written in excellent taste throughout, which is not always the case with the work of its clever author. It is much the best personal sketch of Flaubert that has appeared, and if not fully sufficient as an accompaniment to his works (for, little as we love personal details of authors, we must hold against M. de Maupassant that the novelist's constitutional disease is an important literary as well as biographical fact), it is all but sufficient. The literary criticism it contains is for the most part sound, and far less crudely expressed than might be expected from one of those about M. Zola, a breed for which we have always held M. de Maupassant far too good, despite his occasional fredaines in prose and verse. This notice, which fills nearly ninety pages, is followed by the letters. They cover exactly ten years, beginning in 1866 and ending only with George Sand's death. "Chère madame" quickly passes into "chère maître," and the tone of affectionate admiration which this last false concord inspires is maintained throughout. Flaubert's amiable, and in some respects almost childish, nature, his intense love of literature, his noble Romantic scorn of the "bourgeois au front glabre," and his scarcely less vigorous hatred of "realism," all appear. The letters are of that kind which make the reader like better and think better of both writer and receiver, as all good letters from and to good people do. Evil is the case of those whose really private letters leave a bad taste in the mouth. At the same time, it cannot be said that Flaubert is a model letter-writer. His jocularity (never his strong point) is passable, but not more, and the graver passages lack precision and weight. It is evident that the enormous pains he took with his printed style have not been exaggerated. But in this book we do not look for a work of literature, but for a personal "document"; and we have it.

M. d'Escamps's "Madagascar" (2) is a considerably altered and enlarged reprint of a book issued nearly forty years ago. It contains a great deal of information excellently printed and compendiously arranged; and the author takes especial pains to disavow any hostile feelings towards England. But almost all the new and much of the old part of his book is devoted to urging the annexation of the whole of Madagascar by his countrymen, and to the attempt to show that such an annexation would only be the carrying out of old, recognized, and unextinguished French claims. This latter position it is impossible for English students of history and politics to admit.

A few historical students may be aware, but most are probably ignorant, of the resolution taken by the French Foreign Office two or three years ago to publish in a classified form the instructions issued to French Ministers abroad between Richelieu's time and the Revolution. The first volume of the series (3), a goodly octavo of five hundred pages (the print and paper of which deserve especial commendation) concern Austria, and is edited by M. Albert Sorel, whose works on diplomatic history are well and most favourably known. England has been assigned to M. A. Baschet, Russia to M. Rambaud, Spain to M. Morel-Fatio, and the remaining countries to hands doubtless equally competent. The whole ought to form an exceedingly valuable collection, necessary, if not to every gentleman's library, at any rate to all public libraries and to the shelves of all students of modern history whose houses are tolerably ample and their purses moderately well furnished.

It is a debatable point what is the best form for a book of reference, or, at any rate, of instruction, in classical archæology. Practice, if not theory, has in England long inclined to the dictionary, and there is no doubt of its superior convenience as a perpetual commentary on the classics themselves (4). But the lexicographer has, of necessity, to keep apart, even in the most ingenious system of grouping, things which ought to be together, and the most elaborate cross references will not wholly obviate this defect. The archæological manual of Herren Guhl and Koner, as offered to French readers, proceeds on the opposite principle, that of continuous narration in chapters under general titles. It is well translated and excellently presented in the version of MM. Trawinski and Riemann, while the illustration appears to have been largely increased and is now excellent.

Mme. Le Breton's Botanique pour tous (5) is a very beautiful book, lavishly illustrated, carefully printed, and almost marvellously cheap for its size and general appearance. Its system is something like that of Joyce's Scientific Dialogues and other friends or enemies of our youth. Playing at science is rather out of favour in England just now, but M. Decaisne's revision and imprimatur ought to be sufficient warrant for Mme. Le Breton's orthodoxy.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE, 50 Regent Street, London, W.
City Branch—14 Cornhill, E.C. Founded 1806.
REPORT of the DIRECTORS, presented at the 78th ANNUAL MEETING at the Office, on Wednesday, January 30, 1884.

The Directors have to report that the transactions of the Provident Life Office during the year 1883 have been highly satisfactory.
Proposals for new Assurances amounting to £679,086 were received. Policies for £575,520 were issued and taken up, producing new annual Premiums amounting to £19,770, as against £19,211 for the previous year. These Assurances and new annual Premiums respectively represent the actual net amounts. No re-assurances were effected during the year.
The Proposals, declined and not completed, amounted to £103,566.
The Claims for the year were £102,254, being £29,116 more than the corresponding sum for 1882.
The annual Income is now £110,971, being an Increase of £9,788.
During the year the sum of £19,620 was paid for the surrender of Policies. The values paid upon Bonus Policies ranged from 53 per cent.—the minimum surrender value—to as much as 93½ per cent. of the Premiums received.
The total Funds of the Office on December 31 last were £2 323,281, being an increase of £11,197, a result very satisfactory considering the special extra payments required to be made on account of the recent division of Profits. The average interest realized was £1 5s. 6½ per cent., as against £4 4s. during 1882.
The large measure of public support received by the Provident Life Office—as shown in the still increasing amount of new business—is gratifying evidence that persons do, from set of effecting Assurances are wisely alive to the advantages given by an Office which has all the experience to be gained from a successful existence of seventy-eight years, and which is ready to adapt its practice to the requirements of the present day.

THIRD AND CHEAPER EDITION, 1 vol. 6s.

From the ATHENÆUM.
"'The Brandreths' is a pleasant book to read. It is an unusual treat to the reader to find himself in the company of a man of the world who is also a man of knowledge and culture, and who possesses the power of writing with ease and with point. Mr. Hope's pictures of society and his analyses of character are all excellent. The political sketches and allusions are made with a good deal of humour."

From the SPECTATOR.
"'The Brandreths' has all the charm of its predecessor. The great attraction of the novel is the easy, conversational, knowledgeable tone of it; the sketching from the life, and yet not so close to the life as to be malicious, men, women, periods, and events, to all of which intelligent readers can fit a name. The political and social sketches will naturally excite the chief interest among readers who will be attracted by the author's name and experience."

From the ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.
"'The Brandreths' is a clever and entertaining book. It contains much clever and picturesque writing. There is considerable skill, also, in the delineation of character, and the dialogue is natural and easy, pointed and witty. Mr. Beresford Hope draws largely from his experience of political and social life; and as a society novel his book has all the superiority to ordinary fictions of the class which may be derived from familiarity with the scenes and the people described."

From the STANDARD.
"There are many sayings in this work—many wise, many witty, many tender, many noble sayings—that we should wish to cite to our readers; but doubtless their pleasure will be greater in finding them out for themselves. It is a well planned and ably written story. The book is full of clever epigrams."

HURST & BLACKETT, PUBLISHERS, 13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

2 vols. crown 8vo. with Portraits, 21s.

ALARIC WATTS: a Narrative of his Life.

By his Son, ALARIC ALFRED WATTS.

Associated with the Literature and Art of the first half of the century, the "Life of Alaric Watts" will be found to contain interesting and valuable facts, reminiscences, and correspondence hitherto unpublished, of and concerning his friends among the poets and painters of that day—of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Hood, among the former; of Leslie, Constable, Etty, De la Roche, Ary Scheffer, Doveria, among the latter.

"These volumes are full of that sort of writing which has recently made reminiscences so deservedly popular. Mrs. Alaric Watts's sketch of Wordsworth is one of the best we have ever read, and will bear comparison even with Carlyle's graphic etching. The passages in Mr. Watts's book which we should like to quote are so numerous that we are fairly at a loss which to select."—St. James's Gazette.

THE STORY OF

CHINESE GORDON.

By A. EGMONT HAKE.

Demy 8vo. with Portraits and Maps, 15s.

"Who is General Gordon? He is no common man. It is no exaggeration, in speaking of General Gordon, to say that he is a hero. It is no exaggeration to say that he is a Christian. It is no exaggeration to say that in his dealings with Oriental peoples he has a genius, that he has a faculty, of influence and command, brought about by moral means. He has that faculty which produces effects among those wild Eastern races almost unintelligible to us Westerns."—Mr. Gladstone's Speech in the House of Commons, February 12, 1884.

THE LIFE AND TIMES
OF JESUS THE MESSIAH.

BY THE

Rev. ALFRED EDERSHEIM, M.A. Oxon. D.D. Ph.D.

Warburtonian Lecturer at Lincoln's Inn.

"Every page of Dr. EDERSHEIM's work reflects the Author's patient and far-reaching research, his uncommon power of focussing vast and varied learning, the clearness of his historical insight, and the simple beauty and force of a style admirably in keeping with his subject." MORNING POST.

"In this long and elaborate book Dr. EDERSHEIM has produced an important contribution to a subject of vast and perennial interest. . . . . Looked at from the standpoint of the English public, Dr. EDERSHEIM's account of the life of Christ is likely to obtain a marked success." The TIMES.

"These two volumes draw far more largely on Rabbinical sources for illustrations of the times in which Our Blessed SAVIOUR lived, than is usual in works of this class. The Author regards, rightly, the copious information therein contained as forming a background for the picture of the REDEEMER. The Catholic Biblical scholar will be able to derive both profit and pleasure from these pages, which represent years of conscientious toil." TABLET.

"The distinctive character and, as we think, the great practical value of this book lie in the collection of what we may call Jewish evidence and illustrations, in the Jewish standpoint from which it is written, and in the Jewish atmosphere with which it is imbued. A Jew by birth, nurtured in the best Jewish learning, and with a large acquaintance with Jewish literature and customs, Dr. EDERSHEIM is a Christian convert and minister, strongly evangelical in his views and imbued with a devout feeling." BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW.

"We have in these volumes a realistic and copious description of Jewish life in the time of Our LORD, as to its social conditions, manners, and customs, sects, and religious ideas, such as we have not met with in any other work of its class. . . . We hail Dr. EDERSHEIM's contribution to the literature of the life of CHRIST with devout thankfulness, and give to it our cordial commendation. It is manifestly the work of one who is a master in Israel, and eminently qualified for the task he has performed." CHRISTIAN.

"The Author's objects in writing, he says—and his book bears out his statement—are, by patient study of facts and documents, and by weighing arguments on both sides, to arrive at truth, irrespective of consequences, to present a full portraiture of the surroundings of the SAVIOUR, of Jewish life, society, and modes of thinking; and thirdly to meet such objections as might be raised to the Gospel narrative." SATURDAY REVIEW.

"Of Jewish origin, and steeped to the lips in Rabbinic lore, Dr. EDERSHEIM is peculiarly fitted to expound and popularize the local and national circumstances amid which that marvellous life was lived; and accordingly there is no such picture in English from this point of view as that which he has given us. From wider and deeper Jewish learning, much of which others have only skimmed, or consulted at second-hand, he is able, and apparently feels himself bound, to correct numerous errors into which previous writers have fallen. . . . . We must close with an earnest commendation of the book to every conscientious student of the Word of GOD." NONCONFORMIST.

RUSSIA AT MERV.

IT would not be uninteresting to know whether there is a single Englishman possessed of the most rudimentary knowledge of the facts who is pleased at the compliments which the Russian press has addressed to England in the matter of the annexation of Merv. We say annexation, for on that point there is practically no dispute. The resolve of Government after Government, Liberal no less than Conservative, that Russia never should have Merv, appears to have vanished simultaneously with the determination that Britons and persons with whom Britain has to do shall never be slaves. But that is a very minor matter. Just now in England we have supped full with humble pie, and a fresh dish may be brought in without any fear of attracting particular attention. It may even be thought remarkable that any Russian should have thought it necessary to garnish the pie with such elegant flowers as those which the St. Petersburg Journal has been good enough to offer. Wonder at this, however, would testify to a certain insufficiency of comprehension. In the first place, the Russians have not forgotten, if English Radicals have, how an English Government, despite the factiousness of an English party, stopped them not six years ago at the gates of Constantinople and the frontiers of Afghanistan. They probably think that, without a little blarney, England might be tempted to repeat the process. They may have heard of some expressions of Lord GRANVILLE's, and they know that Lord GRANVILLE is still Foreign Secretary. Besides, they owe a considerable debt of politeness to Mr. GLADSTONE, and your Russian is rarely wanting in that virtue. For our parts, as we may claim without fatuity to have kept our readers thoroughly informed of the progress and prospects of things in this out-of-the-way corner of the world, and as we have never used hard words of Russian conduct, so we certainly shall use none now. Russian statesmen ought to act, and do act, for the good of Russia, and it is small blame to them even if they sometimes stretch a point of international morality in so acting. We also have statesmen who are not ill at this stretching of points, only they generally stretch them for England's harm.

The formal acceptance of the submission of the Merv Turcomans by the CZAR has not the importance that it would once have had, and any one who has the simplicity or the dishonesty to do so is welcome, if he likes, to make the most he can of this acknowledgment. The Russianization of Merv is still very dangerous to England, and entirely incompatible with friendly action on the part of Russia towards England. But whereas but four or five years ago the only obvious road to India lay, for Russia, through the so-called oasis of the Murghab, it does not so lie now. The activity of Russia and the supineness of the English Government has provided another and a far better route. By the subjugation of the Western Tekkes and the laying of a railroad from the shores of the Caspian eastwards, Russia has provided herself with an access to Herat, where the real gate of India lies, infinitely more convenient and speedy than that which formerly seemed her most probable route—the Sea of Aral, the Oxus, and Merv. The latter place has lost its importance exactly as Ostend would lose it in the hands of an enemy to England who possessed Calais. It is a danger which has been dwarfed by a greater danger, a court card which has been dexterously exchanged for a trump. It would, indeed, be paying too great a compliment to the knowledge and the intelligence of the mass of Englishmen to suppose that they are aware of this. But it explains the comparative indifference with which the news has been received by those who have intelligence and knowledge. A man does not greatly excite himself if he is wise about calamities of such a kind as this. It proves, indeed, the incapacity of the present English Ministry; but a proof of that is about as novel and as valuable as a proof of the multiplication table. It is a fresh humiliation to England; but we are quite used to humiliations. It exposes the absurdity of the arguments of some who said that Russia would never get to Merv; the dishonesty of others who declared that let her once get there and she should see what England would do; but there is little consolation in this. The most humorous and to the political cynic satisfactory upshot of the matter would be that Mr. GLADSTONE's Government, after allowing the straight road to India to be occupied by Russia at Kizil Arvat and Askabad, should make a solemn protest against her occupation of a roundabout road at Merv. Perhaps we shall even have Sir CHARLES DILKE saying that the CZAR is not going to accept the Turcoman submission. Cela s'est vu.

Here, however, Stoicism must stop, and it will not be found that the fault of the Government is much lessened by even its fullest exercise. They have provided Russia with two roads to India instead of one, and so far as that goes, the one road is less important than if it were the only one. They are very welcome to this confession. But as to the present state of affairs and the future which may be expected, it is once more necessary, however hopeless the process may be in face of what has just happened, to give careless-living Englishmen an opportunity of understanding the truth. Another and a vast stride has been made in the obliteration of those deserts and mountains which the English critics of the optimist school even the other day boasted of as standing between Russia and Afghanistan. An alternative road is secured to the glacis of the outwork of India. A fresh accession, and a very numerous and important one, is made to those warlike and predatory troops upon whom Russia can draw for the invasion of a rich and peaceful country—a fresh deduction from the forces with which she has to reckon on her way thither. A fresh blow is dealt at English prestige in Central Asia. A new warning is given to the peoples of that region that Russia is unsafe to oppose and England unsafe to support, because the one never relaxes and the other never perseveres. And the Russians, in their courteous notices of faire part, do not at all conceal that they are not yet satisfied. It will indeed, they say, be unlikely that they ever need occupy Sarakhs—as they said of Khiva, as they said of the Tekke country, as they said of Merv. But this reassuring, though extremely indefinite, pledge is accompanied by the intimation that it will probably be necessary for them to occupy the Attock—the important, fertile, and populous region which intervenes between Askabad and Sarakhs itself, and which extends to the very river that waters Herat. This district, it is said, forms no part of Persia (which is exactly as true as that Wales forms no part of England), and it is a haunt of brigands. Precisely. The Tekke country was a haunt of brigands; so was Merv; so is the Attock. And so England is politely informed of the next thing to which she may make up her mind—a next thing which will all but accomplish the famous saying, and bring the Cossack horses to water of the Heri-Rud itself. This of course will be poohpoohed as alarmist talk by those who have poohpoohed the constant and distinct prophecies of every step which has preceded it. Between ourselves and the school of which the Duke of ARGYLL used to be the chief advocate there is this main difference. Everything they used to say has turned out false; everything we have constantly said has turned out true. The impossible deserts and the insuperable mountains are mastered and passed; the warlike tribes are vanquished, slain, or turned from foes into allies; the buffer between Russia and India has been transformed into the head of the ram which Russia can direct against India. Henceforward one line of defence which has been usually adopted for the policy of Mr. GLADSTONE's Government must be abandoned; it will probably be abandoned in silence. There can be no further talk of neutral zones, for there is no neutral zone left; of natural barriers, for the natural barriers have ceased to exist. Russia has not a stride, barely a step, to take before her frontier becomes continuously conterminous with that of the Ameer of AFGHANISTAN, who is in England's pay. And whereas the English side of Afghanistan can only be reached from England by an immense distance of ocean-travel, the Russian side is already all but reached by one, and will, beyond doubt, in a short time be reached by several lines of railway communication, divided only by a short stretch of inland sea, entirely under Russian control, from the headquarters and arsenals of the Russian army. This is what the annexation of Merv means, and this is what the policy of Mr. GLADSTONE has brought about.

THE OPPOSITION.

THE importance of organization to a party in opposition is not inconsiderable, though it is often exaggerated. If there is no leader of undisputed pre-eminence, it is impossible to supply the defect by any process of formal or informal election. The New Whig Guide alone preserves the memory of Mr. PONSONBY, who was the official leader of the Opposition of seventy years ago. The "Trial of HENRY "BROUGHAM for calling Mr. PONSONBY an old woman" accurately represents, as reported by PEEL, the relative positions of the reckless orator and of the orthodox chief of the Whigs. When, thirty years later, the Protectionists were left, by the death of Lord GEORGE BENTINCK, without a head in the House of Commons, Lord STANLEY wished to retain for himself the sole direction of the party. On several occasions he rebuked or slighted the pretensions of Mr. DISRAELI, once going so far as to propose to his unwelcome ally that the office of leader should be put into commission, in which Mr. DISRAELI was to have an equal voice with two colleagues of indisputable mediocrity. At a much later period the gossiping underlings of the party were in the habit of hinting that General PEEL or some other respectable Conservative should be substituted for their uncongenial leader; yet Mr. DISRAELI retained his post without serious disturbance for more than thirty years. It must nevertheless be remembered that after he left the House of Commons he exercised the functions of leader of the Opposition only for a few months. From the spring of 1880 to the recess his party was powerless in the presence of the newly-elected majority, and Lord BEACONSFIELD died almost at the beginning of the following Session. If he had retained his vigour to the present time he would probably have in a great measure controlled the policy of the party; but he must, to some extent, have divided his authority with the leader of the House of Commons. There is not the smallest ground for suspecting that he would have attempted to revoke his own selection of Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE as his successor and principal colleague. The leader of an Opposition in the House of Commons must necessarily exercise independent action, because he bears the brunt of Parliamentary contests.

The proposal of a provincial partisan that Lord SALISBURY should supersede his present coadjutor has attracted more attention than it deserves. The suggested change would add nothing to the power of the Conservative leader in the House of Lords, who must be represented in the House of Commons by some unspecified lieutenant, if he could not command the support of an independent colleague. The malcontents would probably prefer Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL for the vacant office, not remembering that Lord SALISBURY lately described the policy of abandoning the KHEDIVE as the basest desertion. There is no doubt that more than one candidate for the place of leader might be found who would say disagreeable things of Mr. GLADSTONE in stronger language than that which is likely to be used by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE; but the denunciation of a political adversary as a traitor, a slave, or a Moloch, has no tendency to detach a single vote from the Liberal majority. It may be true that, if the two Opposition leaders could change places, the position of the Government would be more uncomfortable than at present. Lord SALISBURY would gratify not only his own followers, but many Liberal members, by exposing and stigmatizing as it deserves the immoral sophistry of Mr. GLADSTONE's rhetorical quibbles; and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE would consult the taste of the Peers by a more dispassionate examination of Ministerial policy. As the transfer cannot be effected, judicious politicians will make the best of their actual resources. They may console themselves for occasional disappointments by reflecting that the most eloquent denunciations of Ministerial shortcomings would not, as the House of Commons is at present constituted, bring the Opposition into office. Mr. FORSTER and Mr. GOSCHEN, though their unanswerable arguments must at least have convinced themselves, had no hesitation in promising their votes to the authors of the Sinkat catastrophe. As Mr. FORSTER said, with evident sincerity, he preferred the present Government, whatever it had done or left undone, to the only possible alternative. If Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE had anticipated Mr. FORSTER by delivering the same speech, it would assuredly not have produced a more practical result.

Whatever may have been the effect of the Opposition speeches, the notice of motion was followed by a total change of policy on the part of the Government. The arguments against the culpable inaction of the Ministers were weakened in exact proportion to the concessions which were made. The majority in the House of Commons would not, perhaps, have strained the bonds of allegiance so far as to approve of a deliberate sacrifice of the garrison of Tokar; but it was too late to save the garrison of Sinkat. The issue of vacillation was less urgent when inconsistency was exhibited in the form of tardy vigour substituted for tame acquiescence. It may be true that the Opposition showed a want of readiness in profiting by a popular outburst of just indignation; but there was from the beginning of the incident to the end no opportunity of coalition with dissatisfied supporters of the Government. The feelings and opinions of theoretically independent Liberals were fully expressed by Mr. FORSTER, who also anticipated their decision to stand by their party at the division. It is probable that recent scandals may not have affected the comparatively unsophisticated minds of electors, though they were powerless to penetrate the hardened partisanship of members of the House. It is impossible to judge whether the Somersetshire farmers thought more of Sinkat than of the foot-and-mouth disease; and perhaps the respectable minority of Paisley objected rather to general encouragement of revolution than to the abandonment of a few Egyptian garrisons. There is some reason to hope that a general election, if it occurs before the virtual disfranchisement of the present electorate, will disclose a partial reaction against the delirium of 1880; but the result of an appeal to the constituencies is wholly uncertain. It is not even known whether moderate Liberals will vote against a Government which they undoubtedly fear and dislike. Mr. LABOUCHERE, Mr. GEORGE, and from time to time Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, are doing their utmost to accelerate the process of conversion. The alliance of Whigs with Jacobins and Socialists is too unnatural to last.

If the leaders of the Opposition could have controlled the action of the House, they would have been well advised in dividing, like the Lords, on the first night of the debate. While the Vote of Censure was moved, the massacre of the garrison of Sinkat was fresh in recollection; and there can scarcely have been half a dozen members who shared the doubts of Mr. WADDY whether it would have been desirable to accept the responsibility of saving a limited number, as Mr. GLADSTONE said, of lives. It is not known whether a laudable feeling of indignation would have detached any Liberal vote from the party; but, if the Government would have incurred any danger of that kind, the long interval which was afterwards occupied with the debate destroyed all chance of secession. The details of reinforcements forwarded to Suakim were published day after day, and before the division it was known that General GORDON had arrived safely at Khartoum, and that he had met with an enthusiastic reception. The change of circumstances, though it really involved a condemnation of the previous policy of the Government, nevertheless removed or diminished popular dissatisfaction. The attention of the House and the country was diverted from past miscarriages to a future which may perhaps be more satisfactory. The Opposition may fairly claim a portion of the credit of a more spirited policy; but it incurred the disadvantage of aiming at a moving object which had changed its position before the missile could reach it. It must not be inferred that the leaders judged wrongly in trying to profit by an apparent opportunity. When Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE gave notice of the motion, it was uncertain whether the Government would at last act with vigour; and it was possible that things might go from bad to worse. An opposite result only illustrates the inconvenience of depending on occasions and on chance.

Votes of censure have often been proposed for the purpose of profiting by an anticipated coalition. A combination arranged by Lord JOHN RUSSELL, Mr. DISRAELI, and Mr. GLADSTONE, forced Lord PALMERSTON to dissolve Parliament in 1857, and in the following year the same league drove him from office on an entirely different ground. There is now no section of disaffected Liberals with which the Opposition can form a temporary alliance, and it is not worth the while of either party to bid high for the support of Mr. PARNELL and his followers. If the Government had been in serious danger, the diplomacy of Kilmainham might possibly have been revived; but the Opposition had nothing to gain by courting a disaffected faction. Even a casual victory obtained by such methods would have been embarrassing; and there was little advantage in diminishing the Ministerial majority. Some of the criticisms which have been directed against the conduct of the late struggle are not without foundation; but it must be remembered that it was impossible to win. Lord SALISBURY and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE were not so simple as to take the advice of opponents who urged upon them the expediency of announcing a policy of their own. The proposition that the conduct of the Government has been weak and perverse may be affirmed without assuming the responsibility of defining the policy which ought to be adopted for the future. It is not necessary or reasonable to condemn every step in a career of vacillation. As Mr. FORSTER said, the disaster of Sinkat would have been averted if the Government had done a short time earlier what it has done since the catastrophe. Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S motion has at least had the merit of eliciting Mr. FORSTER'S speech in its support.

EGYPT

THE reported, and seemingly confirmed, surrender of Tokkar throws even further into the shade the debate which closed on Tuesday. Although, as Lord HARTINGTON ingenuously complained, the speeches of that night were, for the Government, embarrassingly good, and although the last debate thus somewhat redeemed a discussion of a general dulness as inordinate as its length, the division which followed had remarkably little interest. It was not only completely anticipated, but its circumstances made it in fact—what the division in the Upper House last week was falsely represented as being—little more than a farce. Perhaps, if the House of Commons had divided, like the Peers, on the night of the introduction of the Motion, a rather more genuine expression of opinion might have been obtained; but even that is doubtful. The rank and file of the majority only needed, or hardly needed, excuses for putting their consciences in their pockets; and the excuses were provided, on the one hand, by Mr. GLADSTONE'S discourses de omnibus rebus (except the charge brought against him), and by the tardy despatch of an expedition to Tokkar. But it would be unfair to confine remarks to the rank and file. It was not merely the faex Schnadhorstii, the riffraff of the Caucus ticket of 1880, that flocked into the Government lobby on Tuesday. Persons of the rank of Mr. FORSTER and Mr. GOSCHEN were found to say—in the latter case literally—that the Opposition indictment was perfectly justified by the evidence, but that they would not "give blank cheques" to their political opponents. After this, it may be supposed that in the present and in future Parliaments the idle farce of votes of want of confidence will be omitted, at any rate when a Radical Government is in power. Such a Government has the proxies of the delegates sent up by the Caucuses safe in its pocket, and need trouble itself about nothing further, or at most about very little. The majority of Tuesday was consistently composed of persons like Mr. FORSTER, who abominate the Government policy up to the date of the despatch of the present expedition, and of those who like Mr. WADDY, abominate the Government policy since that date. It affirmed in effect nothing except that the members of it do not wish to see their own party out of power; it denied nothing except that they are willing to postpone factious to national interests. Lord HARTINGTON complained that his opponents, whether Liberal or Conservative, took no notice of the Government defence. It was not easy to take notice of what did not exist. So long as the despatches of the 4th of November and the 4th of January remain in print, so long as history records the presence of English troops at Cairo and at Aden while the garrison of Sinkat were being butchered, so long as files of the newspapers which daily exposed the hopeless condition of BAKER PASHA'S force are preserved in the British Museum, so long will defence of the conduct of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government during the last four months be absolutely impossible. The attack of the Opposition may have been and was arranged with little skill, and carried out with surprisingly little vigour; the wave of popular sentiment last week may have been left unused; the tactics of delaying and watering down the debate may have been infelicitous and ill deserving of success. That is a mere party matter. If the attack had been as close and fiery as it was scattered and lukewarm, if the defence had been as stubborn as it was in fact evasive, the argumentative result could have been in no way different, and very likely the divisional result would have been the same. The disasters of Teb and Sinkat were due to the vacillation and inconsistency of the Government, and the majority of the House of Commons were determined that the Government should be acquitted of them in the teeth of evidence. Mr. GOSCHEN and Mr. FORSTER have each in his way said as much, and the last word may be very safely left with these distinguished members of the acquitting jury.

So much for the past—a past than which it is not easy to imagine anything more disgraceful to the Government, and than which it is possible to imagine several things more creditable to the Opposition. There remain the present and the future. Of the present at Khartoum it appears useless to say anything. The country is bidden to put its trust in General GORDON, and General GORDON will pull it through. It is not to trouble about the formal establishment under the protection of England of practices against which England, whether wisely or unwisely, has fought with purse and pains and the lives of her sons for the greater part of a century. It is not to ask what the possible meaning of a remission of taxation can be when the right to tax, if it has not already been formally renounced, is about to be so. Nor is it to have one rebellious twinge at the recognition as Sultan of a rebel adventurer, who not many weeks ago slaughtered Englishmen and troops despatched against him, with the connivance—at any rate by the laches—of England. That there is one Mr. GLADSTONE, and that General GORDON is his plenipotentiary, is the appropriate formula provided for the use of Englishmen on this occasion. It is obviously impossible to criticize from any point of view of political experience, of precedent, or of probability a course of proceedings which avowedly sets all three at nought. England being, by the Gladstonian hypothesis, powerless, has effaced herself entirely, and put a single Englishman in her room; and there is nothing to do but to wait for the result of this singular experiment. At the other point of interest, Souakim, an expedition is being collected, apparently in vain, to do a task which could have been done a month ago with little trouble and a minimum of expense. English troops are not likely to lie down and howl when OSMAN DIGNA'S Arabs approach, even after the encouraging effect which the fall of Tokkar, as showing the impotency of the English Government, must produce on the rebels. But, if the Arabs do show fight, it is well to remember that it will be fight of a very different character from that shown at Tel-el-Kebir. There has, moreover, been no time to "salt" the troops with old soldiers, as Lord WOLSELEY took care to do two years ago. But on the whole it is probable that nearly a month's frantic exertion on the part of the whole English military organization may enable the country to deal with some thousands of spear-armed savages.

In all this tangle of mismanagement and disgrace, of paradox and fuss, there is one, and only one, gleam of comfort. It is acknowledged on all hands that the date of English departure from Egypt is indefinitely postponed. Lord HARTINGTON himself has so entirely changed his mind since he made a certain celebrated announcement that he pleads inadvertence in making it, and urges that it was not made in Parliament. Whence it appears that a statesman divests himself of all responsibility when he steps into Palace Yard. The chief pillar—the corner-stone, rather—of the ricketty edifice reared by the Government in Egypt, the army devised by Sir EVELYN WOOD, has proved to be unusable abroad and mutinous at home. The late events have shown that not the remotest sense of public spirit, not the faintest glimmering of independent patriotism, exists in the fellah. The crowning farce of turning him into a free and independent elector has been too glaring to be yet carried out. The merely administrative reforms which have been attempted represent the result of a direct contest between English and Egyptian views, and are admittedly certain to be reversed the moment that England turns her back. Nothing has been done to redistribute taxation in an equitable fashion, nothing to relieve the peasantry of their load of indebtedness. The whole action of the English Government, except in the retention of the English garrison, has been simply that of a boy who takes an ill-going clock to pieces, and studiously avoids putting it together again. We have upset Egyptian government in Egypt proper, and destroyed it in the Soudan, and at present we are creating useless and expensive posts to salve French vanity in the former, and offering the domestic institution as a panacea for all evils in the latter. All this is bad enough; but at any rate it is not so bad as that which is the cause of it all—the paralysing influence of Lord HARTINGTON'S and Mr. GLADSTONE'S threats of speedy withdrawal. Those threats have not been formally cancelled, but everybody knows them to be at the present moment merely absurd. Instead of withdrawing our garrison, we are strengthening it; instead of pointing to institutions firmly set up and working to admiration, we have to admit that the only institution which seemed to be in something like working order is perfectly valueless. There is not a reasonable man living, except, perhaps, Mr. GLADSTONE from one point of view, and Mr. JOHN MORLEY from another, who is ignorant of what this means. It means that we are in Egypt till the Greek Calends; and so much the better for Egypt when the fact is officially as it is nationally recognized.

THE WOOER AND THE WOOED.

IT is not without amusement that many persons must have read of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S candidature for the next vacancy that may occur in the representation of the borough of Birmingham. An attempt to conquer the virgin fortress of Radicalism by the most audacious of Conservatives is an event which even persons not otherwise interested in politics may regard with curiosity. It is an event also which, the more we consider both the personality of the young Conservative politician and the character of the constituency which he seeks to win, is full of instruction. For it cannot be denied that both may be said to be phenomenal. Colonel BURNABY, to whom we refer with all respect, does not differ, politically speaking, from the majority of his party; and his candidature only signified that the Conservatives in the borough were in sufficiently good heart to put forward a candidate. But Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL represents a new and distinct type of Conservatism. It is certain that Conservatism of the older sort would have no chance of success in the birthplace of the Caucus. For three generations the current of political feeling in Birmingham has flowed in one direction; and if the next election should show that it has changed, the change will be due to the fact that there, as elsewhere, people are finding out that the terms "Liberal" and "Conservative" stand for something wholly different from what they represented fifty years ago. But truths of this kind are not brought home to a large electoral body by a process of sober reasoning. Some startling event occurs to break and scatter its habitual set of ideas, or some energetic individual catches the popular eye, and draws popular sympathy into new channels.

It was formerly the fashion to represent Liberalism as being, among many other things, the cause of the poor against the wealthy and privileged classes; and at one time, in the best days of Liberalism, there was a good deal of truth in this representation. The idea is still in vogue among the baser sort of demagogues, and is sometimes made use of by persons who ought to know better, to excite those who toil and spin against others who, though they may do the former, do not happen to do the latter. The Conservative, according to this view, is a man who wishes cunningly to frame unjust laws with a view to maintain and concentrate wealth and power in the hands of a small class; the Liberal, and especially the latest flower of Liberalism—the Radical—is one who would diffuse happiness and plenty equally among all. This assertion raises, however, a curious question. Why, if it be true, do large constituencies, in which the working classes have the preponderance, and can return to Parliament whom they choose, persist in returning Conservatives? Why should an artisan at Preston perversely vote for a member who is going to be unmindful of the interests of the working classes, and look with suspicion on the promises of the poor man's friend? Hardheadedness is commonly said to be a characteristic of Lancashire and Yorkshire; and yet in these Northern counties we find, among the large constituencies, that the Liberal constantly fails and the Conservative succeeds. It is obvious that there must be a strong basis of Conservatives among the mass of the people when, in spite of all that is said to inflame and seduce them, in spite of all appeals to their greed, their need, their envy, and their ignorance, so large a number of them remain true to the Conservative cause; and can clearly perceive, in spite of all the assurances to the contrary which Radical candidates for their support lay before them, that the Liberal cause and the popular cause are not the same.

Even Mr. BRIGHT must have misgivings on this point. Nearly all the speeches which he has made of late years have consisted of recitals of what the Liberal party accomplished long ago. Since the Free-trade question was settled, the initiative in movements for the benefit of the working class cannot be said to have belonged to any one party. The credit both of the factory legislation and of legislation for the improvement of the dwellings of the poor belongs to the Conservatives. The credit of the Education Act belongs to the Liberals. To any sensible man it appears only natural that such honours should be divided. There is no conceivable reason why the condition of the poor should be an object of greater interest to a Liberal than to a Conservative, or to a Conservative than to a Liberal. A humane statesman, to whatever party he belongs, will naturally devote many of his thoughts to such questions; and, though what is called humanitarianism is much more strongly represented on Liberal than on Conservative benches, there is not the slightest reason to believe that either party is a whit more or less humane than the other. The quick sense of the duty which those well placed in this world owe to others less fortunate is, as a general feeling, of recent origin; but, so far as it exists, it is in no sense a special characteristic of any party. It depends on the character of the individual and has no connexion with his political views. Whatever their politics may be, it is the interest of a Ministry in a popularly-governed country that the people should be contented; and contented the people will not be so long as they suffer under recognized and removable evils. The advance which has been made of late years consists, not merely in what each party has achieved for the benefit of the people in general, but also in the fact that a large class of evils once left unnoticed have been recognized, and a large class of evils once deemed inevitable have been removed or palliated, and the praise of this belongs to no political party alone.

In his Midland campaign Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL will accordingly find the ground prepared for him as it could not have been for a Conservative candidate in former times, or would be now to any one of the few survivors of the old type of Conservative. His personal qualities will also do him more good, and his defects less harm, in the constituency which he seeks to represent than would probably be the case anywhere else in the kingdom. There is no other constituency where energy, pluck, self-confidence (even when carried further than is to be commended), zeal for one's political creed and party, the love of a fight, the desire to excommunicate those who differ from one, a turn for strong language, and other such qualities are received with more favour than in this. Much of what to us may seem ungraceful and indiscreet in the language of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL will not appear exaggerated to those accustomed to the denunciations which have often fallen from the lips of the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE and the ex-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. We differ as strongly as Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL from the political opinions of the PRIME MINISTER; but we prefer to express our dissent in language a little less highly flavoured. Yet, if the cases were reversed, and a Conservative Government were responsible for the bloodshed in Egypt and for the apparent sanction, however inevitable it may be, given by the British Government to the slave-trade in the Soudan, we may be sure that language as strong, and stronger, would have been spoken on many platforms, and, among others, in that of the Town Hall in Birmingham, and this by those who have not the excuse of youth and inexperience which may be pleaded in defence of the member for Woodstock. At the time when the massacres in Bulgaria took place, for which the Conservative Government was not in any way, directly or indirectly, responsible, language was used towards it in all parts of the country, and by men who had a character to lose, which should keep them silent, if they are inclined just now to make political capital out of such indiscretions as those of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S, regrettable as they may be. But, as we said before, the constituents to whom Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL intends to appeal will hardly object to him on the ground of his strong language. On the contrary, they will probably like it, as people are in the habit of liking the things to which they have been long made accustomed. It is not in the constituency represented by Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN that invectives against opponents will seem irrelevant and tasteless. Nor is it in the constituency which has witnessed and partaken in the success of the latter gentleman that an eager and persistent self-assertion will not seem the best and purest road to honour. The event, in any case, of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S candidature will be looked forward to with peculiar interest.

THE TRANSVAAL.

LORD DERBY'S negotiations with the Transvaal delegates seem to be at last concluded. From the beginning there was little doubt that the COLONIAL SECRETARY would concede the greater part of the demands which were preferred. Lord DERBY was not personally responsible for the sham Convention of Pretoria, and he may perhaps have taken a cynical pleasure in making the virtual admission that the document was originally framed for the purpose of disguising a discreditable surrender. The PRIME MINISTER at the time assured the House of Commons that the just claims of the Imperial Government and the rights of the native residents had been as fully secured as if the Boers had been defeated in the field. Having effected his immediate object of pacification, he probably ceased to interest himself in the efficiency or validity of the ostensible compromise. When the Government a year ago agreed to reopen the question, first through a Commissioner to be sent from England, and afterwards by the reception of a mission from the Transvaal, the Convention was practically superseded. The Government of Pretoria had succeeded not only in relaxing its obligations, but in establishing a precedent for repudiating any agreement which might be onerous. It may perhaps have been judicious to abstain from claiming the full performance of existing covenants; but it must not be forgotten that a just and permanent settlement might have been made four years ago if the English Commander-in-Chief had been allowed to retrieve the disasters of Lang's Neck and Majuba. The Transvaal Government, once finally relieved from the fear of military coercion, had something to gain and nothing to lose by subsequent negotiation. It is true that the Boers had to deal with a greatly superior Power, but under the condition that it would in no case resort to force.

The terms of the new arrangement have not yet been published; but it is understood that the only point on which the delegates have failed is the determination of the Western frontier of the Republic. The trade route between the Cape Colony and the interior will remain outside the territory of the Transvaal, in spite of the anxiety of the delegates to acquire control over a portion of the line. Measures have been taken for the prevention of outrage on the border; and it is possible that the lawless aggressions of the Boers on the lands of native chiefs may be discouraged or repressed. The remission of a part of the debt due to the Imperial Government may perhaps involve little pecuniary loss. The Republic is to call itself by any name which may be deemed advisable; and it will enjoy not only absolute independence, but the right of entering into diplomatic relations with foreign Powers. The suzerainty of the Crown is thus wholly abolished; and the change of relations will probably be recognized by the appointment of a Consul in place of the Resident at Pretoria. The duty of protecting the native population of the Transvaal has been practically renounced, and it may be admitted that no case of recent domestic oppression has been known to occur. In the determination of the frontier line provision was made for the independence of the two Bechuana chiefs who have remained loyal to their English connexion. In other respects the delegates have obtained all that they desired, having probably found that Lord DERBY was almost as anxious as themselves to sever the last ties between a nominally dependent community and the Crown. It may be hoped that one of the most discreditable episodes in recent history is now finally closed. The annexation was unwise; the surrender which followed the skirmish at Majuba was unworthy; and the acquiescence which will attend the results of the late negotiation will scarcely amount to complacency. The country has scarcely noticed the transaction, partly because the whole subject has become unpalatable, and also because public attention has been directed elsewhere.

The resumption of the protectorate over the Basutos has been simultaneously completed. As long as MASUPHA and one or two other chiefs of the Basutos stand aloof, the proceeding cannot be regarded with unqualified satisfaction; but on the whole the agreement, both with the Cape Colony and with the friendly natives, may be considered judicious. The Cape Government contributes 20,000*l.* a year to the expenses of the protectorate, in consideration of a release of its former liability. The occasion and the result of the quarrel between the Basutos and the Colonial Government are not uninstructive. The natives were contented to be dependent on the Cape till an unwise attempt was made to disarm them; and in the contest which followed they proved themselves strong enough to resist all attempts at reconquest. Until the date of the premature establishment of responsible government at the Cape, the Basutos had willingly submitted to the supremacy of the Crown. They have since their rupture with the Colony contended with good reason that their allegiance ought not to have been transferred to another ruler without their consent. The great majority of the chiefs recognize the advantage of a protectorate which may both maintain internal peace and prevent collisions with the neighbouring Republic. The Orange River State some years ago annexed a portion of Basutoland in retaliation for frontier outrages committed by turbulent chiefs. The forfeited lands were afterwards restored on the intercession of the English authorities, and a certain responsibility for preventing a recurrence of disturbances was consequently incurred. An English Resident has now been appointed; and it is believed that the expense of the protectorate will be covered by the proceeds of a moderate hut-tax, together with the contribution of the Cape. The Basutos appear to be more susceptible of civilization than any of the other South African tribes; and probably the Government has exercised a wise discretion in assisting them to guard against anarchy. It would be wrong to renounce the duty which has through various circumstances devolved on the Imperial Government of assuming a benevolent supervision of native interests. The mismanagement which has caused the establishment of two independent States in the neighbourhood of the English dominions is now irrevocable, but all branches of the Kaffir nation have learned to prefer English influence to the supremacy of any other European race.

The task of restoring or creating some kind of order in Zululand is at the same time difficult and urgent. The barbarous confusion which at present prevails is the consequence of English intervention and of subsequent official caprice. Before the Zulu war the country was subject to an oppressive military despotism, but the supreme power was strong enough to prevent internal feuds and to restrain all oppression but its own. The system of government under CETEWAYO, though it shocked the minds of sensitive neighbours, was preferable to the present condition of chronic civil war. The Boers on the North-Western border will not fail to promote the disorders which induce contending chiefs to invite their costly aid. Rival candidates for their support bid against one another by offers of lands which may perhaps not in all cases belong to the liberal donors. It is said that CETEWAYO orally bequeathed his sovereignty to an infant son; but probably the claims of a helpless child will be disregarded by his own kindred as well as by open enemies. If the internecine contest is allowed to continue, some warlike chieftain will perhaps found a dynasty; or, if the competitors are approximately equal in strength and in fortune, a crowd of petty potentates may divide the country among them. The English Government cannot release itself from moral responsibility by declining to interfere. It might have let CETEWAYO alone; and, when he was once deposed, it ought to have forbidden his return. As the Colonial Minister of the time chose to effect an unwise restoration, the Government is bound to mitigate the consequences of the blunder.

At present it is probable that the contending chiefs would submit with little opposition to any reasonable arrangement. The Government is pledged to maintain USIBEPU in possession of the territory which he received from Sir GARNET WOLSELEY, and which he retained after the return of CETEWAYO because he was too strong to be easily removed. The same authority which assigned to the restored KING all the remainder of the country with the exception of the Reserve, may now regard the territory as escheated in consequence of his death. It will be possible to make a suitable provision for the heirs of CETEWAYO if they appear to have a tenable claim; and also to compensate the chiefs who were deprived of their lands for the benefit of the KING. It is perhaps too much to expect that the present Government should institute a protectorate and call it by its proper name; but there is little doubt that such a measure would both satisfy the natives and reduce to the lowest point the difficulty of preventing disturbances and wars. The division of the country into no less than thirteen petty principalities succeeded better than could have been expected, because the natives supposed that the appointed chiefs were really the delegates, as well as the nominees, of the English Government. Their kindred in Natal have for many years lived at peace, though they outnumber the white colonists in the proportion of twenty to one. Even if the scheme of a protectorate is abandoned in deference to popular prejudice, it is probably not too late to follow the advice of Sir HENRY BULWER by largely increasing the Reserve. There might still be a neutral zone interposed between the protected province and the territory of USIBEPU; and, as far as English authority extended, there would be no danger of encroachment on the part of the Boers, and internal war would be rendered impossible.

A JOURNALIST'S DAY.

THE world is full of young men who think they would like to be journalists. They would prefer, of course, to be some one's private secretary, because that is reckoned more respectable and even more easy than the pursuits of journalism. But the number of secretaryships is strictly limited, and the press seems to have a promise of good things. Youth anticipates a constant series of "first nights" at plays, of "private views" (a pleasure apt to pall), of jolly suppers, and amusing companionships. For all this hopeful youth will have nothing to do but to turn out a little "copy" now and then; and what can be easier? It is true that the young men who thus regard the profession of the ready-writer are ignorant of books, ignorant of life, often dull-witted. They have no special knowledge, still less half a dozen different sorts of special knowledge. They do not even possess the arts which it is the business of Oxford to teach, of appearing to know, and of turning out hasty generalizations with the rapidity of machines. If you ask one of these ambitious persons why he, more than another man, should be allowed to "mould the masses," and why people should pay him for saying things when he has nothing to say, he is without a reply. He admits that he has nothing to say, but is not impressed by the corollary plain enough that he will find no one to listen. Other fellows write, and why should not he?

Yes, and other fellows teach in schools, and plead causes, and farm, and go to the diamond mines, and manufacture, and break stones in the road, and why should not he? The neophyte replies that he "hates ushering," that he "hates "the Bar," that he "hates the country," and that he "does "not like going abroad." Very likely not; but he may just as well do so as attempt to make a living by his pen, when he has neither acquaintance with affairs, nor knowledge of literature, nor energy, nor impudence and push, and a brazen brow, nor even light-hearted sprightliness of style. In one or other department of the great trade which ranges from Quarterly Reviewing to scribbling in boys' papers and parish magazines, from scolding a political rival to interviewing a comic actress, from reviewing a novel to describing a battle, the qualities which we have mentioned are available. But our ideal aspirant has not even the right sort of bad qualities necessary for success in the least reputable directions. Why then should he persist in pestering people who know some one whose wife's cousin married an art-critic for an introduction to the press?

The reason, as we have already hinted, is that the journalist's life seems an easy one. He need never read; he need never observe; he has only to scribble any disjointed chat as he sits in slippers by the fireside. How very different the facts are, how necessary study and knowledge of men, women, and cities, how needful promptitude and enterprise are to journalists of various sorts, people who have reflected on the matter probably know. Persons who don't know, and who think the press a kind of light, gentlemanly occupation, may study Mr. SALA's description of a day of his life in the Illustrated London News of last week. Mr. SALA's is one of the three or four names of men connected with the press which are known outside a very small professional circle. Our English system of anonymity is so well preserved that the majority even of newspaper men have no more than a guess as to the writer of this or that article in a journal. But Mr. SALA has travelled so much, has seen so much, has written so much about so many subjects, and has such a way of becoming the friend of his readers, that, even in the depths of the country, people have heard of Mr. SALA. They know him as a conteur, as a "walking" (not very walking, after all, it appears) "encyclopædia" and embodied Notes in reply to all men's Queries. They know him as the successful wooer of the shy Echo of the week; they know him as a novelist, a critic, and in many other ways. Probably, in spite of his multitudinous occupations, the aspirant to journalism thinks that Mr. SALA has an easy time of it, that pearls and rubies of anecdote and criticism drop from his pen in a kind of automatic way while he takes his pastime or repose.

Mr. SALA, who need not fear that he "has been a bore in "thus dwelling on the details of the daily life of a busy "writer for the press," removes the ideal visions of the aspirant. He shows how he rises early, and late takes rest, and takes no exercise at all, and very little food. Yes, the journalist is the modern anchorite, who "should eat and "drink as little as he possibly can," who breakfasts on a bit of toast, and lunches he knows not how nor when. The ideal day of the would-be journalist is to rise about twelve, breakfast at one, go into the park, dawdle about a club, hear a lot of gossip, write somehow a few "notes," dine with a Cabinet Minister or at a fashionable restaurant, and so, after a brilliant supper, to bed about the time when the lark is rising. Mr. SALA's ideal day is different. He shuns delights, and even eggs and bacon at breakfast. He lives laborious days, and if he outwatches the Bear, his vigils are occupied with severe classical studies, now, alas! almost unknown to polite writers. "In the morning, punctually as the clock "strikes eight," the busy journalist is found mortifying the flesh with a morsel of toast and a cup of coffee, "breakfast-"ing in spectacles, and with a pair of scissors in his hand." The scissors are not, of course, a professional substitute for a fork, but imply the zeal of the journalist to be cutting out paragraphs and trifling with the paste-pot. Then, the morsel of toast despatched, this industrious student (who sincerely deserves the respectful sympathy of all) sits down to read the Times, the Daily Telegraph, the Daily News, the Standard, the Post, the Advertiser, the New York Herald, and Figaro. Besides this ocean of stuff which must be read, there comes "a desultory deluge of newspapers "and periodicals," containing marked paragraphs about yourself, your past, and your future. But the neophyte may be informed for his comfort that this particular deluge only sweeps into the rooms of persons as well known as Mr. SALA. Between eight and ten there is no harder work to do than reading the papers. Between ten and one is given to answering letters. These, again, the aspirant will only be troubled with when he is a recognised authority on Cookery, Cremation, the Conscience Clause, Folk Lore, Geography, Sport, Fiction, History, the Drama, Science, Diplomacy, Dancing, Gerrymandering, Swordsmanship, and Serendipity. Besides answering letters, the journalist is cutting out of newspapers paragraphs which may be made the topics of articles, is pasting them on slips of paper, and is adding his own view of how each matter should be treated. These slips are carried to an able editor, who makes his selections among the subjects. At one you have luncheon, "like a "Christian" if it is not a very hard day, "more like a "maniok" (if we may quote the Claimant) if it is a very hard day. "You lunch off a chair by your side" (is not this meal rather heavy, and too like "bolting a door"?) and "forget, ten minutes afterwards, whether you have had any "lunch at all." O dura ilia! Yet is journalism thought a nice profession for people in feeble health. After lunch, if the day is not so very hard as to demand luncheon off a chair, you read "some solid book." There are, however, journalists who smoke a cigarette at this period of their labours. Then comes the tug of war. "From two to a "quarter to seven you are 'at it,' writing leading articles, "or stories, or essays." Perhaps most people find the hours between ten and one the best for composition; not so Mr. SALA. Just when the world is walking, riding, lounging, playing lawn-tennis, looking on at a cricket match, or enjoying the wild excitement of a garden party, the truly vigorous journalist pens his immortal, though fugitive, works. At five he unbends over a cup of tea and a slice of plum cake. At seven he dines. Then he is free till eleven P.M., when he comes home, and "devotes two solid silent hours" to study. Meanwhile bores, beggars, mad people, people with grievances, and (we may add) young gentlemen and ladies who wish to write for the press never cease to assail the writer. "These are only incidental items in your "daily burden. There is the calling, such as it is. It "does not lead to anything in particular" (except to a congested liver and a lunatic asylum), "and it is poorly re-"munerated." But at the bottom of PANDORA'S box remains this good thing; "it is certainly a most amusing trade," although, Mr. SALA says, "the journalist must work on "Sunday." Thus the newspaper man may cry, like DANGLE in the Critic, "it's plaguey, but it's pleasant too." The trade may be amusing when an amusing writer plies it; but in too many cases it is both dull and the cause of dulness in others. Such as it is, the trade which is ill paid, leads to nothing, and demands the life of a Benedictine monk is much coveted by people who do not bring to the business one single necessary quality. These people are the chief of all the bores who haunt the journalist.

THE WATER COMPANIES' CASE.

THE Water Companies' Bill promoted by the Corporation of London has had the unexpected result of making Mr. COOPE a supporter of the Ministerial plan for governing London. At least he is negatively a supporter of it. He does not so much care how it will affect London as how it will affect the Corporation. Provided that he can see the Water Companies avenged on this treacherous body, he will be content. Londoners may pay more rates and have less to show for them; but, so long as the Corporation suffers, Mr. COOPE will not care. Retributive justice is all that is now left him. If he can but see the measure which the Corporation propose to mete out to the Water Companies meted out to them in return, all else will be endurable. They have had the presumption to lay their unhallowed hands upon vested interests in the shape of back dividends and payments regulated, not by the value of the article, but by the wealth of the purchaser; and the one pleasure that Mr. COOPE can still enjoy is to recall in how short a time other and stronger hands will be laid upon interests with which the Corporation will be less willing to play fast and loose.

Besides being frankly revengeful, Mr. COOPE is also a little hasty. It has not yet been proved that the Water Companies are legally entitled to the large present and yet larger future incomes to which they so confidently lay claim. The increase in the dividends of the various Water Companies is something quite distinct from the ordinary growth of a trading concern. No doubt in a city like London the Water Companies would have derived a considerable increase even from this source. The inhabited area is constantly extending, and houses which consume a great quantity of water are constantly taking the place of houses which by comparison consume very little. On the system on which the Water Companies are allowed to base their charges, these causes alone would have accounted for a good deal of prosperity. But the process which has been most conspicuously at work is of another kind. The Water Companies were not only allowed to charge their customers in proportion to the value or the rent of their houses—that in itself might have roughly, but not inaccurately, expressed the actual quantities supplied. The hardship is that, when provision was made for revaluing London houses from time to time, Parliament omitted to provide that the increased value should not be taken into account by the Water Companies. Interference with the income derived from the periodical growth in the valuation of London is not the same thing as interference with the income derived from the original valuation. The latter is in the nature of a sum of money paid in accordance with an Act of Parliament for water supplied by the Companies. The former is merely an accidental result of an Act of Parliament passed for a different purpose. The Legislature chose a rate as the method by which the London Water Companies should levy their payments in the belief that it would prove generally convenient, and the only way in which payment by meter can now be substituted for payment by rate is by fixing the price per thousand gallons at the figure which will bring in as nearly as possible the amount brought in by the water-rate originally fixed. But it has never been proved that when Parliament passed the Metropolis Valuation Act it intended to swell the receipts of the Water Companies. It is much more probable that this was an unforeseen and undesired consequence, and that, if the attention of Parliament had been called to the point, care would have been taken to guard against it. Parliament can hardly be precluded from repealing the Metropolis Valuation Act, and introducing in its stead a kind of Perpetual Settlement. If it did so the claim of the Water Companies to a constantly increasing income from the increasing value of houses would disappear, and if this disappearance can be effected by the repeal of an Act, why should it not equally be effected by an amending of it? Whether payment by meter is a better or worse system than payment by rate, and whether the amounts at present suggested will be found sufficient when the Bill put forward by the Corporation is in Committee, are points upon which it is not now necessary to express or even to hold an opinion. It is not on these grounds that the Bill is opposed by the Water Companies. Their contention is that to deprive them of the income hereafter to accrue from the successive revaluations which house property in London will undergo is an act of robbery, and as yet there is nothing to show that this contention can possibly be maintained.

The payment of back dividends out of current profits, which is another of the rights to which the Bill proposes to set a limit, must be justified by the provisions of the special Acts by which each Company is governed. But in estimating the extent of the claim it ought not to be forgotten that the Companies do not come into court with clean hands. Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT laid great stress on this fact the other day, and it does not appear that Mr. COOPE was prepared with any reply. The decision of the House of Lords in the DOBBS case makes it clear that the dividends of the Water Companies in past years have been swelled by payments which they had no right to exact. They have rated a large number of houses on their gross value when they ought to have rated them on their net value, and the difference between the two measures has had an appreciable influence on the dividends paid to the proprietors. If the Companies mean to stand by the letter of their rights in the matter of back payments they must not be surprised if Parliament shows equal determination in the matter of back repayments. If the Companies can appeal to statute law, their customers can point to a judgment of the highest court of the realm—a judgment which, oddly enough, Mr. COOPE seems to take credit to his clients for not disobeying. Nor is the method by which some of the Companies have kept down their rate of dividend in order to appear less rich than they really are a particularly straightforward one. Ordinarily speaking, if a prosperous Company chooses to give its shareholders new shares at par nobody has any right to complain. It may be an extravagant way in which to pay additional dividend, but that is the look-out of the shareholders. They are distributing their own money, and they can distribute it how they please. It is different when a Company is administering a quasi-public trust, and when its profits are consequently a matter of public concern. In this case it is impossible to be too open and straightforward, and it argues some want of these qualities when a Company alleges a low rate of dividend as a proof of poverty, and treats the issue of new shares at par as something too remote from the controversy to be worth mentioning. The mistake into which the Companies seem inclined to fall is one which may in the end do them more injury than we should at all like to see inflicted on them. The air of injured innocence with which they come before the public is only calculated to provoke resentment. They have a case which up to a certain point is a perfectly just one, and their wisest course will be not to go a step beyond it. No title, it is true, can be better than a title by Act of Parliament; but as time goes on it is likely to be more and more difficult to convince the electorate that what Parliament was free to do it is not always free to undo. The holder of a perpetual pension has an excellent right to his property, but he will be wise to commute it if he has the opportunity, and not to be too solicitous about the terms. If the Water Companies wish to keep all that they have a clear claim to, their best course is not to stand out for everything that the most favourable reading of their pretensions might possibly assign them.

THE FRENCH MINISTRY.

IT is the happy fate of M. FERRY's Ministry to prove how easy it is to govern the French Republic after a fashion. To judge from the history of his administration the times have gone by when a strong administration, working by means of a sham Legislative Chamber, was the only alternative in France to a rapid succession of feeble Ministries. The Legislative Chamber is a very real part of the Government. It has its own way, whenever it knows, or thinks it knows, its mind. The majority of the deputies, made up out of continually varying combinations among the numerous parties, can reject the proposals of the Cabinet, and carry amendments against it. They can and do contradict themselves continually. After voting that the Government is in no way bound to find work and wages for the labouring classes, they still feel at liberty to name a Committee to reopen the whole question. When the Cabinet bring in a Bill to strengthen the hands of the authorities against the evil disposed persons who make seditious manifestations, the Chamber accepts the measure, and then amends it till it becomes no longer recognizable. But all this, and more of the same sort of thing, seems to produce no effect on the Ministry. Little more than a year ago Cabinets came and went every few weeks. The most short lived among them lost at least one of its members in the course of its brief existence. M. FERRY has seen his way to change all that. He brings forward a plan for confiscating a large part of the land of the Algerian Arabs, and sees it rejected with the greatest philosophy. The financial policy of his Cabinet is disapproved, and he is indifferent. A part of his majority leaves him in the lurch, and shows that it may do so again at any moment, but M. FERRY stays quietly where he is. It is sufficiently surprising that a politician who might be supposed to have a very strong position should be content to hold office on such terms, but nobody in France seems to think it at all wonderful. Bonapartists and Royalists sneer at M. FERRY, but they do as much for every Republican Minister. The Republicans of Radical parties are very much of the same mind as the reactionaries. Their Republic is to be something very unlike the actual Government. Another Revolution must be gone through before it is attained, and compared with that a change of Ministry is a very small affair. Meanwhile the majority of the Chamber is on the whole inclined to believe that it has got just the Cabinet it needs. M. FERRY will do nothing very dangerous, and obeys orders. His Ministry goes quietly along yielding to every pressure, and with that they are perfectly satisfied. He certainly cannot complain that the country makes the task of government too difficult; for it has agreed to forget that there are still two awkward little wars to bring to an end. If the colonial policy of France is to be judged by the tests applied in any other country, it is at present, and not for the first time, a masterpiece of frivolity. Madagascar is as if it never had been as far as France is concerned. It is never heard of except through the correspondents of English papers. In Tonquin the capture of Sontay has been the end of everything. Admiral COURBET's force is keeping quiet in its quarters, while France is waiting to see whether something may not turn up for its advantage in Egypt after all. Until that is settled the country is obviously disposed to let the magnificent scheme of a colonial empire in the Far East go to keep company with last year's snows.

The most recent example of the Chamber's practice of playing with its Cabinet has been the treatment of the Bill for preventing seditious demonstrations in the streets. It is perhaps entitled to say that the Ministry has invited the treatment it has received. The Bill is one of the various consequences of Prince JEROME NAPOLEON's little escapade at the beginning of last year. The Republicans were then so terribly frightened at being attacked with a cloud of handbills that they felt something must be done to make anything of the kind impossible in future. The Courts having decided that pasting a political placard on a wall was not an act of sedition, the Chambers resolved that it must be made one. It was not enough to imprison the Bonapartist Pretender and send the Orleanist Princes on their travels. Accordingly a Bill was prepared by which it was made a police offence to put up a handbill exciting to sedition. It was not easy to legislate on this subject at all. The French code already provides for the severe punishment of all who make demonstrations against the established Government, so that fresh legislation was to a large extent unnecessary, and even dangerous in so far as it was likely to confuse the existing law. The necessity of allowing full liberty to candidates for election had induced the Chambers of 1881 to give everybody the right of placarding his opinions if he pleased. That, however, did not mean that a Pretender, and possible chief of a revolution, was to be entitled to cover Paris with bills which might prove an incitement to disturbance. The task before the Ministry was to frame a measure which would make it possible to punish the purely seditious bill-sticker without interfering with the liberty of candidates. In a country troubled with parties in a state of permanent hostility to the form of government it was manifestly not easy to draw the line in an intelligible way. It would tax the ingenuity of subtler men than M. WALDECK-ROUSSEAU, or even M. FERRY, to make a law by which judges and magistrates could decide at once whether the manifesto which would be innocent during an election was an offence against order six months later. The wisest course would have been to leave the difficulty alone, and rely on the ample powers of the French code to punish sedition. Offences such as Prince NAPOLEON's are really political, whatever they may be technically; and a Government is always entitled to punish a Pretender who tries to create disturbance if it thinks him sufficiently dangerous to deserve the honour. The Chambers, however, were not disposed to leave the matter alone, and the Ministry has accordingly brought in its Bill. M. WALDECK-ROUSSEAU, who, as Minister of the Interior, had charge of the Bill, felt the difficulty of excusing its interference with the liberty of candidates so acutely, that he had recourse to a species of quibbling, excellently adapted to persuade the Chamber that the Ministry was not in earnest. The Bill, according to this ingenious gentleman, was not an interference with liberty, but, on the contrary, a safeguard. It secured to every citizen the cherished liberty of not seeing the Government, which he of course loves and respects, abused on the walls in the course of his daily walks. If under this law a placard can be pulled down, that is not because it is a placard, but because it may cause a crowd of idle people to collect and block the road. By these and similar arguments equally worthy of the ingenious thinkers attacked in the Letters to a Provincial M. WALDECK-ROUSSEAU persuaded the Chamber to accept the Bill.

The Deputies were by no means loth to accept a measure which might prove such an excellent rod in pickle for the backs of Bonapartists or Royalists, but they proceeded to deal with it in their own way. They amended the clause making it a police offence to put up a seditious placard, and propose to hand cases of this kind over to the cours d'assises. The effect of this amendment will, of course, be to make the summary punishment of politicians who incite to sedition impossible, and give them a welcome chance of a great political trial. Under pretence of elucidating the law as to what is a seditious manifestation, the Deputies have provided for the confusion of the judges. They have made it an offence of one kind to cry "Vive le roi!" in the streets, and another to print the same words on a placard. As the Deputies have left the Bill, the over-zealous Bonapartist who tears a flag or breaks a shield can only be sent to six months' imprisonment; while if he smashes a lamp he may be condemned to two years under the provisions of the existing code. The discretion of the prefects, which has always been liable to abuse, will be wider than ever, and the Republicans in their zeal for the freedom of the streets will have done not a little to strengthen an old and recognized evil. The Bill has still to be finally voted on and to be sent to the Senate. The Upper Chamber, which is gaining authority from the inconsequence and confusion of the Lower, may reduce it to some sort of coherence, and it is on that hope that M. FERRY probably relies to give him an excuse for allowing his work to be hacked to pieces with so much apparent placidity.

THE COMPANY OF AUTHORS.

WE recently referred to the probability that before long men of letters would enrol themselves in something like a Trade Union. Early in the present week that probability became a certainty. A small, but remarkably representative, meeting was assembled in the Adelphi on Monday, and the Society was regularly constituted. Its scope is wide. While Mr. BESANT and Mr. BLACKMORE represented fiction at the meeting, Mr. HENRY WHITE represented the English Church, and Cardinal MANNING Romanism; and various branches of literature, the drama, and fine art sent their delegates, the law being perhaps most conspicuous in the person of several eminent members of the Bar, including the chairman, Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK. In the speeches of the only two members of the provisional Committee who took part in the proceedings, the publisher was conspicuously absent; but Cardinal MANNING vigorously denounced the wickedness of the trade in America, and Mr. HERMAN MERIVALE followed with some very curious anecdotes concerning, amongst other points, the present state of dramatic copyright.

It is not, however, by speeches at an afternoon meeting that the views and objects of the new Society can be furthered. The unanimity of Monday made the proceedings almost monotonous. If the Company of Authors wishes for public support, it must issue its prospectus in the form of a pamphlet, and if those most interested on the other side have any reply to make, they need have no difficulty in putting it forward. The public good, which after all should be, and probably is, the chief object of the Company, will be best furthered by an open statement. Two subjects, from among the half-dozen mentioned in the prospectus, tower above the rest as of the highest importance. Some measure of international copyright must be sought for; and, to use the words of the prospectus, "the maintenance of friendly "relations between author and publisher" must be the object of the strongest efforts. It is impossible to believe either that the interests of the publisher and the author are divergent, or that a cordial intent between them might not be kept up; in fact, it is not difficult to see that the recent complaints were fomented by persons who had no true love for either party. If the Company of Authors can make its weight felt in this part of its proposed task, it will be by composing differences of little moment, and by furnishing skilled arbitrators in more difficult cases, but certainly not by attempting to widen the present gulf, or by employing the foolish tactics of a Trade-Union in other kinds of industrial employment; for most political and social economists are ready to lay it down as an invariable rule that no strike has ever prospered. Not less important is the question of international copyright. It touches the successful author as the question of the publisher touches the beginner. But when we ourselves recognize, and can get other nations to recognize, that a foreigner's copyright is his property as much as his watch or his portmanteau, one of the chief tasks undertaken by the Company will have been accomplished—a task which will entitle them to the gratitude of publishers as well as of authors, and one which will go far to help in the maintenance of the friendly relations aforesaid. On the whole, if the associated Authors go forward in their difficult course without increasing the evils they deplore, they will have not only the approbation, but the thanks of every honest man, be he author, publisher, or reader.

THE RECREATIONS OF A CORPS BURSCH.

A YOUNG man who possesses any marked ability for the line of life he has chosen has generally attained to considerable proficiency before he develops into a Bursch. He has mastered the punctilio of the duel and of beer drinking, two matters of high and elaborate ceremony, and would be able to deliver a challenge with propriety and to "divide sun and wind" both fairly and accurately at a beer tournament, though he is never permitted to do so. Besides this, he has learned to observe a certain method in his madness, to be courteous to his friends even in his drink, and never to be atrociously rude to any one who does not belong to a Burschenschaft. His life is therefore one of leisure. He must still attend the fencing-school regularly, of course; and, besides the amusements open to all the young, he may drop into a lecture-room if he feels inclined, and hear what the professor happens to be talking about. Still his time would hang heavily on his hands if it were not for his peculiar recreations.

Time, who is a friend to few of us, has dealt unkindly by the Corps Bursch; and the progress of civilization, instead of increasing his happiness, has robbed him of some of his favourite diversions. Before 1848 he had a larger scope, and he then thought that to drill an obnoxious Philistine was an agreeable way of spending the small hours of the morning. The whole corps would assemble before the house of the man from whom one of its members had received a real or a fancied slight, and treat him first of all to a "cats' concert"—that is, to the most discordant uproar their ingenuity was capable of inventing, and instruments carefully put out of tune beforehand of producing. This was continued long enough to allow the victim time to make a hurried toilette; then came the cry "Light, light," when he had to place a lamp or candle in the window, and afterwards "Light away," when it had to be immediately removed. These cries alternated at varying rates of speed until the young tormentors grew weary of the game, and if they were not obeyed the windows suffered for it. These things were of course only possible in the smaller University towns, where indeed the Corps Burschen chiefly loved to congregate, and which at a still earlier time the Landsmannschaften ruled with a rod of iron. In those days, when the municipal authorities offended the students, they would retire into the adjacent villages, and thus starve the townsmen into submission. Of course nothing of the kind could now be done, but some remnants of the ancient discipline still remain. If a tradesman has behaved improperly to a student, the seniors of the various corps meet, and, after examining into the matter, they issue an order forbidding any member of their societies to deal with the offender. This resolution is communicated to the heads of the Burschenschaften, who, if the complaint be serious, will probably adopt it, in which case it will be obeyed also by most of the students who do not belong to any society. If any one contravenes such an order he is put into a kind of Coventry—that is, none of his comrades are allowed either to drink or fight with him. At least it is not long since this system used to be employed with considerable effect. These, however, are rather the serious occupations than the amusements of the Corps Bursch.

The latter are manifold, but they differ greatly in different Universities. The Beer State had, we believe, its origin in Jena, at least it culminated there and exercised a greater influence over the whole social life of the students than in any other University with which we are acquainted. The smallness of the town, the beauty of its environs, and the character of the peasantry, all contributed to its rise and glory, which may perhaps already have passed into a decline and fall. Each student society has rooms in some neighbouring village, where it establishes a mimic court, which during term time is regularly held once a week. The character of the ruler and his officials is well expressed in the popular song from which we take the following lines:—

> Ganz Europa wundert sich nicht wenig,
> Welch' ein neues Reich entstanden ist.
> Wer am meisten trunken kann ist König,
> Bischof wer die meisten Mädchen küsst.

In fact, it is the court of the old Lord of Misrule. Whoever is introduced to it must go through various periods of probation, each of which, in the case of a refractory Fox, may last for weeks, or even months; whereas a welcome guest may in a single evening pass from the condition of a base outsider to that of a miserable squire, an honourable knight, and even higher honours. Everything is decided by the sovereign, his minister, and the bishop, who withdraw to consult on all important questions, and return in their robes of state to announce their decision. The corps students, who, though they publicly profess to take no interest in politics, are almost without an exception Conservative, never assume a title equal to that which the ruler of the state in which their University is situated bears, and so in the neighbourhood of Jena the king of the Beer State contents himself with the appellation of duke, and with a dozen minor titles which need not be reproduced. An account of one of the ceremonies will afford a pretty good general idea of all. When the honour of knighthood is conferred, the squire is summoned before the duke, who sits at the upper end of the table supported by his knights, and surrounded by the dignitaries of state in their official robes. Every one below the rank of a knight is ordered to retire from the room, and his grace then proceeds to catechize the aspirant as to difficult questions connected with the theory and practice of the beer law. His object is to extract from him some answer which may be construed into an expression of want of absolute devotion to the ducal court. If he succeeds in this the duke frowns, the bishop lifts his hands in abhorrence of the heresy, the dignitaries shake their heads, the knights turn up the whites of their eyes, and the unfortunate squire is not only commanded to return to his old place, but he is declared to be in beer Coventry, from which he can only extricate himself by imbibing a specified quantity of liquor within a given time. Nor is this the only danger the catechumen has to dread. The knights, too, are jealous of their privileges, and if he makes an admission which seems to infringe upon these, he will be greeted by a dozen challenges to beer tournaments as soon as he takes his seat among them. When he has passed his State examination successfully he is handed over to the spiritual powers. The bishop takes his seat upon a barrel which has been placed on a convenient table, while the duke and the officers of his court stand around. The worthy ecclesiastic now in his turn questions the squire with respect to his private life and character, more especially his love affairs. It is of course an understood thing that no one is expected to tell the truth either to the duke or the bishop, and the fun of this part of the ceremony consists in the allusions to real circumstances made by the latter, and the skill with which they are parried. When the episcopal court is satisfied, the bishop speaks a few words of kindly admonition. He probably advises the aspirant to cultivate a greater catholicity of taste, to love the blonde without scorning the brown, and never to allow his attention to be so entirely absorbed by the beauty of the mistress as to be entirely unmindful of the charms of the maid. The squire is told to kneel, and asked what title he wishes to assume; he generally chooses one that contains a humorous reference to the lassitude that follows upon vinous exhilaration, and in a minute more, instead of a little water being sprinkled gently upon his head, a quantity of beer is poured over it. Thus dripping, he is made to crouch on all fours before the duke, who dubs him with an old sword.

Among the most important officials of the Beer State is the court poet, although he does not hold cabinet rank. He is the editor of the official beer gazette, and bound to keep secrecy as to the names of the contributors. The gazette, which is read publicly once a month, contains not only the proclamations of the duke and the pastoral letters of the bishop, but a number of parodies on ancient and modern authors; a large amount of news, either imaginary or real, as to the doings of the various members of the corps, and comments on the events of the period it covers. It is purely satirical; and, as it is understood that no one has a right to take offence at anything it contains, the seniors often use it to check the extravagances and bad manners of the younger members.

We have dwelt so long upon an institution which has after all only a local importance because it affords an insight into the whole life of the corps. Every one can see from the above that it may rise to an encounter of wits, or sink into brutal and drunken ruffianism. Sometimes a single term decides the character of a corps. A few of the older members leave, and about as many join it who come from associated societies in other Universities. They are distinguished drinkers and swordsmen, and they give the tone to the association they join. Where during the last term a parody on Homer, a happy quotation from Shakespeare, or an allusion to Goethe would exempt the originator from a beer penalty, such things are now voted Philistine, and every subject, except drinking, fencing, and other still less edifying matters, is decried as "shop." But such a condition of things is the exception rather than the rule, and a late debate in the Prussian Parliament showed how much may be said in favour of the Corps. Herr von Zitzewitz, for instance, pointed out that no less than five of the present Ministers had belonged to such a society in their youth, and that in the ranks of the Centre several clergymen were seated who were once renowned for their mastery of every accomplishment in which the heart of the Bursch takes delight. We should certainly imagine that the active members of a students' society are tolerably free from the sin of cramming, a practice that seems lately to have found its way into the Universities of Germany, and which the speakers of all parties agreed in denouncing; but in what way either his recreations or his more serious exercises can tend to promote the "earnestness and thoroughness" which were said to distinguish the Corps Bursch in his after life we are at a loss to understand.

Every Verbindung has its own special anniversaries which it celebrates with as much splendour as its means will permit. On such occasions numbers of the old members who have now become grave and in some cases even venerable citizens revisit the scenes of their former riot, and deputations from similar societies in other Universities attend to take part in the festivities, the chief of which is of course a grand commers. On one of the high days it is usual for the corps to parade the streets on horseback or in open carriages. Such processions are occasionally magnificent, and when fancy dresses and masks are worn by the active members, they are not unfrequently amusing, though most Englishmen are apt to think them a rather childish diversion. There is one procession, however, which never fails to make a strong impression on a stranger. When a student dies at the University during term time, all the rest request permission to pay him the last honours. First come the societies with their bands playing sacred music; the students who do not belong to any of them follow. The funeral takes place at night, the seniors march with drawn swords, and all the rest with torches which throw a strange, vivid, but uncertain light on young faces that wear an unwonted seriousness. Thus they pass through the principal streets of the town to the churchyard where the body has before been brought, and the clergyman is waiting. They form a large circle round the open grave, and stand silently while the service is performed, and a few fitting words are spoken, after which they return as they came, but only to the churchyard gate. As soon as that is passed, they once more arrange themselves into a circle, the torches are cast in a great pile in the centre, and when the flame leaps through the reddening smoke, the bands suddenly strike up a new tune, and hundreds of voices join in the old song:—

Gaudeamus igitur,
Juvenes dum sumus,
Post jucundam juventutem,
Post molestam senectutem,
Nos habebit humus.

OMNE MEMBRUM LIBERALE EST ANIMAL RATIONALE.

THE rather canine Latinity of the title of this article and the scholastic form of its conclusion need not frighten anybody. It is only a brief, but careful, analysis of every non-official speech delivered on the Government side during the late Egyptian debate, and will be found profitable for many things. The matter is derived strictly from the Times' report. The form is, wherever it is possible, and indeed generally, the words of the speakers themselves. The intention to vote is not always textually expressed in the speeches, but has been supplied from the division list; and, where the course of a member's exercise of his reason is too little apparent from his own words, it has been indicated according to the principles of logic and probability, usually in brackets. It has been a great temptation to include the utterances of members of Her Majesty's Government; but, as their speeches usually went to illustrate a different proposition, this seemed disorderly. No other speaker on the Government side has been omitted. It is to be remembered that the question for discussion was whether recent disasters in Egypt, including, when the debate actually began, the fall of Sinkat and the massacre of its garrison, were due in great part to the vacillation and inconsistency of Her Majesty's Government. Neither the original policy of occupation, nor that of future withdrawal, nor that of immediate and renewed military action, properly came within the limits of it, still less events preceding the occupation. The speeches of Her Majesty's Government, however, were almost entirely occupied with these things, and so were some of those of their supporters. These have been indicated briefly, but none has been left out.

Sir George Campbell had long warned the Government of the danger in which they were involving themselves. They had undoubtedly got into a deplorable hole. Half measures were utterly useless with Orientals. He doubted whether the Government reforms were welcome or suited to the Egyptians. Therefore he should vote for the Government.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson thought the Government had behaved to Egypt in a most unjust and high-handed manner. The English Government was responsible for the massacres in the Soudan. If what they had done had been done by their opponents, these opponents would have had to go out of office in a fortnight. The Government was in a horrid mess. Therefore he should move that the House declines to express an opinion on the policy of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Labouchere thought the Government had made mistakes. Liberals ought not to attempt to carry out an anti-Liberal policy. The Government had not acted in accordance with their own principles in Egypt. Therefore he should first vote that the House expresses no opinion on the conduct of the Government; and, secondly, that there had been no inconsistency in that conduct.

Mr. Villiers Stuart said nothing in particular and nothing at all about the question. He thought withdrawal would bristle with mischievous consequences, so he would vote with the Government [which is pledged to withdrawal].

Mr. Cartwright was not altogether satisfied with the action taken by Her Majesty's Government; therefore he should vote with them.

Mr. Forster thought that after the battle of Tel-el-Kebir things were in such a position that there was no power in Egypt except Her Majesty's Government. Her Majesty's Government did not quite realize that nothing was less likely to succeed than the attempt of a Western nation to govern an Oriental country by advice to Oriental administrators. The Government could not for a moment suppose that they could divest themselves of responsibility for the Soudan. Why did they not stop the attempts to reconquer it? The business of Sinkat was sad and humiliating. The Government could have relieved Sinkat. Therefore he would give the Government his hearty support.

Mr. John Morley thought the Government had weakened the authority of the Khedive by abandoning the Soudan. He disapproved their plan of turning Anglo-Indian administrators loose in Egypt. Her Majesty's Government were on the horns of a dilemma. The Prime Minister's analogies broke down. For all these reasons he was prepared to vote for the Government.

Dr. Lyons thought it absurd that a man like Cherif should be expected to act as a blind puppet at the dictation of those who occupied his country. Cherif was a man of great ability. Therefore he would vote for the Government [which turned Cherif out of office].

Mr. Macfarlane thought the Government might have been vacillating and inconsistent; but he intended to vote that they were not. The Government had not been alive to the actual position. Nothing would do them more harm than their continual proclamations of intention to withdraw from the country. Therefore he should vote for them.

Mr. Arthur Arnold regretted that the Government were not better informed, and that the expedition of Hicks Pasha was not prohibited. He could not see a trace of vacillation in the fact of the Government enunciating a wise and excellent policy last August and not enforcing it till January.

Sir John Lubbock did not say anything in particular about the question.

Mr. Waddy thought the Government entirely inconsistent in proposing to relieve Tokkar; therefore he should vote that there had been no inconsistency in the conduct of the Government. If this country gave advice, it must insist on having it followed; therefore he should vote for the Government [because they had not insisted on their advice as to Hicks Pasha being followed?] The Government had no right to tender advice to the Egyptian Government till they asked for it; therefore he should vote for the Government [because they turned Cherif Pasha out of office for not taking their advice?]

Mr. Slagg thought the Government had committed a great mistake in making a promise about the speedy evacuation of the country. The promise was absolutely incapable of fulfilment. He should vote for the Government which made it.

Mr. Bryce thought that the Government looked on the Soudan as beyond the range of English action [therefore they had taken action about the Soudan?] and he should vote that they were not inconsistent; they had nothing whatever to do with Sinkat or Tokkar; therefore he should vote for the Government which was going to relieve Tokkar. The reason for relieving Tokkar was a feeling of humanity; therefore he should vote for those who had not had the humanity to relieve Sinkat. We ought to interfere in Armenia. Therefore he should vote for a Government which had not interfered in the Soudan.

Mr. McCoan (apparently) thought nearly everything the Government had done was wrong. He should vote for the Government.

Mr. Goschen did not pretend to deny that the policy of the Government would have to be very different from that which it had been in the past. The Government had discarded hesitation [that is to say, they had hitherto hesitated]. It had been impossible to ascertain where responsibility really rested. They ought to have stopped Hicks Pasha. They ought to have supported General Baker more effectually. They ought not to have expected him to say that his attempt was hopeless. They were so irresolute and vacillating that at Souakim itself they took four different steps before assuming complete control. Therefore he should vote that they were not irresolute or vacillating at all, and that the events of the Soudan were in no way due to their action or inaction.

Now if, as is surely justifiable, the reasons and motives of the three hundred and eleven members of the majority may be gathered from the fifteen or twenty unofficial persons in that majority who thought it worth the trouble to give the House of Commons an account of the faith that was in them, it is possible to analyse with great nicety and clearness the connexion of premiss and conclusion of the mind of the average Liberal member in the present Parliament. He seems to have voted that the Government had not been guilty of vacillation and inconsistency, and that the recent lamentable events in the Soudan were not due to their policy—

(1) Because he thought they had been vacillating and inconsistent up to last week.

(2) Because he thought they had begun to be vacillating and inconsistent last week.

(3) Because he thought their policy had in the past been wrong.

(4) Because he thought their policy at the present moment was wrong.

(5) Because he hoped that they would not be wrong in the future.

(6) Because he did not like the persons who were the mouthpieces of the proposition for which he spoke and against which he voted.

(7) Because as in the case of Mr. Villiers Stuart, Dr. Lyons, and Sir John Lubbock, he declined to look at the proposition at all, and amused himself by speaking on and voting for a quite different proposition.

But he seems scrupulously to have abstained from voting either—

(1) Because he thought the proposition unproved.

(2) Because he thought the Government defence to which he rarely alluded sufficient.

(3) Because he was satisfied with the general Egyptian policy of the Government, and thought the Kashgil-Teb-Sinkat disasters exceptions. Or, lastly—

(4) Because he had any logical reason at all for doing what he did.

Therefore we may conclude with a syllogism in strict form.

Omne animal cujus actiones sola ratione diriguntur est animal rationale.

Omne membrum liberale est animal cujus actiones (ut supra demonstratum est) sola ratione diriguntur.

Ergo omne membrum liberale est animal rationale.

Q. E. D.

CARROW PRIORY AND THE BOOK OF PHILIP SPAROW.

THE name of Carrow Priory, in the suburbs of the City of Norwich, already familiar to the students of our early poetical literature as the scene of the domestic tragedy which called forth Skelton's Little Boke of Phyllyp Sparow, has of late become more widely known from the results of the excavations liberally carried on by Mr. Colman on its site. These have revealed the whole ground-plan of the eastern portion of the nunnery buildings, as well as the form, dimensions, and general style of the church. Sincere thanks are due both to Mr. Colman for the munificence which has rendered their disinterment possible, and to those by whom the work has been carried out, for the care and skill which have directed the operations. Skelton's "Dirge," if hardly deserving Coleridge's eulogium as "an exquisite and original poem," will repay perusal better than most of the compositions of the irreverent Rector of Diss, the Poet-Laureate of Henry VII.:—"Laurigerum Britonum Skeltonida vatem," as he designates himself at the close of this elegy; "literarum Britannicarum decus et lumen," as he is styled by no less a person than Erasmus. Skelton, when not scurrilous, is often dull. His attempts in serious poetry are stigmatized by Hallam as "utterly contemptible," and in his satirical compositions, especially the pasquinade on Cardinal Wolsey, Why come ye nat to Courte? while we recognize the native vigour with which in "torrent like volubility," he pours forth his doggerel rhymes, teeming with pungent words often the coinage of his own brain, we are constantly offended by the grossness of his language, and the irreverence which deforms his style. The Boke of Phyllyp Sparow, though contained in Southey's excellent collection of "Early British Poets," is perhaps now little known. The recent discoveries at the home of the bird and his fair mistress have revived its interest, and we are glad to call the attention of our readers to what Hallam not unjustly terms the "comic and imaginative" production of this "strange writer." The germ of this "little boke" is to be found in Catullus's exquisite "Lugtus in morte Passeris," and Ovid's lamentation over the death of his Corinna's parrot. Some portions are direct, and by no means unsuccessful, imitations of the Latin poets. The eighteen delicious lines of Catullus, however, are expanded into more than fifteen hundred, and the playful plaintiveness of the earlier poet is buried beneath a vast incongruous mass of multifarious learning, bristling with proper names, in which the whole nomenclature of classical mythology and ancient history is put under contribution. The subject of the poem is the untimely fate of the pet sparrow of Mistress Jane or Johanna Scrope, a sixteenth-century Lesbia, an inmate of the nunnery, probably as a boarder for the purpose of education—which had met with the usual fate of such caged darlings in the talons of the nunnery cat "Gyb":—

Passer delicias meæ puellæ
Quem plus illa oculis suis amabat—

Gyb, I say our cat
Worrowed her on that
Which I loved beste.
It cannot be expreste
My sorrowful hevyness
But al without redress.

"Gib," we may remark in passing, is an abbreviation for Gilbert, applied familiarly three centuries ago to male cats as "Tom" is now. We all remember Falstaff's "I am as melancholy as a gib cat or a lugged bear," while "Gibbe, our cat," is a personage of some consequence in Gammer Gurton's Needle. The lamentation continues:—

O cat of churlyshe kynde
The feend was in thy minde
Whan thou my byrd untwyned
I wolde thou haddest ben blynd.

No man can be sure
Alway to have pleasure,
As wel perceive ye may
How my disport and playe
From me was taken away
By Gyb our cat sauage,
That in a furious rage
Caught Philip by the head
And slue him there starke dead.

The lines that follow afford an example of the unblushing audacity (the frankness of which shows that Skelton, a true child of the Renaissance, was not conscious of any irreverence at all) with which the poet tags his rhymes with the most sacred names, and diversifies his elegy with sentences from the Vulgate version of the Psalms, and from the most devotional portions of the services of the Church:—

Kyrie eleyson,
Chri-ste eleyson,
Kyrie eleyson;
For Philip Sparowes soule
Set us our bead roule,
Let us now whisper
A Paternoster
Lauda, anima mea, Dominum.

With a like irreverence, Skelton, after devoting this cat in particular, and the whole race of cats in general, to condign punishment in a humorous excommunication—

That vengeaunce I aske and cry
By way of exclamacion,
On al the whole nacion

Of cattes wilde and tame
God send them sorrow and shame;
That cat specially
That slew so cruelly
My litle prety sparow
That I brought up at Carow—

in a manner that recalls Ovid's summons to the feathered tribes to join in the funeral lamentations over Corinna's parrot proceeds to call on the birds of the air to take part in the burial service for the repose of Philip Sparrow's soul:—

Robyn red breste
He shal be the precste
The requiem mass to syng,
Lofty warbeling
With helpe of the red (reed) sparow
And the chattering swallow
This hearse for to halow.

The "popinjay" is to be the gospeller, and the "mavis" the epistoller; the cuckoos are to fulfil the duty of chanters, while

The peewyt, the lapwing
The versicles shall synge.

The ostrich, the eater of horse-shoes, which strong fare so spoils his voice that he cannot "synge tunably," is to act as bellman, while

Chaunteclere our cocke
Must tell what is a clocke.

The phœnix is to provide the incense for the funeral, while the eagle is to act as dean, and the goshawk as precentor

Shall have a roule
The queristers to controule;

and

The hobby and the musket
The sensers and crosse shall set,
The kestrel in all this warke
Shal be the holy water clarke.

This is "excellent fooling" and as innocent as the "Who killed Cock Robin?" of our own nurseries. We cannot, however, pardon Skelton when he thus goes on to parody the solemn ritual of the Roman Catholic burial service:—

God send my sparows soule good rest,
Requiem eternam dona eis, Domine
A porta inferi:
Credo videre bona Domini:
I pray God Philip to heuen may flie,
Domine, exaudi orationem meam:
To heuen he shal, from heuen he came:
Oremus.
Deus, cui proprium est misereri et parcere,
On Philip's soule haue pity.

An equally audacious trifling with things sacred characterizes the latter part of the poem entitled "The Commendacions," in which the author descants on the personal beauty and gracious qualities of Mistress Jane. Here each of the portions into which this panegyric is divided is concluded with a stanza including a verse from the 119th Psalm shamelessly twisted into an address to the object of his admiration:—

She florisheth old and newe
In beauty and vertue,
Hac claritate gemina:
O gloriosa femina,
Memor esto verbi tui servo tuo:
Servus tuus sum ego.

If we could forget these scandalous impieties, The Boke of Phyllyp Sparow certainly contains many charming passages which cannot fail to be read with pleasure. There is a pretty picture of Mistress Jane throwing down in desperate sorrow the "sampler" on which she had begun "wyth stiches of silke" to embroider the "image and facion" of her lost favourite:—

Whan I was sowing his beke,
Me thought my Sparow dyd speake
And open his prety bill,
Saying, Mad ye are in wil
Again me for to kil;
Ye pricke me in the head
With that thy nedle ware red,
Me thought of Philyps blonde
Mine here right upstode,
And was in such a fraye
My speche was taken awaye;
I kest downe that there was,
And sayd alas, alas,
How commeth this to pas?
My fingers dead and cold
Could not my sampler hold
My nedle and my threde
I threw away for drede.

We seem to see the little bird before us when she thus describes his playful ways:—

Lord, how he wold pry
After the butter fly,
Lord, how he wold hop
After the grossop.
And whan I said Phyp, Phyp,
Than wold he leape and skyp
And take me by the lip.
Alas it wil me sloe
That Philip is gone me fro!

These lines are a very fair imitation, in a lower key, of those of Catullus:—

Nam mellitus erat, suamque norat
Ipsam tam bene quam puella matrem:
Nec sese a gremio illius movebat,
Sed circumsiliens, modo huc, modo illuc,
Ad solam dominam usque pipilabat.
At vobis male sit, malæ tenebræ
Orci, quæ omnia bella devoratis:
Tam bellum passerem mihi abstulistis.

We turn in conclusion from Skelton's elegy to the scene of the disaster which evoked it—the home of Mistress Jane Scrope and Master Philip—the Priory of Carrow, lying just outside the old south gate of the city of Norwich. The locality takes its name in its original form—Car How—from being a "how," or rising ground (Danish "hoi," a hill), above the "cars," or marshy meadows which skirt the river Wensum. Here a hospital or nunnery, dedicated to St. Mary and St. John the Baptist, had been founded in very early times. The foundation was augmented by Stephen, who bestowed on the sisters of the hospital the tilled land belonging to the royal demesne adjacent to Norwich, "with soc and sac, tol and team," and all other liberties, including the enviable right to a common gallows on the hill near their windmill at Bear Street Gate, expressing his royal desire that they should build their church on the land he had granted them. In pursuance of this desire two of the sisters, with the somewhat odd names of Seyna and Lescelina, fortified by the royal charter, began in 1146 to erect a new church and monastery for a prioress and nine nuns of the Benedictine order. King John, in the first year of his reign, A.D. 1199, granted the nuns a four days' fair at Carrow, with the same privileges which the monks of the Cathedral enjoyed at the time of their fair. As this grant included the toll of all goods passing through the city at fair-time, it is not surprising that disputes arose between the city authorities and the Prioress, which, after dragging on for a long time, were eventually compromised in 1289, when Amabel of Ufford resigned her claim to the toll of wheat at the fair-time, on the city engaging that their bailiffs should give the Prioress half a comb of the best wheat annually at the same date. Previously to this compromise, A.D. 1229, Henry III. had confirmed Stephen's charter, with all its privileges. Soon after this, on February 19, 1245, the nunnery church was the scene of the consecration of two bishops by Fulk Bassett, Bishop of London, in the absence of Archbishop Boniface, who had been consecrated by the Pope at Lyons only a month before—namely, Walter of Suffield, to the see of Norwich, and William of Burgh, to that of Llandaff. The Priory of Carrow seems to have enjoyed something of an aristocratic character among religious houses, and to have become a favourite resort of ladies of noble houses. This dignity, however flattering, proved inconvenient. The applications from the nobles of the day, who were far too powerful for the nuns to resist, to receive members of their families into their establishment had burdened the house with a larger staff of sisters than the revenues were equal to. In their difficulty the Pope, Gregory IX., "a good, pious, and public-spirited man," according to Dean Hook, was appealed to. He, A.D. 1274, issued from Perugia an inhibition to the Prioress to receive either nun or sister to the detriment of the monastery ("in gravamen monasterii"). At a subsequent period this popularity proved a source of considerable advantage to the Priory, the nunnery having become the chief place of education for the daughters of the leading families of the diocese and the adjacent parts, of whom Mistress Jane Scrope was probably one. These young ladies, we are told, boarded with and were educated by the nuns; and the dispersion of the religious society caused a very serious educational loss, the old seminary being destroyed and none established to take its place. "The abuse of religious societies," writes Blomefield pithily, "though so great that a Reformation was absolutely necessary, yet could never justify the Dissolution which took away the real use of them." Fuller, the Church historian, in his quaint style, remarks of such monastic seminaries:—"They were good she-schools, wherein the Girls and Maids of the neighbourhood were taught to read and write; and sometimes a little Latine was taught them therein. Yea, give me leave to say, if such Feminine Foundations had still continued, provided no vow were obtruded upon them, haply the weaker Sex might be heightened to a higher Perfection than hitherto hath been attained."

From the history of the Priory we turn now to its buildings. With the exception of the last erected portion, the Prioress's House, which was converted by Sir John Shelton, the grantee, into a residence for himself, and has continued with very little alteration to our own day, and of the cloister walls, preserved for the purposes of the garden which then as now began to occupy the cloister garth, the whole of the buildings, including the church, shared the common fate of our conventual establishments. Whatever could be turned into money was sold. The timber, iron, lead, glass, rapidly disappeared. The best of the stone work was torn down for building purposes, while the core of the walls was left to serve as a common stone quarry until they were so buried beneath their own ruins that they disappeared from view, and even from memory. Thus, until Mr. Colman commenced his excavations the ground-plan of the building had been entirely lost. In the last century Blomefield found "no apparent ruins," and could only with difficulty determine the site of the church. It is due to Mr. Colman's ably conducted investigations that we are now enabled to determine the plan and arrangements, and, to a great degree, the architectural character, of the church, and of the principal conventual buildings. The church was cruciform, with a central tower and chapels attached to the eastern side of the transepts. It was of but moderate dimensions, its length being about 200 ft. and the breadth of its central alley 23 ft., about the size of Sherborne and Winborne.

The Transition Norman of the choir and transepts corresponded to the date of the foundation, the middle of Stephen's reign. The nave and its aisles, added at a later period, were of pure Early English. The base of one of the piers of the crossing, and that of one of the south nave arcade, remain in good preservation, and it is evident from them, as well as from the other portions of cut stone which have survived the devastation, especially in the south transept, that it was a church of much architectural dignity. A group of vaulting shafts at the south-west corner of the easternmost bay proves that a stone groined roof was at least intended, if not executed. From the foundations of the walls enclosing the nuns' choir we see that, as was usual in churches of the date, it extended from under the central tower one bay into the nave. The western part of the nave, beyond the choir-screen, was a parish church dedicated to St. James the Apostle.

Leaving the church by a doorway at the south-west angle of the south transept, we find ourselves in the slype leading from the cloisters to the nuns' cemetery beyond. At the south-east corner we see the starting of the newel staircase leading up to the Dormitory. Proceeding still southwards we reach the area of the Chapter House, measuring 38 ft. 4 in. by 23 ft., to the east of which lay the cemetery where stone coffins have been discovered containing female bones. Beyond the Chapter House we enter the remains of the Calefactory or Day Room, a long apartment of eight bays, running north and south, measuring 95 ft. by 23 ft. It was divided down the centre by a row of seven cylindrical columns of Early English character, of one of which a considerable portion remains erect. The traces of the groining are still visible in the west wall. At the northern end of this apartment access was given to the garderobes or gongs, the drains of which are plainly to be seen. One at the south-west corner is almost perfect. This range of buildings formed the eastern side of the cloister area. Of the refectory and other buildings on the south side there are no visible remains.

The Prioress's House, erected by Isabella Wygun in the early part of the sixteenth century, stands on the west side of the cloister garth, occupying the place of the Cellarer's offices. It is a beautiful example of its date, characteristic of the time when the superiors of religious houses, forgetful of the vow of holy poverty, had become great ladies—like Chaucer's Prioress—"estatlich of manere" and "digne of reverence," retiring from association with their nuns to a stately mansion of their own. It is a long narrow building, consisting of a hall in the centre with a large timber-framed oriel; the kitchen and other offices to the south, and to the north the Prioress's parlour, with her bed-chamber above, reached by a projecting oaken turret staircase. The parlour is richly panelled in dark oak, and exhibits on the chimneypiece and elsewhere the rebus of Isabella Wygun, the letter Y and a gun of clumsy make. The house was built about 1514. Shelton died in 1529. The date of his poem is uncertain, but the chronology allows us to believe that Jane Scrope with her sparrow may have been seen within its wainscoted walls, as a petted favourite of the Prioress. The house has been admirably cared for, and, in common with the Priory, may be deemed singularly fortunate both in its owner and in its occupier.

THE DOG'S STORY.

THE Zemindar, we have previously shown, can do many things without the law, with the aid of the law, and in defiance of the law. But there are many other things which he cannot do, which nobody expects him to do, and which he himself never thinks of doing. He nowhere prescribes to any tenant, large or small, the proper course of cultivation. He imposes no sort of restriction or law as to rotation of crops, use of manure, consumption of produce on the holding, or any other of the conditions so familiar in English leases and counterparts. He has nothing whatever to do with the site, erection, or repairs of houses and huts. Now and then he may levy an extra cess on the fortunate tenant or sub-proprietor who builds what is termed a pucka house in the village—i.e., one of brick or stone. But this is merely one of his stretches of "privilege" as lord paramount. The ordinary house, composed of clay foundation, bamboo posts, neat wattles, and covering of reeds, grass, or thatch, is put up by the Ryot, is kept in repair by him, and is often removed bodily, if it cannot be sold, when the said Ryot changes his village, in a fit of despondency or superstition, or under the pressure of calamity, or in order to be near his friends or men of the same caste. The Zemindar is responsible for no fences; neither for the hedge round the orchard, nor the trench round the plot of sugar-cane, nor the slight earthen embankment that marks the division between one rice-plot and the other. Then the substantial tenant with a little capital and enterprise can cultivate the ordinary or the higher kinds of produce just as he pleases. He may keep on growing early and late rice ad infinitum, or fence a pan garden, or try his luck with sugar-cane, tobacco, jute, date-trees, groves of cocoa-nut, bamboos, plant one acre with potatoes, and cram another with mango, jack, and leechee trees till the plants kill each other from sheer want of space; and no Zemindar will contribute one rupee to this end. It is true that by the universal common law and custom of the country the latter may put a higher rate of rent on all the more valuable kinds of produce, and that the cultivator fences and manures, trenches and waters, with the full knowledge that he must pay five and six rupees per beegah for sugar-cane, whereas he would only pay two rupees if the same plot was sown in rice. Further, the substantial tenant, who may be known as jotedar or gantidar in Bengal, and as khoodkhast or kadimi, or monrusi tenant elsewhere, can sublet any portion of his land to a humbler kind of cultivator without asking the Zemindar's permission. A well-to-do tenant of this kind, possessing from ten acres to half a village, is quite strong enough to hold his own, in Bengal at least, with all but the most powerful and unscrupulous landlord. But the tenant's greatest reliance hitherto has always been on the legal process necessary to any enhancement of rent on any plea whatever. From the very earliest days of our administration no enhancement has ever taken place without resort to a legal tribunal. The "Judicial Rent," so startling in Ireland, has been familiar to everybody in Bengal since 1790. This and a dozen other arguments ought effectually to dispose of the idea of any terminable or periodical contract between the Ryot and the Zemindar. The status of the former was one of custom and not of contract, and some of the confusion and misunderstanding on this very vital point has arisen, as one of the members of the Rent Commission aptly pointed out, from a wrong translation of two very common Revenue terms, the potta and the kabulyat. These are often rendered as leases and counterparts. In reality they are nothing of the kind. The potta is a sort of title-deed given by the Zemindar to the Ryot, inducting him into his plot and recognizing his occupancy and existence. The kabulyat is the counterpart given in exchange by the Ryot to the paramount landlord. We have scrutinized scores and hundreds of these documents, and they nearly all run in the same sing-song strain. No term of years or period for the expiring of the lease or break is mentioned. There are certain dates on which the kists or instalments of rent must be paid. The Ryot binds himself not to cut trees. He is to claim no deductions for drought or inundation, for the death or absconding of his partners or his sub-tenants, if he creates any. The boundaries of his plot are usually defined and the area specified with more or less exactitude; and that is all. The plain truth is that from the time of Lord Cornwallis to that of Lord Lawrence, it was more the interest of the Zemindar to look out for Ryots than for Ryots to look out for land. Waste and jungle-land was in Eastern, Central, and Western Bengal especially, to be had in abundance for the asking. Evictions in the Irish or English sense for non-payment of rent were practically unknown. If a Ryot was stubborn or a bad character, if he consorted with Dacoits and other men of violence and gave offence to peaceful neighbours, if the Zemindar wished to show favour to some one else, or if Ahab became smitten with a desire for the paternal inheritance of Naboth—in each and all of these cases an eviction might take place. But the Ryot was turned out by intimidation or violence, and not under colour of legal claim. On the other hand the Zemindar often met with difficulties in the realization of his rents; especially when he was a new-comer or purchaser at public auction or by private sale. Whole villages leagued together and refused payment. The rent-roll and the Zemindary papers were imperfect, lost, or mislaid. The tenancies of particular Ryots could not be identified, and now and then villages were put down in the rent-roll which had been nearly swept away by one of the tributaries of the Ganges, or which had no more existence than so many acres in the sky. Again, a Ryot with a distinct existence and a defined tenancy refused improperly to pay his rent. After some discussion, about the beginning of this century a remedy was provided for this default. The Zemindar was allowed to attach the growing crops and chattels of the defaulter, with a reservation to the latter of his plough, his bullocks, and his seed for the next year; or the landlord might bring about what was called a summary suit for rent in the Revenue Courts. This sort of proceeding was not only in name but in reality fairly expeditious, and every Collector had covenanted assistants, or, after 1833, native deputies, who decided thousands of these claims in the year. In some parts of Bengal the Ryot preferred to be cast in one of these suits with costs, as it fixed his rent by legal sanction, gave him a formal quittance which was proof against denial, collusion, or trickery, and preserved him from any arbitrary and irregular rise. But evictions, as we understand this phrase, were till recently quite unknown in Bengal. When deeds specified no term of expiry, when half the alluvial soil of Central and Eastern Bengal was jungle or swamp, a preserve of deer and tigers or the haunt of coot and wild duck, when Zemindars wanted to derive benefit from an extension of cultivation in which the Ryot took a deal of the risk and the Government had renounced for itself all idea of profit, it may easily be conceived that there was no competition amongst tenants, and no desire to kick them out of their homesteads and gardens. As population increased the jungle was cut down, and the grass and bulrush gave way to the late and early rice. But no one called on his tenants to surrender their holdings on any specified date or to renew them by contract on different terms. There was all along a tacit understanding that no man could be called on to vacate or be evicted as long as he paid his rent and behaved with propriety. And when a Zemindar wanted a rise all round to meet the expenses of a lawsuit, a marriage, a new mansion, a new temple, or a new road, he was compelled to levy extra cesses or he might try what the Civil Court would do for him. Real leases of another kind were quite familiar to the Zemindar. When hard-up he would grant ten or twenty villages, or half a Pergunnah or Hundred, to Baboo Lakhi Narayan Sonar the great Calcutta merchant who had enriched himself by trade and speculation, or to Mr. Smith who wanted feudal influence to sow the lands of the factory of Nilabad with indigo. But then he wrote out an ijarah, and not a potta; and this was a case where, if custom led to the contract, the contract was voluntary on both sides, and was made on stamped paper and with seal and lasted for a specified term of years.

In this way the separate and the joint interests of Zemindar and Ryot came to be practically treated and fairly understood by themselves, by the Revenue and Magisterial authorities, and by the Civil Courts in gradation, from the Munsif to the old Sudder Dewanni Adaulat. The Zemindar could grant titles to holdings, and measure the land of any Ryot who was supposed to hold ten acres and to pay for only five; could enhance the rents of a whole Pergannah by selecting a good fat Ryot as a typical civil case; enjoyed certain undoubted privileges as Lord of the Manor—not, as Scott might have put it, in vert and venison—but in fishing, timber, pasturage, and grass; and had, besides the right of collecting all rents and of assigning tenancies or of cultivating by his own hired servants, that peculiar prestige and position which in every age and country is inseparably connected with the landed interest. The Ryot, on the other hand, had everything to do with the cultivation. No one interfered with him or harassed him with minute conditions as to crops and fallows and manure. He was most properly supposed to understand his own interest, the suitabilities of the soil to various crops, the lay of the land, the course of streamlets created and fed by rain-water, the proper line of natural or surface drainage, and the vicissitudes of the seasons.

> Quis color, et quæ sit rebus natura ferendis.

To him Bengal owes its date-gardens and its sugar-cane and a vast internal trade in molasses; the tobacco and the jute since the Crimean War; and the grains which feed some sixty millions of inhabitants, and are transported by roads and rivers to the capital of the Lower Provinces to an amount estimated yearly at ten millions sterling.

Yet it must not be imagined that everything went on peacefully under this division of the landed interests just sketched. If agriculture was not only the greatest, but almost the only great Bengal industry, it was also the cause of much disturbance, litigation, and crime. Very often the limit between the Zemindar's patrimony and the Ryot's inheritance was hard to define. Time was required to adjust our elaborate machinery of interference, control, and supervision by trained officers and regular tribunals, to the old order of things. Districts were huge, officers few, roads did not exist. There was a weak and corrupt native police, and a native judiciary wanting in knowledge, impartiality, and integrity. Our police and magisterial records in Bengal have been often continuous narratives of broken heads, burnt villages, and looted bazaars, all owing to the violence of a Zemindar who coerced and ill-treated his Ryots, or to the obstinacy of Ryots who would no more admit a process-server into their village than the peasants of Connemara would tolerate the gauger and the attorney. This part of the subject would require, not an article but a volume. Still it may be said that, in theory if not in practice the various duties and rights of both parties were fairly ascertained and defined, partly by law and partly by judicial precedent. And so things went on till just before the Mutiny of 1857, with which, however, neither Zemindar nor Ryot had anything to do. It was then, as some say, that the Legislature of Lord Canning invented the occupancy right; or, as we think, that it merely stereotyped and defined a custom common over all Bengal Proper. However this may be, one characteristic of the occupancy tenant or tenant-proprietor has hardly met with full consideration in the inquiries of individuals, judicial courts, or special bodies. Even the extremely able Report of Sir Ashley Eden's Commission does not fully dispose of the subject. But it is a fact, patent to all who have studied Bengal tenancies in camp and court, who are versed in village life or in files of judicial proceedings, that the jote or holding was a distinct and tangible asset, which could be mortgaged, sold by private bargain, or put up to auction by the sheriff of a court. Very often it might be difficult to ascertain exactly what was sold, and there was a perpetual dispute in some districts whether a Ryot could sell his holding without obtaining the consent of his Zemindar. But the most indisputable proof that these holdings had a positive market value is to be found in the fact that many Zemindars of Bengal were in the habit of bidding for these tenancies themselves. Sometimes they bought them up when held by a troublesome, defiant, or insolvent Ryot within their own Zemindary. Quite as often they got a footing on the estate of a rival or a neighbour by buying his Ryots' tenures. Now and then, too, a Ryot, despairing of coming to terms or holding his own with the Zemindar No. 1, to whom he attorned, parted with his tenancy to Zemindar No. 2. Owing to a vicious system, complained of by magistrates, fostered and encouraged by the Civil Courts, and never seriously grappled with by the Legislature, it was perfectly easy for the encroaching Zemindar to keep in the background and take up the tenure in the name of a dependent or man of straw. A footing once gained, the strong man, in his new character of Ryot or cuckoo in the small bird's nest, was hard to eject. We can call to mind several instances in which an unscrupulous and energetic Bengali began by acquiring two or three holdings in this way, and then by threat, moral compulsion, lawsuit, or other means, ended by acquiring the superior rights, and being seised, as the English lawyer would say, of the whole Taluk or Zemindary. Ownership of the soil in Bengal is most seen in him who sits and builds on the land. In spite of theorists, this practical possession has been proof against the neglect of the Legislature and the oppression of the Zemindar. And the latter would never have gone out of his way to acquire Ryots' holdings unless there were something to be gained. All this may be very shocking to English notions, and lawyers and landlords with us may be puzzled to conceive how the tenants of A, without reference to their master, can transfer their holdings to B, or how Sir John could ever demean himself to obtain a secret entry in the name of a dependent, on the tenancy of Farmer Giles, who really paid rents to Squire Hazeldean. But very odd customs prevail in Lower Bengal. Tenant-right has long been recognized by the Legislature, and preserved from avoidance when the parent estate was sold. By the old Sale Law of 1840, when a Zemindary was put up to sale for non-payment of the Government revenue, and when the auction purchaser came in with a clean Parliamentary title, certain tenures were declared good against the new-comer. Ancient holdings, lands taken for mines or other legitimate enterprise, and brick houses, were all reserved intact. In short, the upshot of ninety years is that the Ryot, though often the victim of oppression or bad advice or his own folly, liable to mediæval cesses and "benevolences" as well as to protracted litigation for rent, exposed to the measuring rod of the surveyor, the trickery of the agent, and the club of the lattial, had yet a possession of value which he could call his own, and which, if fairly energetic, he could sublet, mortgage, or sell. Rival Zemindars fought for him like warriors over the corpse of Patroclus. He had been distinctly supported by the Legislature of 1793, 1840, and 1859. He had managed to outlive dynastic changes, Mohammedan tyranny, Mahratta raids. How the Government of Lord Ripon proposes further to secure his status and to redeem its own pledges, and how far it is just or unjust to the Zemindar, may be told hereafter.

COPYRIGHT IN AMERICA.

FOR the first time in many years there seems to be a probability of a speedy solution of the copyright question in America. We may almost say that for the first time the question has been taken up in the right way and in the proper spirit. We are bound to add also that there is now a combination of favourable circumstances which has never existed before. The solution which now seems probable is due in great measure to a little knot of the younger American authors resident in or near New York who met together about a year ago and quietly organized the American Copyright League. The League elected a strong Executive Committee, who prepared to speak and act in its name. It sent out circulars and grew to a membership of about three hundred and fifty, all authors or writers for magazines and reviews or journalists, in short, all "producers of copyright matter," as they themselves expressed it in one of their circulars. Strong in these adhesions the League addressed a letter to the Secretary of State, Mr. F. T. Frelinghuysen, setting forth what may be called the author's side of the case as distinguished from the publisher's side or the side of the book-manufacturer. For years it was the American book-manufacturer who prevented the negotiation of an international copyright treaty between Great Britain and the United States. Of late it has been due, in part at least, to the greed of the British book-manufacturer that a few of the disputed questions have not been covered by some sort of a treaty. Obviously the question of copyright is an author's question rather than a publisher's; and in the letter which the Executive Committee of the American Copyright League sent to the Secretary of State the consequences of this distinction are plainly put. After announcing to the Secretary the vote of the League "to urge the Department of State to complete an International Treaty with Great Britain, securing to the authors of each country the full recognition of property rights in both countries," the letter concluded with the following declaration of principles and desires:—

> The authors composing the League, as producers of material to which they think attaches the right of universal recognition as property, object to those clauses in the treaty as proposed in what is known as the Clarendon Convention, and as modified in the Harper Proposal, which put limitations as to time of publication and impose conditions as to manufacture that belong to regulations of trade and tariff, and not to authorship. Nevertheless, they recognize the necessity of some immediate relief from the present situation, which inflicts serious injury upon, and promises still more to impair, literary production in this country, and are willing to accept what can be obtained as a relief, while waiting for the establishment of simple international justice in regard to this sort of property. They believe that any treaty which shall secure to English and American authors mutual privileges will be a desirable step, and they, therefore, urge upon the Government the necessity of securing the best possible treaty attainable in a balance of the various conflicting interests and claims concerned.

Mr. Frelinghuysen returned a prompt and unexpectedly satisfactory answer to the letter of the League. He declared that the pending negotiation had not been interrupted, but that the views of the authors and of the publishers as laid before him were diverse, as might well be expected where interests were diverse. And the Secretary of State then went on to make the most sensible suggestion yet heard in the discussion:—

> The difficulty in the way of negotiating a formal copyright treaty with any foreign country is that the copyright laws of the two countries are usually so different that a detailed reciprocal code cannot be agreed on. Such a codified treaty necessarily puts the foreign author on a different footing from the home author, more privileged in some things it may be, and less so in others. And this difficulty is enhanced when we quote the language of the Executive Committee's letter—such detailed stipulations "put limitations as to time of publication and impose conditions as to manufacture that belong to regulations of trade and tariff, and not to authorship." I am satisfied that a simpler solution of the question could be effected by some means which will give in each country to the foreign author the same right as a native author enjoys. The domestic copyright law does not attempt to legislate upon the relations between an author and his publisher, and it is not easy to see why an international compact should not legislate upon a point which in each country is left to the course of trade. I think the foreigner owning a copyright should have here the same privilege as our own citizens, provided our citizens have in the foreigner's country the same rights as the natives thereof; and thereupon I would leave to the mutual convenience of the holder of the copyright and the publisher the adjustment of their contract, and leave to the tariff the task of protecting the paper-makers, type-founders, printers, and other artisans who join in producing the book as a marketable article. This might be attained by a simple amendment to our present copyright law, admitting foreigners to the privilege of copyright when the privilege is made reciprocal by treaty of law.

By great good fortune it happened that there had already been introduced into Congress by Mr. William Dorsheimer, a representative from New York City, and formerly the Lieutenant-Governor of the State of New York, a Bill substantially identical with the suggestion of Mr. Frelinghuysen. Some of the sections of Mr. Dorsheimer's Bill were modified at the request of the League, and the Bill, as it was finally referred to the Judiciary Committee of the House, provides that any citizen of any foreign country may obtain copyright in the United States by complying with the conditions of the American copyright law as imposed on citizens of the United States. That is to say, it puts a foreigner exactly on the same footing as a citizen; he may take out a copyright for a term of twenty-eight years, and he or his heirs may thereafter obtain a renewal for another term of fourteen years, making forty-two years in all; he may have the exclusive right to translate his own works; and, if a novelist, he may have the exclusive right to dramatize and adapt to the stage his own story; for, in this particular at least, the laws of the United States are now more generous and more just than the laws of Great Britain. But these privileges are to be granted to the citizens of a foreign country only after that country "shall by its laws grant to citizens of the United States property and rights similar and equal to those hereby granted to citizens of foreign countries, and after the due proclamation of this fact by the President of the United States."

Many of the members of the Copyright League preferred that American copyright should be granted to all foreigners without distinction of nationality and without waiting for any reciprocity, as is the case in France to-day, where the protection of the copyright laws is granted to all authors soit nationaux, soit étrangers, who comply with certain conditions. This was the course recommended in England by the Copyright Commission of 1878. And a very able and eloquent plea in behalf of this liberal legislation was written by Mr. Charles Dudley Warner, and circulated by the American Copyright League. But the proposed legislation is certainly as liberal as any one could wish. The passage of the Dorsheimer Bill by the American Congress should be at once followed by the passage of a similar Bill by the British Parliament; thus an international copyright would be obtained at once without any of the delays and dangers of diplomatic negotiation. And that the Dorsheimer Bill will pass the American Congress seems highly probable. It is certain to be pushed by competent and persistent advocates, and it is not easy to see just now by whom it is likely to be opposed. The careful way in which it guards only the author's rights, leaving all questions of Protection and Free-trade to be settled by the tariff, will, it is to be hoped, stifle the fractious opposition of the bigoted Protectionists of Philadelphia, who have hitherto persistently fought against any project which seemed in any possible way likely to allow the British publisher any control of the American market.

As we have said before, there is just now a combination of circumstances in America favourable to the passage of the Dorsheimer Bill. The present condition of the American book-market is not exactly understood in England; even Mr. Scrutton, in his recent philosophical investigation of copyright, accepts as now existing a state of affairs which ceased to exist nearly eight years ago. Mr. Scrutton describes accurately enough the original unlimited competition, followed in time, and as the evils of a state of war were felt, by a social compact among the leading American publishers. By the "courtesy of the trade" a house first publishing any foreign work was secure in the sole possession of this work, and in the right to arrange for future works by the same author. As the chief American publishers—the Scribners, the Appletons, and the Holts—have always paid the foreign author, and as most publishers were ready to pay when they had undisputed control of the book, and as all of them desired priority of publication, and to this end offered large prices for the "advance sheets" of important English books, there came to be a sort of extra-legal International Copyright, by means of which the British author began to get an increasing reward for his labour. One thousand pounds was paid for the advance sheets of Livingstone's Last Journals, for instance; and Mr. Putnam, whose house has always been foremost in urging an adequate treaty, declares that the price steadily rose between 1871 and 1876. Then there appeared in this paradise a new serpent, who disregarded the "courtesy of the trade," and who began to multiply after his kind in the most alarming fashion. The "New Pirate," as he has been picturesquely termed, first appeared in Chicago, where he published the "Lakeside Library," a meanlooking, double-columned, quarto pamphlet edition of a British book, which he vended for fivepence—about a fifth of the price charged for the same book by the "Old Pirate," who was protected by the "courtesy of the trade," and who was wont to pay for "advance sheets," and to remit an "honorarium." The "New Pirate" in Chicago soon had rivals in New York, where was started a similar "Seaside Library," which now appears regularly three times a week, and already contains nearly two thousand works, mostly fiction, by the leading English, French, and German authors. To compete with the "Seaside" the Harpers started the "Franklin Square Library," and dozens of other series were born and died an early death. In time, the result of the "New Pirate's" work was to force all the established American publishers to give up almost wholly the publishing of English fiction or of such lighter English books of travel, or adventure, or biography as the "New Pirate" might probably capture with profit to himself. In short, American publishers were compelled to rely almost altogether on American authors. And American authors of fiction and light literature were made to feel the effects of the competition very keenly. When an American novel (neatly bound and well printed, it is true) cost four shillings or six, and an English novel (in an evil pamphlet) cost fivepence or sevenpence-halfpenny, the general reader was only too often tempted to take the foreign book. So it happens that the American authors are all in favour of giving copyright protection to the foreigner. And the leading publishers, deprived of the "courtesy of the trade" and disgusted at the behaviour of the "New Pirate," are also in favour of anything that will put a stop to his depredations. And even the "New Pirate" himself is in a bad way. For in an evil hour one of the "New Pirates" tried the experiment of a neat 12mo series in place of the ungainly 4to of the "Seaside"; he met with immediate success. The public preferred the neat 12mo to the ungainly 4to, and the "New Pirate" began to turn out an unlimited supply of foreign fiction in neat 12mos at tenpence a copy. Now the neat 12mo is rapidly driving the ungainly 4to out of the market. But there is very little profit in the neat 12mo at tenpence, and there are not a few "New Pirates" fighting for this little profit. And besides the "New Pirate" must soon look forward to the exhaustion of his stock of books possible to reprint. He has nearly reprinted two thousand, and there are a very few hundreds more to be had; fiction he has well-nigh exhausted already; and there are limits to the amount of history and biography which his customers care to consume. Altogether the "New Pirate's" lot is not a happy one; and there are intimations that he too would not be altogether dissatisfied with copyright legislation which would rid him of future competition and leave him free to make his own bargain with the foreign author, to whom he could then afford to offer substantial remuneration.

PERIL AT THE HAYMARKET.

THE revival of Peril, the work of Mr. "S. Rowe" and Mr. B. C. Stephenson, shows a great lack of enterprise at the Haymarket Theatre. After the error of judgment shown in the acceptance of Mr. Pinero's Lords and Commons, the managers of this house might have been excusably shy for a time about seeking out new paths; but, if the production of an old piece were necessary, a better than Peril might surely have been found. The original, M. Sardou's Nos Intimes, is in many respects an admirable play. The wit is fresh, the satire keen, the characterization effective. An attempt to make a molehill appear as a mountain is made in the last act, where the audience is half beguiled into the idea that Caussade, the long-suffering husband and elderly hero, designs to execute vengeance on his wife's lover, Maurice, whereas in truth it is only a fox that preys on his poultry (the English adapters have introduced a hare that destroys flower-beds, and herein have done well) that he seeks to destroy; and thus the piece ends lamely in the French. But, with curious perversity, the whole point of Nos Intimes is dulled and blunted in the process of adaptation. At the Prince of Wales's Theatre, where Peril was first given in 1876, it seems to have been supposed that the only acceptable dramatis personæ were gentlemen and gentlewomen. By introducing these, splendid apartments and handsome decorations were to a great extent secured, and a deferential regard for upholstery was allowed to destroy M. Sardou's fine work. That Caussade should have submitted his comfort and independence to his selfish and ill-disposed associates, above whose heads he had risen, was not unnatural; but the class of person employed by M. Sardou would by no means suit the exigencies of the adapters, and by turning Caussade into Sir George Ormond, Bart., by making his guests into such persons as the successful lawyer, Crossley Beck, and the retired Indian civil servant, Sir Woodbine Grafton, the significance of the story is ruined. Peril is full of cumulative absurdities, of things that could not be. Sir George Ormond would surely never have invited such creatures as the Becks and Grafton to his house; had they been invited they would never have behaved in the preposterous way here shown; they would never have dared to hint to him their suspicions of Lady Ormond's liaison with Bradford; he, implicitly trusting his wife as he did, would never have entered into the plot of the pretended call to town and unexpected return. What Caussade might reasonably do could not be done by Sir George Ormond; what is not unnatural in France may be, and often is, ludicrously out of the question in England.

Peril is well acted, extraordinarily well if it be remembered against how much the players have to contend in being called upon to represent well-nigh impossible persons. Mrs. Bernard Beere (attired in the first act in a singularly awkward and ugly dress) performs the part of the heroine, Lady Ormond, with considerable strength when strength is most needed—that is to say, in the third act where her lover, Bradford, who has been smoking on the balcony outside the window of her room, enters and unexpectedly finds himself in her presence. The Bradford is Mr. H. B. Conway, who has rarely acted with more force than in this trying scene. The abandon on the part of actor and actress is strangely real. The ardour and energy of Bradford's pleading, the terror of the woman as she finds herself on the brink of, almost slipping over, the precipice, but struggles desperately to save herself, are startling in their intensity. The scene has been rehearsed with so much care that in the hands of these skilful players no sign of care is perceptible. Throughout the earlier acts Mrs. Bernard Beere gave somewhat too sombre a tone to Lady Ormond, and in the fourth act, where the performers are left to do the best they can to hide the poverty of the play, Lady Ormond does nothing in particular to help matters forward; but perhaps nothing is to be done. Mr. Bancroft, the only original member of the cast included in the revival, has surrendered the character of Ormond to Mr. Forbes-Robertson, and appears as Dr. Thornton, whose mission it is to set everything right. Thornton is decidedly an interesting personage. He reasons with Bradford in kindly style, and steps in to put a new complexion on affairs, when after Ormond's sudden return they look most difficult, with ease and adroitness. More could not be made of the part than is made by Mr. Bancroft. Mr. Forbes-Robertson makes much of Sir George Ormond, though his manner and bearing are rather too young for the neatly-trimmed grey whiskers and moustache. There is truth in the emotion with which he awakens to the meaning conveyed by his friends' insendoes. As it is inconceivable that Ormond would have laid the trap here devised, it is, perhaps, unnecessary to consider whether he would so plainly have shown that something was very wrong as he bade his wife good-bye before leaving on the pretence of catching the train for London. He, too, works hard with small results in the fourth act. Here is one more proof of the danger of keeping a secret from the audience. Spectators wonder why Ormond did not close his eyes, as he says, on the night of his departure and return, why he seems cold to his wife and constrained to his friend. He certainly appears to have an inkling, not quite of the truth, but of what might reasonably be feared; yet it is nothing but the marauding hare which he shoots and brings in—with stiff forelegs and rigid neck, quite unlike a hare just shot. The audience feel that a trick has been played upon them in all the pretence of disturbance and uneasiness, and on the first night of the revival there was a disposition to resent the feeble issue of what had been made to look a serious matter. Mr. Forbes-Robertson stretched all this scene to extremes that were not permissible. Mr. Brookfield, whose rise has most deservedly been very rapid, has contents himself with a diverting study of his predecessor in the part of Crossley Beck, Mr. H. Kemble. The imitation is very funny indeed to those who recollect the Prince of Wales's cast; but whether Mr. Brookfield, whose freshness of fancy is so remarkable, does well in treating the part thus is open to argument. Mr. Bishop's Grafton is—putting aside the fact that such a man would not be tolerated out of his own house—clever and amusing. Three acts take place in what was lately known at the Haymarket as Caryl Court, and an odd expedition is then made to the Princess Fedora's French apartments; in other words, old scenery is utilized.

Mrs. Bancroft opens the evening's performance in Mr. Burnand's adaptation of Lolotte, called A Lesson. Her vivacious humour and keen sense of fun are admirably displayed in the part of Kate Reeve, the actress employed to coach a very dull amateur, Lady Duncan, for some theatricals; but the end of the little play, which was formerly made very effective after Kate Reeve had found that her husband was flirting with her pupil, is now completely spoilt by the alteration to a farcical ending. The actress now treats her husband much after the fashion of the wife in MM. Meilhac and Halévy's Madame attend Monsieur. Kate Reeve even slaps the hand extended in farewell by Lady Duncan. The tone of the little piece is greatly lowered. Mr. Brookfield, it should be observed, resumes the well-considered representation of Sir John Duncan, the stolid Scotchman.

THE FRENCH ENCYCLICAL.

LEO XIII. has just addressed an Encyclical to the French Bishops, which breathes on the whole the spirit of dignified calmness and moderation generally distinguishing the public utterances of the present pontificate. There are however some points which call for remark, and inter alia two historical references introduced into the earlier portion of it appear, to say the least, to be oddly chosen for their purpose. The wording, as in former utterances of Leo XIII., is clearer and less stilted and pedantic than has formerly been usual in official documents emanating from the Vatican. But if we may trust the translation of the Tablet—and it ought to be authentic—there is a very curious phrase near the beginning which recalls the startling exordium of the pastoral of a French bishop of the Second Empire some five-and-twenty years ago, "God, my beloved brethren, with the assistance of France, is writing a magnificent page in the history of the world." After referring to the conversion of Clovis, and the Catholic devotion which gained for France the proud title of "eldest daughter of the Church," the Encyclical proceeds, according to the extract given in the Times, "Your ancestors were visibly seconded by Providence in the defence of Christendom, the propagation of the Faith, and the conquest and protection of the Holy Places, so that their achievements could be summed up in the famous phrase, Gesta Dei per Francos." But in the Tablet version the sentence begins, "From that time often have your ancestors been the helpers of Providence itself in the performance of great and salutary works," &c. On the next passage, however, with the historical allusions there is no substantial diversity of reading; "Our predecessors accordingly awarded great praise to your country; witness the letters of Pope Innocent III. to the Archbishop of Rheims, and of Gregory IX. to St. Louis." And then follow short and highly laudatory extracts from both these letters which, for aught we know—for we have not the documents before us—may be accurate enough. But still, considering the circumstances under which the letters were written, and the relations existing at the time between France and the Holy See, the selection is certainly a remarkable one. The occasion of Innocent's correspondence with the Archbishop of Rheims was on this wise. Philip Augustus of France had divorced his wife Ingelburga, immediately after marrying her, in order to substitute Agnes of Meran, for whom he had conceived a violent passion, in her place. Almost the first act of Innocent after his accession—and we are far from saying that he was not justified in it—was to write to the Bishop of Paris, deploring and denouncing this heinous crime, and threatening stronger measures if the King remained contumacious. Two former kings of France had been excommunicated on similar grounds. But Innocent went further, and, as Philip did not yield, placed France under an interdict, which was a very serious matter in that age. Some of the French bishops, including the Archbishop of Rheims—who had been induced by Philip on an absurdly frivolous pretext to pronounce the divorce of Ingelburga, for which his Majesty afterwards called him a "fool"—delayed their obedience to the sentence. Hence the Papal correspondence with the Archbishop and his subsequent appearance at Rome to sue for absolution at the feet of the pontiff. It is quite true that the best side of Innocent's policy came out in this transaction, where he was engaged in defending the interests of Christian morality, but it is an odd illustration to pick out of the history of some thousand years of the cordial relations between the Papacy and "the eldest daughter of the Church." Moreover the interference of Innocent, however justifiable, was not in the end successful. To quote Milman's words, "Philip is forced to seem, yet only seem to submit. The miseries of his unhappy wife are but aggravated by the Papal protection. The death of Agnes of Meran, rather than Innocent's authority, heals the strife. The sons of the proscribed concubine succeed to the throne of France."

The second historical example cited in the Encyclical is a still more infelicitous one. No doubt St. Louis was the glory of France and of the mediæval Church, and in our own day the very mention of his name extorted "almost involuntary expressions of admiration" from so staunch a Protestant as the late Dr. Arnold. But that is precisely the reason why we should not have expected a Pope, of all persons, to be forward to recall his dealings with Gregory IX. The case is this. Gregory had excommunicated and deposed the German Emperor, Frederick II., and found his sentence repudiated as unjust by the public sentiment of Europe. He then bethought him of appealing to the aid of the devout and chivalrous Louis, and accordingly sent a special embassy to the French Court to announce that "after mature deliberation with our brethren the Cardinals we have deposed from the imperial throne the reigning Emperor Frederick, and have chosen Robert, brother of the King of France, in his place," and Louis was then exhorted at once to accept the dignity for his brother and help to seat him on the forfeit throne of Frederick. But the Pope had mistaken his man. Louis was indeed an ardent and devout Catholic, and a fearless soldier of the Cross, but he was also a man of the highest principle, with an inflexible sense of right, who never forgot that the claims of national justice must take precedence—if they seem to clash—of the most sacred ecclesiastical obligations. His reply was more than a refusal of the proffered bribe; it conveyed a stern and not undeserved rebuke; "Whence this pride and audacity of the Pope, presuming to disinherit and depose a King who has no superior or equal among Christians; a King neither convicted by others nor by his own confession of the crimes laid to his charge? Even if those crimes were proved, no power could depose him but a General Council. The judgment of his enemies is of no weight, and his deadliest enemy is the Pope." After speaking of what Frederick had done for Christendom in the crusades, the King adds; "So much religion we have not found in the Pope, who endeavoured to confound and wickedly supplant him in his absence while he was engaged in the cause of God." Louis also sent ambassadors to Frederick to tell him what had occurred, who were instructed to say "God forbid that we should wage war on any Christian without just cause. To be the brother of the King of France is sufficient honour for the noble Robert." When Gregory's successor, Innocent IV., came to France five years afterwards, he met with a very cool reception both from the King and the country at large. The Gesta Dei per Francos in the reign of Louis IX. were not in short altogether to the credit or honour of the Papacy. But when

Leo XIII., passing at a bound from the thirteenth century to the eighteenth, glances at "the venom of pernicious opinions which infected alike faith and morals," through the teaching of "the sophists and philosophers" who heralded the first French Revolution, and the complete rupture with the Church and Christianity which followed, and adds that this evil work "has been revived and prosecuted by the sectaries of the present time," he will probably find many both in France and out of it to agree with him. Nor is it unnatural that, after recalling his recent letters to the Irish, Italian, and Spanish Bishops, he should express a similar desire to exhort those of France to redouble their influence "in presence of schisms which notoriously threaten religion, but are equally dangerous to the State." He remarks that "the exclusion of God from the Constitution" is a monstrous thing, fraught with consequences perilous as well in their social and political as in their religious aspect, as has often been evinced in history, and notably in the history of France. The following passage about the Concordat of 1801, in which he expressly observes that his predecessor Pius VII. carried indulgence to the wishes of the First Consul to the utmost limit duty would permit, is significant, both in tone and substance, when we recollect how enormous a sacrifice of ancient privileges and endowments the Concordat ratified and enforced. It is rather a summary than a textual criticism, but a very accurate one:—

As to the Concordat, the Pope says that from it have been derived great advantages—advantages the more appreciable because religious interests were previously more compromised in France. The dignity of religion was again publicly honoured, and Christian institutions acquired fresh life. France gained precious advantages from it. Her Government saw that, wishing to place public peace on a solid foundation, after an era of agitation, the Catholic religion would be their most powerful coadjutor. The conclusion of the Concordat was, therefore, an act of high policy. Identical motives speak for the maintenance of peace, at present, between the Church and the State. At a time when general ardour urges mankind towards new things, when everybody is in unquiet expectation of an unknown future, it would be the highest imprudence to try to promote discord between the two powers, and place obstacles in the way of the action of the Church.

His Holiness therefore regards with anxiety the symptoms of such a temper in the fanatical attacks on Catholicism and the threatened projects for the separation of Church and State. He declares that he has himself done all in his power to avert the peril by directing his Nuncio, when necessary, to convey complaints to the proper quarter, by writing to the Archbishop of Paris on the suppression of the religious orders, and by his recent letter to the President of the French Republic. The bishops are commended for their endeavours to provide sound education for the young, and to teach them the close connexion between civil and religious duties. "Nobody therefore can accuse them of being impelled by secular considerations or by hostile feelings against the established Government."

On two practical points, both very characteristic of his general line, the Pope especially insists towards the close of the Encyclical. First, as to the family, the children of Christian parents must be carefully trained in their duties alike to God and man, and hence the evil of separating education from instruction—"a false and disastrous system leading to Atheism." The Church has for this reason "always condemned mixed and neutral schools." And then, after dwelling on the importance of learning in the clergy, and their deference to the authority of their bishop—an obligation by no means so unreservedly enforced under the late pontificate—the Encyclical proceeds to speak at some length of the duties and opportunities of "the laymen devoted to the Church," who form a large class in France, and deserve all commendation and encouragement. They are in a position to serve religion effectively both by speech and writing, but the success of their labours depends greatly on their united and harmonious action, or else the words of Scripture will be fulfilled, "regnum in seipsum divisum desolabitur." And for this great end they must be ready, if necessary, to make a sacrifice of their private opinions. This distinct recognition and encouragement of "the lay element" has been all along a marked feature of the policy of the present Pope, but we are not sure that it has ever before been so prominently put forward as in his last Encyclical. No doubt the late M. Veuillot was a great favourite at Rome under Pius IX., but the editor of the Univers was not a typical but a very eccentric, not to say singular, specimen of lay Churchmanship. And to sacrifice personal opinions, and practise "filial obedience towards the bishops," describes him only by contraries. To what extent any such genuine loyalty to the Church and her teaching as the Encyclical assumes prevails among educated laymen in France is a question on which it is very difficult for foreigners, especially Protestants, to arrive at any definite notion, but on which more reliable means of information are likely to be provided at the Vatican. That the Pope is well advised in availing himself to the utmost of such resources, if really existing, there can hardly be a shadow of doubt. That he manifests, and openly proclaims, a readiness, and indeed a strong desire to do so, is not the least of the many noticeable variations between "the age of Pius," as it used to be called, and the Leonine era which has succeeded it. But the social and religious condition of France under its present rulers, while it still ostentatiously poses as "the eldest daughter of the Church" in its foreign policy, and never misses an opportunity at home of striking a blow at the Church and all the Church holds dear, offers a problem that might well tax the ingenuity of even an abler pontiff than Leo XIII. Perhaps the safest approach to a prediction about the matter, if one were disposed to hazard any, would be that in France the unexpected is what generally comes true.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

ON the 16th of this month the second part of the season of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts began. The programme was, as usual, arranged with considerable skill, so as not only to introduce novelties or quasi-novelties, but also to contain sufficient well-known music to insure its being attractive to a music-loving audience. The first number of the programme was Weber's Overture to Oberon. The performance of this showed at once that the band had not suffered by the greater number of its members having been continuously employed for some months in performing pantomime music, and, curiously enough, had not suffered from the long absence of Mr. Manns at Glasgow. The performance of this overture was, on the whole, admirable, though it is unusual—in England, at all events—to take the first part so slowly as Mr. Manns took it on this occasion. The other item of general interest was Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8), admirably played throughout. M. de Munck made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace as a violoncellist. He first played the Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, No. 9, First Movement—Romberg. In this, it must be confessed, he did not make much effect. It is true he had to labour against a composition no doubt thoroughly well designed as a test of the technique of a performer on the violoncello, but almost wholly without true musical interest; and here he certainly disappointed his audience by a thin, weak, rasping tone, although he showed himself to be an executant of considerable ability. Later on in the concert, in a Nocturne of Chopin's and a Fileuse of Dunkler's, his tone, probably from increased confidence, appeared smoother and rounder. In the Nocturne he showed himself to be a worthy interpreter of Chopin, giving to the music the full measure of impassioned feeling, without ever passing the border line which divides the highly-strung sentiment of Chopin from hysterical sentimentalism; and in the Fileuse he displayed high qualities as a musical artist, combined with marvellous executive skill.

The vocalist on this occasion was Mme. Carlotta Patti, who in her first song astonished her audience by the freshness and beauty of tone which her voice still retains, and also showed high artistic musical feeling. Her second song, a Spanish song of strong national character, containing many of those glides or whines peculiar almost to Spanish national music, though it undoubtedly pleased the audience, showed many of those defects which unfortunately time is sure to bring into the work even of an artist of high skill which the quieter and more sedate music of her first song had not brought forward. The quasi-novelty in the programme was Mr. Mackenzie's ballad for orchestra, "La belle dame sans merci." We can only say, in discussing this work, that it fully bears out the opinions we have before expressed as to the composer's powers—that is to say, that he can only bring out his full powers when expressing strong and violent situations, and that he is at his worst when attempting lighter and more sentimental phases of thought. In our opinion, in his endeavour to give musical expression to Keats's ballad he has to some extent failed. In his endeavour to be solemn and weird he has but succeeded in being dull. Throughout the composition his themes appear to us to lack inspiration. In their working out he no doubt shows musical skill; but as artistic musical expression the working out goes for little. Throughout the performance of this ballad one image was constantly before our minds—that of a clever, intelligent dog endeavouring to pick up an ill-shaped stone. The dog turns the stone over and over again—always skilfully—trying to seize it; and picking it up after a time, he succeeds in lifting it from the ground, carries it for a few yards, and it slips from his teeth. Thus Mr. Mackenzie seems to produce an ill-formed theme, to turn it over and over again, according to the strict rules of art, without ever getting any grip upon it, finally succeeds in bringing his working out to an end, and the theme drops. Another one is introduced with the same effect. It is with regret that we say such hard things about an undoubtedly rising and clever composer, and one who has done such good work. Praise for the strictly technical qualities, which no one doubts in his work, would be out of place in discussing a composition by one who has already won a leading place amongst the new and rising generation of English composers.

The absolute novelty in this programme was the "Ballet Divertissement, Fête Populaire (Henry VIII.)"—St.-Saëns. It is needless to say that this whole work, consisting of four or five separate divisions, is excellent so far as mere musical workmanship goes, and is undoubtedly instinct with strong dramatic feeling; but, as to an English audience almost every theme is thoroughly well known, it can hardly be regarded as operatic music, though it might well be accepted as very excellent incidental music to a play. Of course, to an English audience many parts are intensely funny. For instance, the first two movements, "Entrée des Clans" and "Idylle Ecossaise," appear most humorous. The first movement opens with a well-known English, but not Scotch, air; and, when finally Scotch music is introduced, it is given to the brass with a cymbal accompaniment. One is almost tempted here to speculate as to how this composition arose, and can fancy

M. de St.-Saëns, reading the sketch provided him by the librettist, and seeing "Entrée des Clans," sending for the librettist, and asking him what this might mean. The librettist—of course a Frenchman—having carefully studied English ethnology, replies they were the tribes of "Highlanders"; the composer then inquiring of the librettist what these strange people might be, and being informed they were a kind of savages who used to inhabit the mountains of Scotland, the composer would at once see that Scotch music is necessary, and that the proper dramatic way of representing savages was by cymbals; hence this remarkable musical piece of work may have been produced.

The whole of the ballet as heard at the Crystal Palace seemed further to have been written in consultation with some person accustomed to arranging music for a comic pantomime. The opening was singularly suggestive of a pantomime giant, while the "gigue finale" appeared to be identical with the music usually played during a harlequinade.

MARGERY'S LOVERS AT THE COURT.

MR. BRANDER MATTHEWS has won so distinguished a position in other departments of literature that special interest attached to his first play, the more so as it is to a great extent with the stage of England and France that he has concerned himself. It would be too much to say that Margery's Lovers has completely satisfied expectation; but a dramatic idea underlies the comedy, and there is much delicate work in it. It is indeed, perhaps, too delicate, lacking in robustness; and certain weak places are still further weakened by the inadequacy of the representation where strength is most needed. Mr. Brander Matthews was specially unfortunate with regard to his hero, on whose behalf the sympathies of spectators should be enlisted when he is made to appear guilty of a shameful act—swindling at cards—in the hope that he, Algie Fielding, one of "Margery's Lovers," may be disgraced and so driven from the field to make way for the real perpetrator of the trick, Lopez, a Brazilian adventurer, who also loves the girl. Fielding should be the leading personage of the play, and would be so were he not reduced to insignificance by his representative. It is not easy for the average playgoer to say where the author fails, and where the actor, or what share either has when failure comes. It is nevertheless very easy for any visitor to the Court who considers the matter carefully to perceive what a very different play Margery's Lovers would have appeared had Fielding been able in any degree to interest the audience. Margery is the daughter, the very charming and innocent daughter, of a professional gambler, Richard Blackburn—familiarly known as "Old Red and Black." The girl has no knowledge or suspicion that her father is other than an honest man; and sympathy is enlisted for her by reason of her position. A straightforward, manly, devoted young man would rescue her from contaminating associates; and there is a very prettily written scene for Margery and Fielding in the moonlight in the garden at Nice, overlooking the Mediterranean, where the action of the play is laid. Here Mr. Cartwright, who acts, or endeavours to act, the part of the hero, misses his first chance. He stands stiffly, stick in hand, and repeats his words. There is no emotion, still less is there any passion, in his utterance. When the scene begins one wishes well to the part. When it is over one cares little what comes to so dull a lover, and wonders whether the girl might not "do better." Blackburn joins in the plot against his would-be son-in-law, it should be said in order to make this commentary clear, in the hope that he may be expelled from Nice, and so make room for another lover, richer, and therefore in the father's eyes more desirable, whom Margery has attracted, a light-hearted American boy, Bob Grant by name, the younger brother of a vivacious widow, Mrs. Sarle Webster. In the course of a game—the precise nature of which, by the way, is not quite clear—which takes place at a reception at the house of an Italian Princess, Lopez contrives to make Fielding deal with a pack of cards which the scoundrel has specially arranged; and as soon as the deal begins Lopez pretends to make the discovery, and forthwith denounces Fielding. Here, again, is a chance for the actor. The hot indignation of the denial, the earnestness of the appeal to friends who know him to say that he is incapable of this wretched fraud, the wonder and sorrow when no one comes forward to defend him, should make a very powerful scene. But all this is far beyond the reach of the actor, and the inconsiderate spectator is therefore persuaded that Mr. Brander Matthews has written a bad play.

Up to this point we do not think that the play is bad, though its action doubtless moves somewhat slowly and the piece is slight. The construction so far is decidedly good. The characters are well drawn, and each one bears part in and assists the development of the play. A prominent personage is Lewis Long, the laziest of men, who has fallen in love with the sprightly widow. His mission in the piece is to protect his friend Fielding, and clear up the mystery. There is a Colonel Maitland, who is usefully employed in showing that, with all his sleepiness, Long is in truth a hero, and fought with desperate valour in India; and Maitland does good service again by indicating that unprejudiced opinion must be against Fielding in the card-room, so artfully have his enemies concocted their scheme. What parts in the story the others fill will have been obvious, and in this respect Margery's Lovers is very neatly planned. The last act is inferior. The manner in which all the characters, friends and foes, walk in and out of Fielding's room proves either much carelessness or that the difficulties have been too many for the author. What is chiefly wanted, however, is the demonstration of Fielding's innocence by some adroit and ingenious means; and here Mr. Brander Matthews has shown himself deficient in ingenuity. To wring a confession from Blackburn by the simple device of threatening to reveal his true character to his daughter is altogether too commonplace. This confession is not available because it will incriminate Margery's father, and this Fielding refuses to do; so Long has to obtain another confession from Lopez, and here, again, in making Long suddenly recognize the Brazilian as a swindler he had known in earlier days and whom the police would like to meet, the dramatist betrays poverty of invention. The author of the admirably humorous scene in which Long forces the widow to propose to him need certainly not despair of success as a playwright. Mrs. Wood plays the widow, and, excellent throughout, is particularly excellent here. Long (Mr. Clayton) has previously proposed, and has been refused. He has been ordered not to mention the subject again, and has acquiesced, observing that Mrs. Webster must propose to him next time. She loves him all the time. "He's just too sweet to live——alone!" she has said after her rejection of him; and when she finds out how shrewd and energetic he can be in defence of a friend; when furthermore she ascertains that he is a hero, she endeavours to lead him to the point again. She reminds him of what he had asked her. "And you said you wouldn't," is his abrupt answer. "Did I?" she very gently and inquiringly observes, as if surprised at the information. Long insists. If the proposal is to be renewed, she must renew it.

At last it has to come from her. "Well, will you?" is the terse form of the important query; and he accepts her. Mrs. Wood is here altogether delightful. Mr. Clayton exhibits a disposition to overdo the languor he has to display, though he acts with good judgment in the final scenes. Mr. Cecil, as Blackburn, carefully made up and effective in the earlier parts of the play, fails to make impressive the distress of the singularly weak-minded gambler who succumbs so very speedily to Long's threat. Would it be possible for Mr. Cecil to exhibit emotion without opening his mouth and dropping his lower jaw? It might be; but, so far as we know, he has never attempted it. On the whole, the part is not one of the actor's best successes. There is merit in Mr. Mackintosh's study of Lopez; Mrs. Tree plays prettily enough as Margery; and Mr. Charles Coote gave a remarkably fresh and amusing performance of Grant, the young American who is heartily enjoying life in Europe. Despite the shortcomings, inherent or not, of Margery's Lovers, Mr. Matthews has shown in passages to some of which we have referred enough aptitude and discrimination for stage work to make us hope that he may be encouraged to try again.

THE DUDLEY GALLERY.

THE water-colour exhibition which opened this day week has many features to recommend it; but the visitor will be most struck with the strength of the amateur element. Amateurs try experiments which no artist who wants to make sure of selling his work would think of attempting. In some cases these experiments are very successful; in others they have resulted in dismal failure; but their exhibition adds to the interest of the show, and is moreover extremely instructive. For the rest, the influence of Christmas-card art, as we must call it for want of a better name, is too apparent. There are several framefuls of little vignettes, nude children, and thumbnail landscapes which could never otherwise have existed. We must except two exquisite pictures by Mr. Brett, which, although they are only a few inches square, have a breadth and completeness missing in most of the works by which they are surrounded. The finer of the two is entitled "South-West Gale from the Lizard" (508), and shows the sea getting up, as sailors call it, with a clear blue sky, and long green rollers coming in, with here and there a white horse breaking. The second picture is "Serpentine Rock, Kynance" (488), and is equally powerful, although not so full of air and motion. Both are painted in body colour, without which it would probably be impossible to catch and fix a fleeting mood of nature as Mr. Brett has done it. It is not easy to find any other work in the Gallery to make a third with these two; but, taking the Catalogue in regular order, we may notice next "The Tweed at Innerleithen" (7), by Mr. A. C. Bell, as a good and solid painting, somewhat like a De Wint in its sombreness and depth. This likeness is also apparent, though in a slighter degree, in Mr. Bell's other works—"Ardchattan, Loch Etive, Argyllshire" (490), and "Old Chingford Church" (502). A solidly-painted negro head is "A Friend from the East" (26), by Mr. Goulton May, and is evidently from the same model as Mr. F. S. Morgan's capital "Cup of Coffee" (522), with its admirably-painted background of green tiles. "A Ride for Life" (40), by G. L. Hall, represents a horseman all but overtaken by the tide, backed by a tremendous rising squall, and is powerful but unpleasant. Mr. Basil Bradley exhibits several pictures. "Found; an Incident on Mount St. Bernard" (43), is the old familiar scene, evidently used only as the background of the portraits of some dogs which probably never saw the Alps. However, it is good work, if a little inharmonious in colour. His "Old Friends on the Quai de la Gare, Paris" (552) is much more pleasing. It represents a Frenchman in a blouse petting a horse. The subordinate figures are natural and picturesque. "A Jacobite" (56), by Miss Edith Smith, and "Gone" (368), by Miss Mary Eley, are simultaneous studies from the same model, and are of very similar degrees of excellence, except that a dog which appears in "Gone" adds very much to the effect. Mr. Ingram's "Silver Sea" (58) deserves commendation for the delicate gradations of the prevailing greys. Mr. Walter Langley contributes three rather disappointing pictures. It seems strange that an artist who can draw and paint so well should care so little for beauty. The three represent first an ugly old man and an ugly girl, called "The Old Story" (278); then we have the ugly old man separately in "A Quiet Pipe" (67), and the ugly young woman in "The Last Chapter" (86). Good as colour, drapery, expression and drawing may be, these are not pictures we can admire.

Two very fine landscapes are "The Alphubel and Taschhorn" (68), by Mr. T. M. Donne, and "Mists in the Valley, Rosenlaui" (69), by Mr. Walter Severn. Of a wholly different kind is Mr. Herbert Marshall's London view, "Foreshore at Blackfriars" (95), which is satisfactory in every way. It forms a pretty picture, it is interesting topographically, and it is painted with both admirable truth and well-balanced composition. The other two works by the same artist (464, 497) are of minor importance, but should not be neglected. "A Pottery Shop at Bruges" (96), by Miss Tanner, shows some power of harmonious adjustment. General Fane contributes an archway view, which he calls "Hoghton Tower" (107), and which shows that, though his manipulative skill is beyond that of most amateurs, his eye for colour is not sufficiently under control. This defect is more prominent in his other picture, the "Canal at Dordrecht" (47), which is very spotty indeed. Mr. St. John Mildmay sends a fine drawing, the "Monument to Pope Innocent VIII. in St. Peter's" (123), where he shows a skill in depicting varied marbles worthy of Mr. Tadema. Mrs. Paul Naftel's view of a brook (143) is pretty and refined, but weak. This cannot be objected to Mr. Watts's "End of the Year" (141) or to his "Silence of Winter" (230), a pine wood, both of which are remarkable alike for high finish and force. Mr. Ellis's "In Fold" (171) is rough, but very powerful; and we may mention, in passing the end wall, "La Porte du Jardin" (180), by Mr. Johnstone; "The Edge of the North Sea" (181), by Mr. Charles Robertson; "Lambeth from Westminster" (183), by Mr. Medlycott, and a view in the British Museum (184), by Miss Turle—all of them works of a superior class.

Miss Fairman sends some excellent studies of birds from the Zoological Gardens (221, 449). Mr. George Marks's "Close of a Bright Day" (310) deserves praise, and can only be described as sweet. "Walberswick, Suffolk" (311), by Mr. Weedon, is clever. "Amberley" (328), by Mr. Stocks, is "cool and calm and bright," but is utterly killed by Mr. Marks's "Summer" (325), which hangs beside it. Two pictures which appear from below to have deserved a better fate are skied—Mr. A. E. Fisher's "One Side of an Argument" (246), a highly-finished Italian peasant head; and "Waiting for the Stage" (380), by Mr. Ford Hughes, a less complete picture apparently, but pleasantly sentimental. The screens bear some of the prettiest sketches, of the coloured-card character we have mentioned, and a terra-cotta figure by Mr. G. Crockford, "The Tired Bather" (624), should have a line of approval. Altogether, there is much promise, especially among the less known artists, in this exhibition, and the selection has evidently been made with the utmost care. There are, it is true, some very inferior examples, but as there is little to be learnt from them, we have simply passed them by.

THE END OF THE COTTON STRIKE.

AFTER a continuance of over two months the strike in the Lancashire cotton trade has at length happily come to an end. From the first it was apparent to all who had considered the matter that the strike must be unsuccessful, and most people have been surprised that it lasted so long. It was undertaken in spite of the leaders of the operatives, and it has been concluded only by such an exertion of authority by these latter as has induced a kind of mutiny and forced some of the leaders to resign. It is not disputed by any party to the dispute that the cotton trade is in a very depressed state; particularly in the weaving branch it is admitted that employers have been losing heavily. The only question that has been at issue is as to the measures to be taken to bring about an improvement. Originally the employers proposed a reduction of wages to the extent of 10 per cent., while the representatives of the workpeople put forward as a counter proposal that the mills should be worked only three or four days a week. When this was rejected, the latter offered as a compromise that both reduction of wages and short time should be adopted, but the employers again refused to consent. Ultimately it was agreed by the employers that they would ask only a reduction of wages to the extent of 5 per cent, provided the leaders of the operatives recommended the workpeople to submit. The representatives of the workpeople are charged with having failed to exert their influence as strongly as they might have done. In the circular issued by them they unquestionably gave it as their opinion that the wiser course would be to accept the terms offered, pointing out in clear language that the operatives had not means to contest the point successfully; but at the same time they left to local meetings to decide upon the course to be adopted. Probably the leaders felt that they could not push their authority farther; indeed it is alleged that the representatives from the Blackburn district declared that it was as much as their lives were worth to do more than they actually did. The result was that in the Blackburn district the operatives struck work, while in all the rest of Lancashire the reduction of wages was submitted to. When the strike in the Blackburn district had lasted about nine weeks, negotiations were opened between the representatives of the employers and workpeople, and an arrangement was come to, according to which the workpeople were to accept the reduction of wages, and the employers were to pledge themselves to reconsider in three months whether wages could not be again raised to the old level. At first the workpeople refused to submit, but their leaders held several meetings, and urged acceptance so strongly that at length they prevailed, though not until they took the votes of those concerned shop by shop. So violent, however, as well as personal has been the opposition offered to them that the president, secretary, and another member of the general committee have resigned their offices on the express ground that they have lost the confidence of their constituents and have been charged with corruptly selling themselves to the employers.

It will be seen that this dispute has differed in some important respects from the great strike of 1878. It has been confined to the Blackburn district, whereas the strike five years ago extended over North and North-East Lancashire. It has passed away, too, without rioting. And it has brought to light a remarkable divergence of view between the Trade-Union leaders and a large portion of those they represent. The state of trade, the poverty of the Trade-Unions, and the impossibility of drawing from other parts of the country large supplies, made a general strike impracticable. But the workpeople hoped that by confining the struggle to the Blackburn district they might be able to defeat the employers in detail. The employers, on their side, were for many reasons not unwilling to localize the dispute. In the beginning a number of the employers were themselves in favour of short time, and therefore they were not prepared to drive matters to extremities. Moreover the employers generally, while not desiring to adopt short time, were yet not unwilling to diminish production by such a suspension of work as has taken place in Blackburn, and therefore they did not adopt a general "lock-out" as they did five years ago, and thus bring on a struggle throughout the whole of North and North-East Lancashire. This fact accounts for the peaceable manner in which the strike has been conducted. We may hope, indeed, that there has been some improvement during the past five years in the relations between employers and employed, and that the latter have come to recognize that violence cannot help their cause. But it can hardly be doubted that if the struggle had become general, and large numbers had been plunged in great distress, some excesses would have been committed. When, however, the employers consented to localize the struggle, it was obviously to the interest of all concerned not to embitter the dispute, or to drive the masters into the adoption of measures which would speedily bring on a collapse of the strike. As the contest went on, however, it would seem that the employers became more united amongst themselves, and more determined to enforce a reduction of wages; and when the leaders of the workpeople learned this, they saw that the chance of a successful ending of the strike—never very great—had entirely disappeared. If the employers decided upon a general lock-out, the subscriptions to the strike funds would be brought to an end, and the workpeople would have to submit unconditionally. Besides, even as it was, the subscriptions were never very large. And we presume that the leaders of the workpeople foresaw that they were likely to fall off. Trade all over the country is depressed, and the workpeople everywhere are not in a position to subscribe largely. Outside the Blackburn district, too, it is probable that the majority of the workpeople perceived that the strike was hopeless, and were unwilling, therefore, to throw away money uselessly. Lastly, the leaders of the workpeople had intelligence enough to see that the condition of things all round them was growing worse and worse every day that the strike lasted. Even in Manchester, where no strike has occurred, meetings of the unemployed are being held asking for work. And in the Blackburn district, where as many as twenty-two thousand persons are said to have been thrown out of employment by the strike, the distress was becoming serious. Nor was it only those engaged in the strike who suffered. All the tradespeople with whom they deal lost the money which would have been spent with them if these people had been in employment, and at the same time were expected to give credit freely to their hungry customers when probably their own creditors were pressing them for payment. In addition to the weavers, it is also to be borne in mind that other classes of cotton operatives were thrown out of employment. So many looms were left idle that there was less yarn required for weaving, and therefore, of course, less wool for spinning. Lastly, the whole industry of Blackburn was affected. At a recent meeting of the shareholders of one of the Railway Companies serving the district, the chairman stated that the strike had cost the Company about 3,000*l.* a week. If a single Railway Company lost so much on the mere carriage of goods, it is easy to see that the losses of the whole trade of the district must have been enormous. In consequence, the means of giving employment to labour was being rapidly diminished, and the danger of a large addition to the number of unemployed was growing every day. The leaders of the operatives perceived all this clearly, and were anxious to bring the strike to an end as soon as possible. But the general body of operatives either failed to see it, or hoped that the pressure of events would compel the employers to put an end to the struggle rather than plunge the district into such severe distress. In any case a large proportion of them turned against their own leaders the indignation they had directed five years ago against their employers; and, although they have not resorted to actual violence as they did in 1878, they have compelled, as above stated, several of those leaders to resign their offices. It is of course not surprising to find an extreme wing in a movement of this kind. But the facts taken altogether seem to show that the Trade-Union leaders are losing their old influence over the working classes. And the same thing seems to be proved by the constant complaints of the leaders that the workpeople will not subscribe to the Union funds.

Under all the circumstances it seems not improbable that the struggle may be renewed before long. At the several meetings called by the leaders of the operatives, they dwelt specially on the promise of the employers that the question would be reconsidered in a few months with a view to the restoration of the five per cent. now cut off. And they also pointed out that, if the workpeople returned to their employment, and subscribed punctually to the Union funds, they would be better able in the summer to renew the struggle than they are now to continue it. In the minds of the leaders there is probably no wish for a renewal of the strike. But that arguments of this kind had to be used to bear down the opposition offered to them proves how strong is the feeling throughout the Blackburn district against submitting to any reduction. It may be, of course, that the trade will improve so much that in May or June next the employers may be in a position to restore wages to the old level. But at present that does not seem probable. All the reports are that the great markets for English cotton goods in the Far East are over-supplied, and that prices there are not likely to rise. Here at home there is no probability of an increase of consumption, and on the Continent and in America the general adoption of protective duties has gradually limited the markets for English cotton goods. Under all these circumstances, therefore, an early revival of the trade is hardly to be looked for. If, then, the employers are unable to raise wages in the early summer, it is to be feared that another dispute may occur. In any case, the liability of disputes of this kind continues great as long as no fresh outlets for our trade are provided. The producing capacity of the world is growing much more rapidly than the consuming capacity; and all the remedies proposed by employers and employed cannot avail against this fact. A reduction of wages for the time being, of course, lessens the cost of production, and therefore enables the employers to go on working for some time further. But if the trade is thus rendered profitable, new capital flows into it, and the means of increasing the output are augmented. Thus the old difficulty recurs. In the same way the proposal of the workpeople can at best provide only temporary relief. To stop production for a little while limits the stock in the market, and may thus lead to a temporary rise in prices. But as soon as the looms begin to work full time again, the stock accumulates, and prices go down once more. There is only one permanent remedy, and that is to increase the markets for cotton goods. That may be done partly by economies of various kinds introduced in the manufacture of cotton goods; partly by a more honest system of manufacture; but chiefly it must be by opening up new markets to replace those which are being closed by the growth of the cotton manufacturing industry in foreign countries.

REVIEWS.

LE MUSÉE DE MARINE DU LOUVRE.*

SOME well-known words of Lord Macaulay's may justly be applied to this huge and magnificent volume. It may certainly be said that, at first sight, it fills the reader "with astonishment similar to that which Captain Lemuel Gulliver felt when first he landed in Brobdingnag, and saw corn as high as the oaks in the New Forest, thimbles as large as buckets, and wrens of the bulk of turkeys. The whole book and every component part of it is on a gigantic scale." Here, however, the quotation must stop. It would not only be most unfair, but directly opposite to truth, to speak of Admiral Edmond Paris's elaborate and gorgeously-illustrated compilation as remarkable only for its weight and bulk. Very big—big even beyond the books of past ages—it is, and, in the literal sense of the words, very heavy; but then its size and ponderosity are due to the enormous amount of valuable matter and to the very many pictures of models and ships which it contains. It may best be described as a history, drawn from the materials to be found in the Louvre Museum, of warships from the time of galleys to that of the best sailing line-of-battle ships and frigates; and a very admirable history it is.

To a certain extent it is an official or semi-official publication. Admiral Paris, who is Conservator of the Museum, is responsible for it, although it must be said that the order in which the large illustrations are arranged might have been more regular; and the production of the work has been aided by subscriptions from the Ministères de la Marine et de l'Instruction Publique, and from "The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, of Trinity House," &c. As the Admiral received assistance from England he might have ascertained that there are no Lords Commissioners of the Trinity House; but it would be hard to blame him much for this blunder, as English titles of all kinds are apparently as inscrutable a mystery to Frenchmen as higher mathematics are to those who think that two and two make four. Carelessness is certainly not a characteristic of the Admiral's work, which has been compiled with that patient and laborious care which we are accustomed to associate with German rather than with French writing. Beginning with the very beginning of things, the writer speaks of Egyptian vessels, and of galleys and biremes. These, however, he only notices briefly, and he is quite right in doing so, as they have been described in very many books. Of the ships of the middle ages he also says very little, for the excellent reason that he has been able to learn next to nothing about them. "Passons donc au moyen-âge," he observes, "pour montrer le peu que l'on sait au sujet de cette longue période entre l'invasion des barbares et la civilisation actuelle." Had he sought for information outside the Museum of the Louvre, he might perhaps have found that there is not such an absolute blank as he supposes. He has never heard, apparently, of that marvellous Viking galley which, perfectly preserved, was found a few years ago in a grave-mound near the entrance to the Christiania Fjord, and he is equally ignorant of the other remains of the Viking period. It may, however, fairly be admitted that there are but very scanty materials, to say the least, for any account of mediæval ships which died a natural death by foundering or decaying, and were never, save when owned by Vikings, buried in honour of their illustrious owners. Of the ships of the latter part of the fifteenth century some knowledge is obtainable, and of those of the sixteenth there are elaborate drawings, some of which are reproduced in the present volume. Assuming these drawings to be accurate, which is by no means certain, it is not easy to understand how these strange old craft were sailed. High out of the water and with gigantic poops, they must have been occasionally in considerable danger of "turning turtle," and it is difficult to discover how their running rigging was rove, how the sails were worked, and what power they had of beating to windward. Admiral Paris, bringing a seaman's knowledge to bear on the question, throws some light on the methods of the old sailors, but here, as in many other parts of the book, his valuable remarks can only be understood by those who have acquired some knowledge of French nautical terms. After describing the earlier sailing ships, he speaks of Mediterranean galleys and other craft; and, treating the subject in his usual exhaustive manner, covers a good many pages before he gets to the year 1662, when, under Colbert's administration, the regular French navy was first formed. By this time shipbuilding had made some progress, and probably it had been found that the comfort of the principal officer and of his numerous suite was not quite so important as the safety of the vessel, and the poop had been considerably reduced. During the latter half of the seventeenth century some further progress was made with war-ships, at all events, and the Royal Louis, 108, a splendid vessel, launched in 1690, was of a type not enormously removed from that of the vessels which encountered ours at the beginning of the Great War. Of this vessel there is a model in the Louvre Museum, and a very full description is given of her in the present work. In some respects, of course, her design seems a very bad one, almost as bad as those of a modern passenger steamer with its two or three-storied buildings above the upper deck. The poop was, so to speak, the fourth terrace from the waist, and her head and bow were absurdly low, but, despite what now seem glaring faults, it is difficult to resist the impression that her designer was a man of considerable ability, who got so far as to approximate distantly to the type which prevailed until steam and big guns altered everything. In the Sans Pareil, built seventy years later, there is evidence of considerable improvement in the method of rigging and of some improvement in hulls, but not of a very great or radical improvement, and the line-of-battle ships of the end of the century, though better than the Sans Pareil, did not show any important change or any marked progress in the art of designing. Some time before this vessel was built science had to a slight extent been brought to bear on naval architecture, and the metacentre had been discovered or invented—whichever term may be thought most appropriate. It was, no doubt, a very valuable invention or discovery, and has, no doubt, been of great use to the naval architect; but the mention of its first appearance most painfully calls to mind the tiny progress which the so-called science of naval architecture—which of course is not to be confounded with practical shipbuilding—has made in a century and a quarter. Only the other day a distinguished naval architect pointed out that some highly-trained muddlers used the term in a wrong sense; and quoted another luminary, who pointed out that the word "stability" bears sometimes one meaning, sometimes another. What manner of science can this be when, after more than a hundred and twenty years, accomplished professors cannot use the most elementary words in the right sense?

A few years after the Sans Pareil was set afloat coppering was first tried in the French navy. It is needless to say that the idea was taken from England, and this Admiral Paris very frankly avows. Before coppering was tried, various expedients had been resorted to, the latest and perhaps the most eccentric of which was to drive a lot of broadheaded nails into a ship's bottom so as to cover it. In 1778 an English cutter was brought into Brest which was sheathed with very thin sheets of copper. Some sharp-sighted officer—we are not told who—saw the value of the new device; the frigate Iphigénie was coppered, but a good many mistakes were made at first; and the French shipbuilders found that the copper on their vessels only lasted eighteen months, while they heard that with English ships the duration was much longer. At last, however, the right way of working was found, and the enormous advantages of copper sheathing were fully recognized. In the hulls to which copper was applied slight improvements were made from time to time, until, early in the present century, a type was reached which, save in the shape of the head and fore part of the bow, bore considerable resemblance to that which prevailed at the end of the sailing-ship period, though of course there was, before, irrespective of the advance in size, some improvement in sailing line-of-battle ships, and still greater improvement in sailing frigates before they became obsolete. Admiral Paris gives a photograph of a model of a 120-gun vessel of the year 1800, and, as it happens, this has been taken in such a way that the bow cannot be seen. Shown thus, the ship certainly seems like a three-decker of forty-five years later, but with the bow visible the likeness would not be so great, and it was some time before the absurdity of making the head, or foremost portion of the bow, lower than the rest of the ship was realized. It is never well to judge the productions of one period by the light of after knowledge, but still it seems curious that sailors should not, long before the end of the eighteenth century, have perceived and pointed out to shipbuilders how much would be gained by doing away with the low, curved projection from which the bowsprit rose, and substituting a higher and more solid bow.

In smaller vessels this mistake could not be made, and indeed in the comparatively easy work of designing them French shipbuilders seem to have made much more progress than with the great ships. Admiral Paris gives a photograph of what he calls a "Chebec à voiles latines de 20 canons, 1750 à 1786." Chebec has usually been spelt in English books xebec, and all readers of James's Naval History will remember how successful Lord Cochrane was in an encounter with a Spanish craft of this kind. The French model, which, we suppose, is a typical one, is disfigured by a kind of poop deck carried out beyond the stern-post, but apart from this the design seems a very good one; and, as the sail area is large, it is easy to understand that, despite the inconveniences of the lateen rig, such vessels must have been difficult either to catch or to get away from. In two other illustrations, taken from an extremely interesting painting, several vessels of different kinds are shown. There are galleys such as sailed in the Mediterranean until 1814, large lateen-rigged vessels, which must have had wonderful speed; two brigs, not very beautiful craft; a corvette, and a kind of gunboat. Of such development of the larger vessels as there was during and after the Great War, and of the progress of the French navy in the eighteenth and the first part of the present century, Admiral Paris gives a careful account; and we wish that we could briefly follow his history, and show how thoroughly and conscientiously his work is executed throughout; but unfortunately it would be impossible to give even the briefest summary of the enormous number of facts he has collected without greatly exceeding the space at our command. With 1848 his work comes to an end, the latest vessel of which he gives a drawing being a three-decker launched in 1847. So far as regards the English navy it cannot be said that the sailing-ship period came to an end in 1848. Probably the finest line-of-battle ships that ever sailed were those which formed the fleet in the Mediterranean when Sir William Parker flew his flag on board that magnificent vessel the Queen. It is said that the Superb, which belonged to this fleet, once asked permission during a gale of wind to fight her lower-deck guns, and, on leave being given after some hesitation, showed that she could accomplish the feat with ease. For her and for her sisters, however, death was at hand. Sir W. Parker hauled down his flag, if we remember rightly, in the beginning of 1852, when—albeit that all, or almost all, the larger vessels were sailing ships—steam was asserting its irresistible claim; and within a comparatively short space of time the sailing-ship period, which may be said to have begun almost in prehistoric times, came to an end. It was followed by the very brief period of screw line-of-battle ships and screw frigates; but after a short span of existence, ironclad ships and iron ships, with totally changed guns, superseded them as completely as the rifle superseded Brown Bess.

Of the rapid transitions which followed the long time of slow progress and very gradual development it is to be hoped that Admiral Paris may at some future day be able to speak. His elaborate account of the war-ships of France up to the time when the great change was imminent is so good that all who study his pages and the many illustrations of his work must wish that he may be able to carry on his account to the time when French naval architects, first to see the advantages of armour, clothed La Gloire with iron, and also, perhaps, to the days of the Amiral Baudin. If he does this, he may be able to note one great change of a very different nature from that of which we have just spoken. In one of the last pages of his history he compares the strength of the various navies of Europe in 1830, and shows that in that year the British navy was stronger than those of all the other European Powers combined. Should he get to 1882 or 1883, he will have to record a very different state of things, and to show how enormously the relative naval power of Great Britain had declined until it was a question whether her fighting-ships were a match for those of France alone; and perhaps he, or some other historian of the future, while commenting on this great change, may point out that Englishmen persisted in ignoring it, would take no count of the huge increase in the strength of foreign navies, refused to pay any attention to facts proved again and again, and indeed patent to any candid observer, and thought that they were got rid of by the short and simple process of calling those who drew attention to them alarmists and panic-mongers.

FOUR NOVELS.*

THE Average Novelist's vocation appears to be irresistibly imperious. "Fruits fail, and love dies, and time ranges"; and still the Average Novelist pursues the even tenour of his way. His fate cries out in him, and in one, two, or three volumes he repeats the remark. That it is seldom or never worth repeating makes no difference to him. Culture has made him; custom has sanctioned him; Mudie approves of him; and he continues to exist and to produce. Unquestionably something is rotten in the State, or he would not be allowed to misuse the good gifts of print and paper as he does. Plato, in an age of darkness, proposed to clear his republic of poets. In an age of sweetness and light he would probably have proposed to purge the body politic of average novelists. They not only waste time themselves; they are the cause of others wasting time (and energy, and temper, and ink) as well. And for that reason, if for no other, they might, with infinite advantage, be abolished.

Now and then, it must be owned, your Average Novelist is a pleasant creature enough. But as a rule he fails entirely to justify the fact of his existence; he does no more than help, as far as in him lies, to prove the reality of such an inexplicable mystery as the Permission of Evil. There are many who, instead of saying that "the Devil has come among us, having great wrath," would fully express their feelings by remarking that "the Average Novelist has come among us, having great facility"; and there are many to whom this statement would mean far more than the other—to whom the last of these two declarations would seem much worse than the first. Of these, it is greatly to be hoped that such a book (for instance) as Mr. Marshall's Only Yesterday will never fall into their hands. This, it may be explained, is a polite way of saying that Only Yesterday is hardly literature; and that, but for the active existence of such of Mr. Mudie's subscribers as must have their daily novel or die, Only Yesterday would not easily have found its way into print. Mr. Marshall is ambitious, it is true, and painfully original likewise; but, for all that, he is the reverse of good reading. His story is one of a number of maniacs of several sorts. We have, for example, a maniacal father and mother, who starve themselves and their offspring rather than infringe the Mosaic and patristic laws on usury by accepting the thousand a year or so accruing to them from certain eminently respectable investments. We have a maniacal wife and mother, who, becoming rich, deserts her husband, hides herself and two of her children in various holes and corners of the universe, brings up her son as somebody else's, allows her daughter to die of consumption, and perishes herself of heartache and disappointment when her other babes—the offspring whom she has left in her husband's care—refuse to recognize her. On the scions of these two noble stocks our author centres much of his interest. His heroine, the lovely Maud, is a daughter of the first; and to the son of the second she proves so superlatively agreeable that he not only proposes wedlock, but conducts himself in such a manner as proves him "no gentleman." In justice to Mr. Marshall, however, it must be added that this person is not his hero. His hero is cast in a different mould. His hero rejoices in the name of Edmund Ashley, alias "Carver's Edmund." He has "warm brown hair"; a "broad ample brow, very knotty"; a "long triangular face"; a choice assortment of "frontal sinus bones"; and "large tawny eyes." What is more, he "generally wears" a white apron; what is more, he condescends to serve in a grocer's shop. Of course he is in love with Maud; and equally of course that fair creature—having a "swanny throat," and "luscious lips" (with a habit of "lovelling with resolution"), and a "Napoleonic chin," and "sloeblack eyes," and a "fell of magnificent black hair," and a "straight nose," which is "regular as any chisellings left of Heré or Aphrodite of old," and a "contour just at that point of development when the slim angularities of the teens smoothen into the graceful flexions and fulnesses of early womanhood"—despises him most heartily. Edmund, however, is more than a match for her. He cuts the grocery business; he becomes interested in dry goods; he tries to save her brother from the snares of the betting-man and the potwalloper; he writes her formal letters—"yours to hand," "your esteemed favour," and all the rest of it; he pursues her brother (who has run away with coins) as far as Spain; he witnesses a bull-fight for her sake; he appears on the scene just as her swain, the son of the maniacal mother, is giving way to his feelings; he dashes that person to the earth with fearful violence; he is taken into partnership; he marries his Maud; he puts her money into the business; they are probably happy ever afterwards. "I can offer you now a comfortable home," says he, in the memorable interview which decides her destiny, "and may be, hereafter, a better one; and, if you would permit—my promotion last week enables it—I could easily allow your parents as much as I believe you remitted them out of your stipend." Is it any wonder that Maud, for all her "Napoleonic chin," is carried away by this torrent of eloquence, and for life entrusts her "contour" to its author's charge? that at starting we ventured to describe Only Yesterday as "hardly literature"? that one should think of the Average Novelist as a nuisance of the first magnitude? If it is, if any living soul is for an instant in doubt, then Mr. Marshall has written in vain.

The story of Pere Gold is the story of a certain Valentine Eyre; how he came into his property; took it into his head that the girl of his heart was a cynical and contemptible young person; fell in love with a beautiful demon; got jilted; was knocked to pieces in the hunting field; was nursed almost to death's door by a young married woman who hated him because he refused to encourage improper overtures on her part; was rescued by the object of his early affections; and, discovering her to be "pure gold"— is Mrs. Cameron's epigraph—was moved to marry her and be happy after all. Such as it is, it takes a great deal of telling, near seven hundred pages of close print being required to do it justice. It is far from unamusing in its way. Mrs. Cameron is clever, and she has done her best to entertain her readers. The banquet she sets before them is none of the choicest; but the fare is sufficiently varied, and, if not very satisfying, is at least what is known as "filling." For instance, we have an eccentric uncle, an attempt at forgery, an attempt at murder, a document buried and dug up again at dead of night, a hunting accident, and a highly fashionable marriage broken in mid career; we have no less than three heroines—one beautiful and honest, one lovely and corrupt, one peculiar and devilish; we have a hero who is something of an ass, a humble friend who pretends to be deaf and dumb and is always cracking nuts, a gambling colonel, a matchmaking aunt, a family of humorous boys and girls, an intriguing mamma, a very vulgar daughter, a red-haired and ingenuous peer, and a cock-eyed Italian prince (who marries heroine number two); we have complications, intrigues, misunderstandings, of every sort and quality and importance; and in the end we have justice done, and all the good folks rewarded, and all the bad folks punished. Nor is this all. In Fenella Snowe, heroine number three, the peculiar and devilish heroine, with her tendency to impropriety, her weakness for forgery and murder, and her crazy faith in her aristocratic origin, we have something not at all unlike an individual character; in Madeline Abbott, the beautiful fiend, who throws over the hero and marries the squinting Italian, we get such a creation as would scarcely have dishonoured those unknown poets who purveyed for the immortal Skelt—such an achievement in criminal unreality as since the brave days of "penny plain and twopence coloured" has not often swum into our ken; in Lady Cornelia, the majestic matchmaker, we have a puppet of considerable parts; in Letty Ormond, the good heroine, the golden girl of the piece, we have a really pleasant and natural young person; and in Letty Ormond's brothers we have a parcel of young demons who are very often amusing. To resume, Mrs. Cameron gives us plot after a fashion, incident of a kind, character of a certain sort, and much better English on the whole than we have any right to expect. What more can readers of the Average Novelist desire?

> Nay, but you who do not love her,
> Is she not pure gold, my mistress?

It is other guesswork with The Touch of Fate. There is average and average, just as there are faggots and faggots; and The Touch of Fate is of the latter. To begin with, it is a mystery. What the Touch of Fate is; who or what is the object of the Touch of Fate, and why; and what is the effect (if any) of the Touch of Fate, supposing that touch to be actual and practical—these are questions the answers to which, if they exist at all, exist somewhere outside the three volumes signed by Mrs. George Posnett. There is a heroine, of course, and there is a hero; her name is Beatrice, and his name is Hugh; but in the first chapter he is found hiccuping with grief and agitation as the betrothed of Another. He is unable to marry Her; He is compelled to marry Another; and (it is only fair to add) He treats Another exceedingly ill. He takes to drink; and although Beatrice remonstrates with him, he refuses to be persuaded into reform. On the contrary, he goes from bad to worse, and one dreadful night—when the wind is roaring, and the rain is pouring, and everybody is in evening dress—he turns Another and Beatrice out of the house, and indulges in a bad attack of delirium tremens. The consequence is that Another is confined of a son and heir in the porter's lodge, and that Beatrice is more angry than can be expressed in words. Presently Hugh repents, sports a purple ribbon, and promises that if Another will only return to him he will go in for the blue one, and totally abstain for ever. Another is moved by this devotion, and returns; insisting, however, on a year's probation on the part of the hero of the purple badge before she again becomes a wife to him in deed. To this probation the valiant Hugh submits; he falls in love with Another; and in the end Another and he are One. Beatrice, meanwhile, refuses the parson of the parish; tries hospital work; is disgusted with life; goes out to Gibraltar; falls in love upon the voyage with a noble but shadowy peer; arrives to find the peer's mamma just dead; and marries him (to save appearances) in less than forty-eight hours after landing. Where in all this the Touch of Fate comes in is not easy to say. Sandwiched with the romance of Beatrice and Hugh and Another are the experiences of a comic Irishman, who comes to London, and has many ludicrous adventures, and is interested in his deceased wife's sister, and all that sort of thing. He, perhaps, it is who is subjected to the Touch of Fate; for, while he is in London, his sweet little daughter prods her aunt (the deceased wife's sister of his dream) with a red-hot poker, and presently is bitten by a mad dog, while the Peers throw out the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill; and when he returns to Ireland, his girl expires of hydrophobia, and his boy exhibits symptoms of phthisis, and he has to sell off his farm, and remove to Boulogne, and there adventure matrimony with the relative he adores. But if this is so, why is he not Mrs. Posnett's hero in place of the blue-ribanded Hugh? why is he condemned to exist as the dullest comic Irishman in fiction? why is he singled out from all mankind to be the victim of the united acts of hydrophobia and the Peers? why is so little made of the red-hot poker, which, if Fate must take to touching, is surely an appropriate implement? why—but, as we said, the whole thing is a mystery, and—common justice obliges to add—one of the most worthless in the range of art.

Lady Dunboyne writes fluently, has seen the world, and has a certain knack of characterization and dialogue. In Through Shine and Shower, which is decidedly scrappy and decidedly dull, she gives us a good deal of flirtation, a certain number of moving accidents and hair-breadth 'scapes, a little Land-Leaguerism, a harmless and unnecessary murder, and a couple of happy marriages. She introduces us to an English barrister, and weds him for our behoof to the nicest of her girls; and she contrives us a kind of sub-hero out of a peace-loving Irish baronet. But the flavour of her work is decidedly military. She abounds in officers and the wives of officers, and she gives us of her abundance with a certain spirit, a certain insight, a certain tact and dexterity, which—though, as we have said, her book is decidedly dull and as decidedly scrappy—leave us to some extent her debtors, and not at all unwilling to attempt the perusal of her next novel. It is to be hoped, however, that in this she will put off the tragic, and show forth with a less lurid splendour than in Through Shine and Shower. Herein she introduces us to a beautiful Irish baronet, Sir Gerald O'Hanlon the name of him, to the Lady Beatrice, his lovely and accomplished spouse, and to their inarticulate but interesting offspring, a year-old heir; merely, it would seem, for the purpose of dragging in the Land League neck and crop, to compass the baronet's destruction and the ruin of his happy home, and thereby prove, to the admiration of all beholders, what a dreadful organization it really is. Herein, too, she sends her soldier hero out to fight the Boers, and refuses to bring him back to his penitent mistress (to whom, by the way, he finally proposes behind an umbrella, in the shelter of a Belgravian portico), until she has smashed his leg, and pretended to damage his spine, and made him a hopeless cripple. Misery of this sort is not what is expected of the Average Novelist. Why lame your hero when, just as easily and far more profitably, you may unite him to the heroine unharmed—as the heroine would prefer to have him? Why impeach the Land League when the Land League is working its best and hardest at the task of self-impeachment? Those things are unnecessary; argal, they are unpleasant. "O vain and frivolous mind of man!" As if the Average Novelist had not enough in his disfavour already!

DÜNTZER'S LIFE OF GOETHE.

HERR DÜNTZER has been both well served by his translators and ill served. In the matter of translation he has been better served by Mr. Lyster than he was by Mr. Pinkerton in the Life of Schiller. So far as we can judge without a comparison with the original, Mr. Lyster has been quite as successful in reproducing his author, and certainly far more successful in fitting him with an English dress. "In translating this book," he says, "I have endeavoured to transmute and fuse the German sentences into English. If I have failed in places, I must ask the indulgence which I should now give to another, knowing as I do the great difficulty of resisting the influence of the foreign style." To say that he has failed in places is to say no more than that he is mortal; a long course of Herr Düntzer's prose, if he may be judged from what his English translators have been able to make of it, must indeed have a terribly deteriorating effect on one's style. We should doubt whether he himself cared greatly to please by more external and meretricious graces. So deeply and so rightly impressed as he has been with the importance of the matters with which his life has been concerned, he has probably had but little time or inclination for mere style. He is the veteran of Goethe-study in Germany; and jests, Mr. Lyster tells us, "about the voluminousness of his works and the minuteness of his criticism are not infrequent"; then he adds, "I do indeed think that most of the laughing at Professor Düntzer in England is done either by lazy people or by those who are not aware of his services." English people should surely be the last to laugh either at minute criticism in others or voluminous biographies; nor, we would hope, are they disposed to laugh at a writer who does his best to tell his countrymen and the world at large the truth about two such men as Goethe and Schiller. But both English and Germans may, we think, be allowed, without incurring the charge of flippancy or irreverence, to wish that this industrious Professor had been able or had cared to give his work some more attractive setting. However, Mr. Lyster has evidently tried his best to do what he can for his author in this respect; and, if his success has not always been commensurate with his endeavours, we must remember the Herculean difficulties of his task. He might perhaps have managed here and there without very great trouble to hit upon some more felicitous words or phrases to express the German meaning. "Mama that disciplines chaps, and teaches them to hold their heads erect" (vol. i. p. 265), strikes one, for example, as rather too colloquial an expression for serious biography, even if we may suppose it to adequately render the German form of speech in the year 1774. Moreover, as an English translation of any work is obviously designed for those who are unable to read it in the original language, it would have been well if Mr. Lyster had not given us quite so much German. A passage like this will hardly convey any very precise idea to readers who are not conversant with the tongue of our Teutonic brethren:—"When he stood before the inscription [then follow eight lines of German poetry] tears flowed down his face. Slowly he drew his handkerchief from his pocket, dried his tears, and said in a gentle, melancholy voice, 'Ja, warte nur, bald ruhest du auch!' was silent half a minute, looked out through the window at the dark pine wood, and then turned to Mahr, saying 'Now we will go down again'" (vol. ii. p. 435). Such a mixture of languages, besides being but half intelligible to a reader who requires a translation at all, has in itself something of a comical effect; and such mixtures are rather too common throughout the book. We must hope, moreover, for Goethe's sake, that the following passage (vol. i. p. 261) from a letter to Kestner on the vexed question of the identity of Albert does not accurately represent his epistolary style:—"You feel not him, you feel but me and you, and what you call stuck on, but which—in spite of you—and others—is woven in." But, on the whole, Mr. Lyster has certainly succeeded in making this Life of Goethe far more congenial to English readers than did Mr. Pinkerton the Life of Schiller.

It is in his preface that he has, we think, served Herr Düntzer's interests a little less well, and he has done so by claiming a little too much for him. Of the sources from which we in England have hitherto drawn our knowledge of Goethe's life Mr. Lyster says:—

> English knowledge of Goethe's life is drawn chiefly from the book by Mr. Lewes. The little volume by Mr. Hayward is not a good source to draw one's notion of Goethe from. I had rather be without a notion of Goethe than so provide myself. Mr. Lewes's book is generous, makes allowances, and does not judge the great poet with tea-table criticism. If we cannot help finding it unsatisfactory nowadays, let us not forget that we owe that largely to Mr. Lewes himself; he has educated us into disparagement. But the fact remains that the book is not satisfactory. Mr. Lewes's main work on it was done a long time ago, when comparatively few of Goethe's letters were printed. And the revision of 1875, mentioned in the preface, was not a thorough adequate revision. I have looked into this and know that it is so. No one can fail to observe, moreover, that the book is not only a Life of Goethe, but a compendium of small essays of not much value, and debates with the imaginary stiff-necked reader who will not judge Goethe as Mr. Lewes desires, and discussion of points lately settled beyond dispute, such as the date of Werther, and the part of Marianne von Willemer in the Westöstlicher Divan. Were these superfluities omitted, but a small book of narrative, of actual communication, would remain. And in that small book much that is inaccurate will be noted.

Mr. Lyster seems to forget the share Carlyle and Mrs. Austen had in bringing Goethe to the notice of Englishmen, and in dispelling the mists of ignorance and prejudice in which Jeffrey and other reviewers of those days had helped to hide him from their eyes. A man who had never read Lewes's book might still have got a very fair notion of Goethe from Carlyle's various essays on him and his works in Fraser and The Foreign Quarterly Review and from Mrs. Austen's Goethe and his Contemporaries. Of Mr. Hayward's share in this work we regret to have to be at one with Mr. Lyster; and we regret it because Mr. Hayward by his translation of Faust has done in his time good service to German literature in England. But about Lewes's book we must take the liberty of disagreeing with Mr. Lyster; and we think he would have served Herr Düntzer better had he disparaged his English predecessor less. It is undoubtedly true that the German, writing after the Englishman, has found much more material to his hand, and in that respect he certainly has the advantage of him. But it is surely somewhat hard to quarrel with a man for attempting to settle matters of dispute which have been settled since he wrote. If still more material were hereafter to be discovered, and another biographer were to arise and give to the world these fresh discoveries, would Mr. Lyster think that a reason for disparaging Herr Düntzer's work? Thirlwall and Grote and Curtius have very materially helped to enlarge and clear our views of the Peloponnesian War; but that is not a reason for disparaging Thucydides. Mr. Freeman and Mr. Stubbs and Mr. Green have done much to make the early history of our country and people plain to us; but that is not a reason for disparaging the old chroniclers, both English and French, without whose labours neither Mr. Green, nor Mr. Freeman, nor Mr. Stubbs could have done all that they have done. Without Eckermann's record of his conversations what would any writer on Goethe, what would Herr Düntzer himself, have done? Yet they none of them have disparaged Eckermann. Lewes's book is very far indeed from being the last word on Goethe; but neither is Herr Düntzer's. He has added much to what Lewes could tell us; he has enabled us to set Lewes right on some points. His book, therefore, is a further contribution to our knowledge of Goethe, and a valuable contribution. But it will not supersede Lewes's book; it will be read with it, but it will not, with Englishmen at least, supersede it. Indeed, we by no means feel certain that it will do so in Germany, where a translation of the English Life has already gone through no less than fourteen editions, and is still said to be considered the best that has as yet been written in any language. And in proposing to wipe the English book from off the face of the earth, and to put the German in its stead once and for all, Mr. Lyster has not done his author such good service as he wished. He has led us to expect too much. Who turns to read the book after reading its praise in the preface will be disappointed.

There are two particular reasons why we think the supremacy of Herr Düntzer's book will not be so readily granted among our own countrymen as Mr. Lyster requires; other readers may find more, but two strike us as capital. In the first place, the book is not so much a biography as materials for a biography. Of the writer's industry in collecting and verifying his materials it is impossible to speak too highly; but of his skill in arranging them it is still less possible to speak politely. Some people, says Dr. Johnson, "imagine themselves writing a life when they exhibit a chronological series of actions or preferments." Herr Düntzer seems to be very much of a mind with some people. His translator praises his "precision and fulness of detail." Of the latter there can be no question; but in the record of a life of such magnitude, both in years and work, as Goethe's, there must be something more than mere verbal and historical precision. Without precision of method and arrangement the qualities Mr. Lyster praises are in themselves confusing. He praises the book, moreover, as one "to refer to and find in"; but in a biography of a great man which is to supersede all others one expects something more than this; one expects that the book shall be pleasant to read as well as useful for reference. Such a book this is not, unless it has been sadly marred in the translation, which, as we have said, we do not take to be the case. There is fortunately a very copious index, but without this the book would be a difficult one indeed "to refer to and find in." We can honestly say that we have read it through from the first page to the last, and the idea left with us as we closed it was certainly very far from luminous. A confused notion of many things we had, some fresh, more familiar; but of a clear coherent narrative of the life and work of one man progressing from the beginning through its various phases to the end, notions we had none. All the details, from the greatest to the least, of the eighty-three years during which Goethe walked this earth are thrown pell-mell together in these two volumes, in chronological order indeed, but in no other sort of order —"a mighty maze of words without a plan." So undigested a mass chopped up into little jerky inconsequent sentences makes, it must be owned, terribly hard reading. We will take a passage as a sample; any passage almost will do. Here is one from Vol. II. p. 315:—

> From Heidelberg Mannheim was visited, and on the return to Frankfurt Goethe was accompanied by Sulpiz Boisserée to Darmstadt on Sunday, October 9. The time in Frankfurt was again spent delightfully in a large circle of friends. During his absence in Heidelberg Willemer had married Marianne. Goethe was their very frequent and welcome guest. On October 18, 1814, many beacon-fires, commemorating the battle of Leipzig, blazed on the hills round Frankfurt. From a tower in Willemer's vineyard Goethe and his two friends saw the spectacle. On October 19 Frankfurt was illuminated. Next day Goethe left his native city rich in memories of happy friendship.

This is easy writing enough, but it certainly goes to prove the truth of Sheridan's saying when it forms the most part of nine hundred pages of tolerably close print.

The other stumbling-block is the attitude of adoration Herr Düntzer assumes towards Goethe. Germans have generally been divided into two sharply-defined classes; they have either praised him or blamed him too much. On one side we find Grimm declaring him to be "the greatest poet of all times and of all peoples"; on the other, Tieck sneering at Faust and rating it immeasurably below Manfred! Herr Düntzer touches but little on the intellectual side of his hero. "His literary works are noticed as golden fruit that grew and ripened on the profuse and splendid tree, his life, but there is no attempt to fix their artistic value, or measure their spiritual contents by analysis." These are the Professor's own words, and seeing that he does once break out into rapture over the "artistic perfection and the clear truthfulness of sentiment" of Werther, this abstinence is perhaps well. But he makes up for it on the moral side. In his eyes Goethe could do, and did do, no wrong. His passion for Charlotte von Stein was nothing but "a love of soul for soul," his intercourse with Christiane Vulpius is called "a marriage of conscience," all his various "philanderings," indeed, are explained by the fact that "he always needed a number of feminine hearts, of more or less personal interest to him, in which to mirror himself." Of his treatment of poor Friederike his biographer has something more to say (vol. i. pp. 146-7):—

In this strait, to which his heedlessness had brought him, he gave up the happiness of his heart to save his intellectual development—infinitely painful as it was to sacrifice with his own happiness that of the tender sick girl who loved him, and who, he felt, could never belong to any other. It was a hard struggle. From the first there was no doubt of the issue; but still it was hard. . . . Wolfgang with bleeding heart gave up Friederike that he might not lose himself. It was his first great renunciation—in truth a tragic one; for one of the noblest women—one worthy of the highest happiness—was almost heart broken by it.

Now all this, if Mr. Lyster will pardon us, is assuredly what Sir Hugh would have denounced as "affectations." It is of a piece with that claim to be considered "the model of a perfectly wise and virtuous man" which Professor Blackie set up the other day for Goethe. It is impossible for Englishmen, even if it be possible for Germans, to view Goethe's attitude towards the various women whom, even to the very close of his life, he required to "mirror himself in," without irritation, and something very like contempt. The very greatness of the man makes his folly, to give it no harsher term, and the maudlin sentimentality with which he strove to adorn it, the more deplorable; as Paul de Saint-Victor has said of his occasional fits of dulness—the very height from which he pours it down, does but make its weight greater. It is quite possible to put all these matters aside while considering Goethe as the great man he is, not only for his own countrymen, but for all. For our own part, we should be very well pleased never to hear another word of Charlotte von Stein, or Christiane Vulpius, or of any of those "feminine hearts of more or less personal interest," again. But, if they must be brought into the record, and in a biography of this minuteness perhaps they must, they and Goethe's relations with them must take their proper place. Apart from his intellectual greatness, Goethe, as a man, had many qualities we may sincerely praise. His noble freedom from all the petty jealousies and meannesses so sadly common to the literary character would alone serve to make him admirable; he was an untiring and a generous friend; he always wished to see the best and not the worst of those with whom he came in contact. But he had his defects. We may ignore them if we like; but to try, as Herr Düntzer tries, and as others before him have tried, to turn them into virtues, to give them a moral and intellectual colouring, is folly, or worse than folly. Such attempts only irritate without convincing; they only force us to recall the truth we should be perfectly willing to forget. Lewes treats these episodes with perfect fairness; he neither condones nor unduly castigates them. It is for this reason, if for no other, that we would sooner place his book than Herr Düntzer's in the hands of one who had no previous knowledge of the subject. At the same time, we have no wish to detract from the usefulness of the latter. As a book of reference for dates and facts it must always be of value to the student of Goethe's life and character, who knows the truth too well to be misled by its extravagant adoration. But the faults we have indicated must, in our opinion, keep it from that pedestal of supremacy to which Mr. Lyster has unwisely wished to raise it.

THE REVISION REVISED.*

THE controversial powers of Dean Burgon, whether for attack or for defence, will not be disparaged by those who have had the smallest experience of them. He never takes up his pen until he is thoroughly in earnest, and the force of conviction which blinds him at times to the strong parts of an antagonist's case enables him to state his own with clearness of expression and a vigour of thought which not unseldom rises to the dignity of passion. The volume we are about to notice affords us a conspicuous example both of the writer's characteristic excellences and of his besetting faults. It is likely enough that the Revised Version of the New Testament, however it had been executed, would have met with no very cordial reception from the Dean of Chichester. He takes care to remind us of a circumstance which after the lapse of twelve years might possibly have been forgotten, that he had addressed an "earnest Remonstrance and Petition," in 1872, to the Chairman of the New Testament Company, entitled, "An Unitarian Reviewer of our Authorized Version intolerable," and had been especially scandalized at the reception of the Holy Communion by this Unitarian member at the hands of Dean Stanley in Henry VII.'s Chapel on the first day of the Company's entering upon its labours, June 22, 1870 (pp. 505-8). Whatever may be said in favour of the inclusion of the Unitarian in a Company formed on the broadest possible basis, there can be little doubt that his participation in the highest act of Catholic worship was a grave error, to be visited, not on his fellow-revisers, who then knew him neither by sight nor by repute, but exclusively on the participator, or perhaps on one other person no longer among us to answer for himself. All these evil and ill-omened memories of a discussion rather suspended than exhausted would naturally have made Dean Burgon the more slow to recognize the excellency of the New Version, had its intrinsic merits commended themselves ever so much to his taste and judgment. Its warmest friends, however, would readily confess that the Translation, as compared with our Authorized Bible, presents many vulnerable points which its authors hardly cared to make even a show of defending. To say nothing about manifest oversights and imperfections, which steal into every work of human skill, the translators appear to have adopted a principle which is in the main a good one, though it may easily be carried to excess, that of handling every word or sentence so as to satisfy their own minds that they have done their best for it, and then throwing the fruit of their ten years' labour upon the world, to take its own chance for good or ill, almost without explanation or apology from them. We doubt not that they counted the cost of such a method of procedure, and anticipated for their work much such a reception as it has in fact met with. Opponents may call them rash, but unintelligent never.

The three articles reprinted from the Quarterly Review, and now formally acknowledged by Dean Burgon, were published respectively in October 1881 (only five months after the Revised Version had appeared), in January and April 1882. Their authorship could not have been doubtful for a moment. Such wide and exact learning, such sparkling wit and unsparing logic, such joy in the fray and confidence in victory as if already won, could not be easily matched elsewhere among living writers; Swift, thoroughly purged of his filth, is the readiest parallel which occurs to us, and Swift excelled our modern Dean in the one quality of pungent brevity. Beyond question these articles made a deep impression on the unlearned public, the plain men and women who hardly knew what to think of the strange form which their English New Testament had assumed, and were rather perplexed than instructed by the deluge of silly or superficial letters for and against its reception wherewith their newspapers and magazines overflowed from day to day. Each and all the articles in the Quarterly Review manifestly emanated from one who was full of the subject, who had completely made up his own mind, and could speak it in language to be well understanded of the people. On the many considerable changes made by the Revisers in consequence of their departure from the Greek text which underlies the Authorized, he has much to say, which we will touch upon hereafter so far as our space will permit. But the charge which Dean Burgon strives to prove against them in respect to their English version is far more easy to be apprehended by the general reader, and is likely to make a deeper impression upon him than any discussion of critical principles, however learned or exhausting. And the charge, as set forth in the fewest words, is this:—You have been set to do one thing, and you have done another. The fundamental resolution of the Convocation of Canterbury, on which the whole enterprise was grounded, declares that "we do not contemplate any new translation of the Bible or any alteration of the language, except when, in the judgment of the most competent scholars, such change is necessary." The Dean of Chichester, therefore, has a right to say, "The watch-word given to the company of Revisionists was 'NECESSITY'—Necessity was to determine whether they were to depart from the language of the Authorized Version or not, for the alterations were to be as few as possible" (p. 127). And to this principle the future Chairman of the Company, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, writing a month before the work was actually commenced, lends the high sanction of his full approval:—

The second leading principle was one which cannot be too strongly commended—to introduce as few alterations as may be into the current Version. On the precise nature and amount of the alterations that may from time to time be considered requisite, there will ever be varying opinions; but it certainly was a wise as well as a charitable principle to make as little alteration as possible in a Version which had been bound up with the devotional feelings of the people, at least as far as the hearing of the ear went.—Revision of English New Testament, p. 89, 1870.

Bishop Ellicott did well in making his reservation as to the varying opinions respecting the precise nature and amount of the alterations considered requisite, as well by reason of the nature of the case as from remembering the selfsame profession of the translators of the Authorized Version itself. "Truly," writes, in their names, Bishop Miles Smith, the author of the preface, himself one of their number, "truly, good Christian Reader, we never thought from the beginning that we should need to make a new translation, nor yet to make a bad one a good one . . . but to make a good one better, or out of many good ones one principal good one, not justly to be excepted against; that hath been our endeavour, that our mark." When we bear in mind that their Instructions had directed that the Bishops' Bible, as then read in churches, was to be followed by the translators of 1611, "and as little altered as the truth of the original would permit," and how largely was the restriction interpreted by them in practice, we cannot be much surprised that nearly the same language was employed by the present Bishop of Gloucester before experience of the nature of the task which his predecessor in the see had used after his work was done. The difference between the two cases is a wide one, being just this, that the Bishops' Bible represents a bad translation, and had never taken any real hold of the public mind (the citations from Scripture even in Bishop Miles Smith's preface are derived from the Genevan version, not from the Bishops'); the contrary is plainly true of the Authorized Bible of 1611.

The Revision Revised: Three Articles reprinted from the "Quarterly Review."* I. The New Greek Text. II. The New English Version. III. Westcott and Hort's New Textual Theory. To which is added a Reply to Bishop Ellicott's Pamphlet in defence of the Revisers and their Greek Text of the New Testament, including a vindication of the traditional reading of 1 Tim. iii. 16. By John William Burgon, B.D., Dean of Chichester. London: John Murray. 1883.

Hence we are not at all surprised that Dean Burgon presses his "watchword of Necessity" in his own vigorous style:—

Now it is idle to deny that this fundamental principle has been utterly set at defiance. To such an extent is this the case, that even an unlettered reader is competent to judge them. . . . It becomes clear that the Revised notion of Necessity is not that of the rest of mankind. But let the plain truth be stated. Certain of them, when remonstrated with by their fellows for the manifest disregard they were showing to the Instructions subject to which they had undertaken the work of Revision, are reported to have even gloried in their shame. The majority, it is clear, have even ostentatiously set those Instructions at defiance (p. 127).

Those that have taken the deepest interest in the work of Revision, and are the best disposed to accept the new version as a whole, are driven to confess that there is a world of truth involved in this racy and almost passionate denunciation. It is impossible for us to go into details, of which a mala copia will be found in the Dean's pages. Of rhythm, for which the translators of 1611 had such an exquisite ear, their successors would sometimes appear to have no sense whatever, or how, for example, could they have mangled that fine expression (Heb. iv. 16), "grace to help in time of need," by inserting the paltry word in italics, "grace to help us in time of need"? It is not often that we stumble upon a variation so completely gratuitous as the foregoing. The great mass of the Revisers' minute changes have some reason to plead for or excuse them, however slight that reason may be. We cannot often call them wrong, but simply not worth while, and under this comprehensive head we may fairly class nine of them out of every ten. But the chief mischief which threatens to mar the effect of much that is excellent in the new Revision was wrought not by incidental changes of words or clauses, but of deliberate purpose. Those who cared enough about the matter to look at the official reports in the daily papers of the work done from session to session could not fail to observe that after two separate revisions of the whole New Testament had been completed, the task of harmonizing was entered upon and lasted for the greater part of a year. Never was time spent to less purpose or with a more lamentable result on the poor victim of the Revisers' hapless pains. They had got in their grasp a proposition true in the main, and in their reckless zeal they rode it to death. They note in their preface what we all confess to be a main fault of the Authorized Version—namely, "that studied variety of rendering" in English the same Greek word, "even in the same chapter and context," a practice vindicated in the preface of 1611 by arguments one can hardly deem other than afterthoughts. In shunning this Scylla the Revisers of 1881 have fallen into Charybdis. It is not that they supposed that the English language always contains the exact counterparts of Greek words in the whole range of their meaning—they were far too good scholars to entertain such a notion—but that at first, perhaps through inadvertence, afterwards through a craving for consistency, they acted as if it were so, to the loss of rhythm and propriety of speech, occasionally in violation of good sense. Take for our instance a passage which has brought upon their heads the strong rough hand of Sir Edmund Beckett (2 Peter i. 7). In our ordinary Bibles the verse stands well enough:—"And [add] to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." But then our Revisers had determined to banish "charity" from the New Testament, and as a rendering for ἀγάπη to adopt "love" in all places, even in that glorious chapter 1 Cor. xiii. Even then the verse might not have been intolerable, but that a similar change must be made in φιλαδελφία, which cannot remain "brotherly kindness" here, inasmuch as in the other four places where it occurs (Rom. xii. 10; 1 Thess. iv. 9; Heb. xiii. 1; 1 Pet. i. 22) it is consistently rendered "love of the brethren." Thus the whole verse, by this process of harmonizing, is thus transformed by the Revisers, incredible as the fact might seem if it were not true:—"And [supply] in your godliness love of the brethren; and in your love of the brethren love." There are not, of course, in the New Version many things so bad as this, but then a little of this sort of thing is more than enough, and tends to throw into the shade merits which may even yet secure for the work an acceptance among patient judges which hitherto it has unfortunately failed to command. Indeed, in this particular, as in so many of the like kind, the very boldness of the Company in upholding what it regarded as right has brought upon it far more blame than praise. After all that has been alleged against that momentous change in the Lord's Prayer, "but deliver us from the evil one," respecting which our energetic Dean pronounces that "a more injudicious and unwarrantable innovation it would be impossible to indicate in any part of the present unhappy volume" (p. 214), we might fairly rejoin, "injudicious" perhaps or certainly, if immediate popularity had been what the Revisers cared for, but not "unwarrantable" even as the case is stated in the weighty plea set up for "evil" by Canon Cook of Exeter. The Greek Fathers knew of no other interpretation than the personal one, and with them it is not shameful to err.

In regard to the Greek standard which the Revisers had to translate, the Dean of Chichester seemed at first inclined to contend that they were bound to adhere to the text which the translators of the Authorized had before them, as formed by critics of the sixteenth century, and extant in the Complutensian Polyglott and in the several editions of Erasmus, Stephanus, and Beza. Since the fundamental vote of Convocation in February 10 and 11, 1870, made no mention of the original Greek, he judged that any meddling with the common Greek text was clearly to them ultra vires. Subsequent reflection appears to have suggested to him that a course of entire reserve or abstention in dealing with critical questions would have been simply suicidal on the Revisers' part, and that no version could now bear the light of day which should contain the interpolated words in 1 John v. 7, 8, and a few other well-known passages. Hence he is disposed not to insist too strictly on the omission in the vote of Convocation—an omission which was probably accidental—but tacitly permits it to be supplemented by one of the General Rules of the Joint Committee of both Houses entrusted with the task of co-opting associates and executing the whole work, which on May 25 voted as its Fourth Rule:—"That the text to be adopted be that for which the evidence is decidedly preponderating"; understanding by "decidedly preponderating" something widely different from what the Company has regarded as the meaning of that somewhat vague expression. Inasmuch as the public is informed in the Revisers' preface that "different schools of criticism have been represented" among them, "and have together contributed to the final result," Dean Burgon thinks it reasonable that no changes should have been made in the text save such as men of both schools were willing to assent to; these would have been far from few, yet hardly any of them of much doctrinal importance. The practice of the Company, as avowed by themselves, has been widely different from this. They deem the rule quoted above to be "in effect an instruction to follow the authority of documentary evidence without deference to any printed text of modern times, and therefore to employ the best resources of criticism for estimating the value of evidence"; an interpretation so far-fetched and unnatural as to remind a plain reader of the expansive glosses put upon their father's will by Peter, Martin, and John in A Tale of a Tub. This principle once settled, so far as a show of hands could settle it, the Company set to work to amend the Greek verse by verse before they proceeded to render it into English. By the time the revision of the New Testament was made there were considerably more than five thousand changes in the text used by the translators of the Authorized Bible, some of them so slight that they can barely be represented in any the most literal rendering; others, no doubt, of great consequence as regards the colour of the narrative or argument, though seldom touching very closely on doctrine. The then unpublished Greek New Testament of Dr. Hort and Canon Westcott, was from the first placed confidentially in the hands of their brother Revisers, as if to familiarize them with the nature and extent of the innovations to be from time to time proposed. We confess that we see nothing unfair in that procedure, and doubt whether it could have had much influence on the deliberations of the Company, which, after all, refused to follow the guidance of these great scholars in many of their chief departures from the received text (e.g. Luke xxii. 43, 44; xxiii. 34; John i. 18; iii. 13). Of their theory of criticism, its groundless surmises and arbitrary distinctions, it is impossible now to speak. A full half of Dean Burgon's bulky volume is taken up in a searching scrutiny of its principles and their results, and we cannot resist his general conclusion, sweeping as it is, that

Drs. Hort and Westcott, with the purest intentions and most laudable industry, have constructed a text demonstrably more remote from the Evangelic verity than any which has ever yet seen the light. To attempt, as they have done, to build the text of the New Testament on a tissue of unproved assertions and the eccentricities of a single codex of bad character [?], is about as hopeful a proceeding as would be the attempt to erect an Eddystone lighthouse on the Goodwin Sands.

We bid farewell to this very interesting work, certainly the most important contribution yet published to the literature which has gathered round the Revised Version, by transcribing the characteristic words in which its preface concludes. They are well worthy to be considered by statesmen and Churchmen alike. "Let me . . . in giving the present volume to the world, be allowed to request that it may be accepted as a sample of how Deans employ their time;—the use they make of their opportunities. Nowhere but under the shadow of a Cathedral (or in a College) can such laborious endeavours as the present pro Ecclesiâ Dei be successfully prosecuted."

MEN OF THE TIME.*

IT ought to be pretty well understood by this time, one would think, what is required of any man who undertakes to edit or to compile a biographical dictionary; but if any one to whom it is a matter of concern should lack the necessary information, let him refer to an article upon the subject in the current number of the Quarterly Review. The writer, it is true, refers more particularly to the ponderous tomes with which French encyclopædists have enriched our libraries, containing the lives of the illustrious dead of all ages. But none the less—indeed, it may be said, all the more—is it essential that the editor of a volume of Contemporary biography, should be a man of discernment, of wide general information, of proved literary skill, and, it would seem, of some sense of humour. Beyond this, it is evidently necessary that he should be a man of stern and unbending courage. There cannot be a doubt in the mind of any one who even superficially looks through the volume before us, that a very considerable number of the biographies are, in fact, autobiographies. Now to many men the allotment of ever so small a space in this "well-known book of reference" represents an appreciable instalment of Immortality. It requires both knowledge and courage in an eminent degree, to know what portions of an autobiography should be printed and what should be relentlessly "cut." Of course we speak of the ideal editor; for, truth to say, Mr. Thompson Cooper, F.S.A., does not appear to have troubled himself very much with considerations of the kind. If a portrait-painter informs him that he has painted so many thousand portraits, several hundreds of which have been engraved (representing an average of more than two a week for thirty years), or a well-known comic preacher states how many thousand people have passed through his vestry on Sunday evening to view Mazzini and Garibaldi relics previous to their deportation to the Alexandra Palace, down it goes. So it comes to pass that some of the lives are candid, concise, pithy, veracious, and models of what such things should be; some are prolix, redundant, inaccurate, misleading even when verbally accurate, turgid, and pretentious beyond description. Some are, of course, simply advertisements. There is no attempt at proportion between the services or position of a man and the length of his biography. To illustrate this we may note that, while to Mr. Gladstone—the main facts of whose career may be found in half a dozen other books—is allotted some ten columns (the largest space, in fact, in the volume), the second place, with eight columns, is given to General John Meredith Read, Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Redeemer of Greece, F.S.A., M.R.I.A., F.R.G.S., statesman and diplomatist. The next in order is Dr. William Howard Russell, while Prince Bismarck has to be content with five columns. No other living creature approaches these.

But there are stranger things than this. Some of our contemporaries have amused themselves and their readers with lists of eminent persons, amounting in all to nearly a couple of hundreds, whose names and biographies ought, in all reason, to be found recorded herein, and of others who are men of other times than those in which we live. Even among these claimants by proxy, we do not note the names of many whom we should have ourselves included, such as Canon Raine, the very learned antiquary, the Earl of Crawford, Mr. A. R. Colquhoun, the traveller, Mr. Clare S. Read, Mr. Smith of Coalville, Sir John Strachey, Mr. Broadhurst—in fact the list might be almost indefinitely extended. But after all, a book may claim to be judged as much by its contents as by its omissions, and if this one is measured by the pretensions set forth in the preface the result becomes even more astounding. It claims to be a record of the "Aristocracy of Intellect," as distinguished (by a sufficiently strange antithesis) from the aristocracy of birth, from the services, the professions, and others who have Peerages, Guides, Calendars, and Directories to register their proceedings.

Now it would be easy to fill several pages, in showing how far the claim for this volume to have undergone revision to the present date is justified, but upon this point we only propose to give a few instances of the kind of errors of which it is really full. Thus, Canon Barry is still, it seems, Principal of King's College, although his resignation was announced in August last. Moreover Mr. Wace is named elsewhere as Principal, and mention is made in Canon Westcott's biography of Dr. Barry's acceptance of a bishopric. Dr. Wallace is described as editor of the Scotsman, although Mr. C. A. Cooper is also said to have accepted that post in 1880. Mr. James Beal, who was born, we are told, in 1829, "took an active part in all the movements led by Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden." But elsewhere we read of Mr. Bright's share in the Reform movement of 1831-32, and in the Anti-Corn Law League in 1839. So that Mr. Beal's energy and regard for our welfare must have been as precocious as we all know it to be inexhaustible. Mr. Francis Trench is recorded as Vicar of Islip, a living which, in fact, he resigned in 1874. Mr. W. M. Johnson is still, it would seem, Solicitor-General for Ireland. We still read of Major Baring, Mr. W. H. Gregory, the Hon. C. P. Butt, Dr. Andrew Clark, &c. Among the great Mr. Belt's works are "the two Pageanti (sic) busts," and a memorial of "Professor Evans of Eton." Here we are obliged to pause, leaving a score or two of our corrigenda unmentioned.

Fully to make good our charge of prolixity we should soon exhaust our space. But we may give a few examples. The biography of a Mr. George R. Jesse is almost as amusing as Mr. Beal's. This eminent man, it appears, "has frequently contributed to the newspaper press in advocacy of the claim of the animal kingdom to justice and mercy at the hands of the human race. . . . In consequence of the controversies between Mr. Jesse and Dr. Ferrier, Dr. J. Crichton Browne, Dr. T. Lauder Brunton, Mr. [sic] T. Spencer Wells, Professor Owen, and Mr. Darwin, and other distinguished scientific men and members of the medical profession, Government now reverses the decisions of the Presidents of the Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons, and refuses point-blank to grant licences to some physiologists of widespread repute." This is followed by much more fustian of like sort. Besides the anti-Vivisectionists, the Browning Society has a good innings, under the heading of Mr. Browning, and not, as might have been supposed, among the achievements of Mr. Furnivall. There is a long exposition and recommendation of the Channel Tunnel under the name of Sir E. Watkin. Of Mr. William Allingham we hear that he has "three children, two boys and a girl, and resides at Witley, near Godalming, in Surrey." Is it in the interest of the public, or of Mr. W. M. Rossetti himself, that the editor (presumably) writes:—"Entertaining and expressing independent opinions on questions of art, literature, and other matters, Mr. Rossetti has frequently been in opposition to the drift of feeling at the moment, and has had the satisfaction of seeing, after a while, that public opinion came round much more nearly to what he had himself expressed" (sic). The notice of Mr. Gerald Massey ends abruptly thus:—"In 1873 he proceeded on the lecturing tour to the United States, when he gained an unenviable notoriety by the delivery of a blasphemous lecture entitled 'Why does not God kill the Devil?'"

A list of the illustrious obscure who figure in these pages would be at least as entertaining as those lists of the omissions to which we have referred. There is a Mr. Coke, whose only connexion with affairs is that "he acted as private secretary to the Right Hon. E. Horsman, while Chief Secretary for Ireland, 1855-57." We make no doubt that the motley crowd of provincial journalists, "antiquarians," and others who would be village Hampdens if occasion should arise, are doing excellent work in their honourable callings; but in a work of this pretension we could well afford to spare a great many biographies which are inserted. It is impossible to show the length to which this kind of thing is carried without an extract or two. There is a long account of a Mr. Thomas Davidson, who, by the way, does not even appear to be entitled even to the F.L.S. initials. This gentleman "was no less devoted to philosophy than to art. Despairing of the former in all its more approved expositors, he betook himself with assiduity to the writings of Antonio-Rosmini-Serbati, a Tyrolese priest—at one time minister to Pope Pius IX. Shortly afterwards Mr. Davidson produced a work in English . . . which lays bare the grounds of reasonable belief. Kant, Hegel, Comte, are declared to be inferior by many degrees to the orthodox Christian priest of the Tyrol. Mr. Davidson's work excited the greatest interest in philosophical circles, especially among Materialists, whose doctrines are combated with acknowledged acumen." Then there is the Rev. James Clark, M.A., Ph.D. "In 1867 Dr. Clark, after some Latin correspondence with the University of Göttingen, received a rescript from Professor Dr. Lotze, then Dean of the Philosophical Faculty, in the names of all the deans of faculties, authorizing under the seal of the University the revival of academic hoods. In 1869, after having held various important parochial cures, Dr. Clark . . . . conducted extensive correspondence with Dutch and German theologians, as the representative on the Continent of the Anglican and International Christian Moral Science Association." What became, or was intended to become, of this great enterprise we are not told, for next we learn that in 1876 its projector "was appointed rector of St. Philip, Antigua." And here his biographer leaves him. We have also a long account of a gentleman who, in 1836, "was selected to establish and manage the Ashton, Staleybridge, Hyde, and Glossop Bank, in the county of Lancaster, which he successfully accomplished. . . . In 1880 he purchased the estate of Greenlaw, near Castle Douglas, formerly the seat and property of the Viscounts Kenmure, whose fourth lord died there in 1863 at the old fortress, the remains of which still exist. In 1881 he was placed in the commission of the peace for Kirkcudbrightshire, and in 1882 the Earl of Selkirk, with the approval of Her Majesty, appointed him a deputy lieutenant of the same county." Even Mr. Dick's powers of inclusion were nothing to this. We have only space for one more extract. It respects Mr. John Wilson Ross, "formerly Vendue Master of Berbice," who has since "devoted himself to literary pursuits," whose "most remarkable periodical contribution was 'The Doctrine of the Chorizontes,' in the Edinburgh Review (April 1871), in which he endeavoured to show that the Odyssey must have been written at least three centuries after the Iliad; but perhaps his best book is Tacitus and Bracciolini, in which he brings forward evidence tending to show that Poggio Bracciolini wrote the Annals of Tacitus."

We had marked other passages for extraction and comment, but we must come to an end. Our readers can now judge for themselves how far this roll-call of the "Aristocracy of Intellect" fulfils its promise. It appears to us, in almost every conceivable quality, to fall lamentably short of what such a volume should, and, with small additional pains in good hands, might very easily, be. Mr. Cooper has collected a vast mass of materials, of varying interest and value, and over them he has exercised no sort of arrangement, supervision, or censorship. We are bound to say that the dates (a very important item) are mostly correct; at least we have only discovered a few trivial mistakes that may be the printer's. In other respects "this well-known book of reference" has contrived to exhaust almost all the forms of human error and infirmity to which such an enterprise is liable.

SOME SCHOOLBOOKS.

EVERY ONE who is acquainted with Mr. Aldis Wright's Bible Word-Book (1) will be glad to hear of the issue of a second and revised edition. It needs no recommendation, and the only wonder is that nearly eighteen years should have passed before a second edition was called for. But a passage in the preface would seem to imply that it is the leisure of the editor rather than the demand of the public which has been wanting. It is no ill compliment to Mr. Wright, Secretary of the Revision Company though he has been, to hope that it will be very long before the general use of the Revised Version makes his glossary obsolete. Dr. Plummer's edition of the Epistles of St. John (2) is worthy of its companions in the "Cambridge Bible for Schools" Series. The subject, though not apparently extensive, is really one not easy to treat, and requiring to be treated at length, owing to the constant reference to obscure heresies in the Johannine writings. Dr. Plummer has done his exegetical task very well, but it may be permitted to doubt whether his general remarks on the entirely "obsolete" character of Gnosticism in his introduction are quite justified. Hegel on the one side and Schopenhauer on the other have very considerable affinities with the little known, but most interesting, heresiarchs of the first and second centuries, and Hegel and Schopenhauer are certainly not dead to-day.

Perhaps Mr. Chinnock may not be best pleased to see his translation of Arrian (3) classed among schoolbooks, but in these days there is not much demand on the part of the general reader for translations of what may be called the second-class classics, and the book is excellently suited for a very important school use—the giving out of passages for retranslation, to be done in school. For Arrian is not very commonly read, and his Greek is good enough, but not too good, for this purpose. Mr. Chinnock has added occasional notes, some of which, bearing on points of scholarship which do not affect the translation, rather puzzle us. For if they are not superfluous there should be many more of them. For the purpose we have mentioned the book is worth the attention of schoolmasters who have not time or inclination to prepare their own passages. A school edition of Thucydides (4) naturally exposes itself to a severe test. It is almost inevitable that the editor should seem to give too little assistance for mere schoolboys, and not to enter into points of scholarship sufficiently for undergraduates reading for honours. In his notes Mr. Dougan has somewhat imitated the shorthand style of Krüger, but he has hardly achieved the "matterful" suggestiveness of that original commentator. Personally we should say that if Thucydides's work is cut up at all, it is a pity not to give the whole Sicilian story together. And we have noticed one very odd clerical error; the statement that "the rarer form in -θησομαι is avoided in classical Latin"—which it certainly is. As Mr. Dougan will doubtless be glad to correct this, he will find it on page 161. The system which Mr. Hardy has adopted in his The Satires of Juvenal (5) (he might as well have called it Thirteen Satires of Juvenal as he does in his Latin title, for II., VI., and IX. are omitted altogether, though a cento of the sixth might certainly have been given with advantage) is to cut up the text with English "cross-headings" of argument. It is certain that this is a great assistance to the duller sort of boy, who is frequently hopelessly puzzled by Juvenal's abrupt turns and transitions, and who bores through his twenty lines or whatever it may be without a glimmering of the general drift. The notes are abundant, if anything too abundant, and they are supplemented by a glossary of rarer words. This argues a still further forgetfulness on the part of the editor that no school edition ought to spare the boy those "great blows of the dictionary" which are the most valuable part of classical study. It is only when, after he has hit hard with his dictionary, the enemy is likely still to resist him that the commentator should strike in. In Mr. Shindler's edition of the Hiero (6), there is one great mechanical advantage—it is interleaved. We should like to see this universal in all books intended for other than the lowest forms. It necessitates duplicate copies for "hearing," but the cheap German texts without notes supply these at an infinitesimal expense. The notes here are very fair; but Mr. Shindler has had the odd idea of first expurgating the tractate, and then adding a couple of pages of notes at the end on the expurgated passages, which notes he thoughtfully says can be "torn out when the book is used in schools." This is Bowdlerism in excelsis. The Selections of Martial (7) which Professors Sellar and Ramsay have prepared deserve hearty welcome. They are without notes, but have an excellent introduction, of which it is sufficient to say that it seems to be expanded from Professor Sellar's excellent but all too brief article on "Martial" in the Encyclopædia Britannica. It would be a good deed if Professor Sellar would give us a complete edition properly annotated of the prince of epigrammatists. After all, the classics were not made for schoolboys only. Mr. Page's First Book of Horace's Odes (8) in Messrs. Macmillan's elementary series is very neat in form, and the notes are usually accurate. But there is rather too much translation, and our enemy the vocabulary reappears. We notice Mr. Belcher's "Key" (9) merely to have an opportunity of renewing a protest against the whole generation of Keys. Even for the small and, in these days of schools, evening classes, lectures, correspondence classes, and so forth, constantly dwindling class, of purely and compulsorily self-taught students, they are more of a snare than a help. And wherever there is a teacher they are inexcusable.

If Miss Crofts's book on Elizabethan literature (10) is a fair sample of the average Newnham lecture (the author tells us that its substance was delivered there), the teaching in that establishment must be very good teaching. The ground is well covered, if not quite completely; and the sole fault we can find with Miss Crofts is that she has been too modest, and has borrowed from the baser sex dicta which we feel certain she could have improved upon had she trusted her own critical powers. Thus, for instance, we have the utmost respect for Mr. Lowell. But, if he ever really described Chaucer as "showing the first result of the Roman yeast on the home-baked Saxon loaf," he said a very silly thing. The only result that moist yeast—Roman, German, or any other—could have on a home-baked loaf of any nationality would be to make it wet, nasty, and, after a time, mouldy; while if it were dry yeast it would produce no result at all. It surely cannot be customary in America to put the yeast in after the loaf is baked? At any rate, it is not English housewifery, and the damsels of Newnham should not be brought up to it. But from a literary point of view Miss Crofts is an unexceptionable teacher when she does not borrow, and sometimes when she does. Miss Yonge's editions of Shakespeare for primary schools (11) are well devised. The necessary expurgating is done delicately, and the notes are sufficient and judicious. English parsing (12) is very debatable matter, and this is not the place to debate it. If any fault in particular, as opposed to general, can be found with Mr. Adams's book, it is that parsing lessons, if given at all, should pretty certainly be given on reading lessons, and not apart from them. Mr. Mason's reductions of grammar (13) to the simplest terms deserve mention as at least the work of an experienced compiler of this class of book. Such an explanation as "When I say Smith is the strongest boy in the class, I mean that Smith has most of the quality of strength" might be the text for a long sermon. But here, again, this is not the pulpit.

The writer who calls himself "Oxon" (14) deserves credit for industry and a certain originality in the art of cram. Here is a specimen of his pages:—

PITT v. GRENVILLE.

A. Intellect.

PITT.—	GRENVILLE.—
(1) In no branch of learning had accurate knowledge.	(1) Was an industrious and accurate lawyer.
(2) Knew nothing of finance.	(2) Understood the financial system of the country thoroughly.
(3) Never mastered the rules of the House of Commons.	(3) Knew them so well that he was fit to be Speaker.
(4) Was a brilliant and fascinating speaker.	(4) Made sensible but dull and tedious speeches.

B. Character.

i. Neither cared to get nor keep money.	i. Was grasping and close.
ii. Was excitable, keen, sanguine, and sensitive to insult.	ii. Was stern, melancholy, and gloomy in his forebodings.
iii. Was the idol of millions.	iii. Was unpopular.

C. Views of the Situation.

a. Could only see trophies.	a. Could only see the bill.
b. Boasted of victories all over the world.	b. Groaned at borrowing eight millions a year.

When Lord Egremont died, Bute advised the King to ask Pitt to form a Ministry; but he soon after changed his mind, and so the Bedford Ministry was formed.

Any one can see the objections, independent of those against the general process of masticating and digesting intellectual food ready for the feeders, to this. The author is obliged to put sharply and dogmatically conclusions which are often very dubious, and for which, even when they are not, the learner ought to have premisses impossible to give in such a shape. It should be said that "Oxon" suggests the application of his plan to "leading articles in the Times." Unless we mistake, one of the "Society Papers" once tried something of the kind. The Growth of the English Colonies (15) is a smaller and a less out-of-the-way but a much sounder and more useful book.

Mr. Blakiston, after a fashion now not uncommon nowadays, has broken up his Glimpses of the Globe (16) into Readers suitable for the different code-standards. They are freely illustrated, which is a good point in them. The Countries of Europe (17) contains matter for Standard Five which is both useful and interesting, though in parts the style might be improved. The book is of the class of our old friend Near Home.

Mr. Clapin's introduction to the ever-welcome Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (18) is a little thin. No one can find any fault with the authorities (Mr. Besant and Janin) from whom he acknowledges it to be drawn. But surely an editor of Molière might be expected to go a little nearer the fountain-head, especially as neither of his authorities professed to write a book of reference. So long as this third and fourth-hand fashion of treating modern classics prevails, so long will it be impossible to make a "modern" education solid. Mr. Clapin's notes are good and sufficient. In the case of Lamartine's "Stonemason" (19) M. Boielle's introduction is thinner than Mr. Clapin's, and his notes far inferior. What is the conceivable use of putting "Douter, Lat. dubitare" at the foot of a page? M. Lemaistre's French for Beginners (20) takes fair rank among a class of books the demand for which is infinite, and which may very well be varied by fresh hands from time to time. In M. Massé's Grammar of Colloquial French (21) there is much that is good, but we are unable to admit the title. A grammar limited to colloquial French would, if possible, be useless as a schoolbook, and a grammar not so limited need not call itself by so misleading a name. That the name is misleading common sense and the merest glance at the book shows. We open it at hazard, and we find as an example:—"César introduisit le gouvernement monarchique à Rome." The fact is doubtful; but, if this is a colloquialism, Rollin's History might be described as a colloquy.

A sixpenny Primer of Chemistry (22), by Dr. Odling, carries its recommendation in its description. No better man and no cheaper price could be asked for.

Mr. Wolstenholme apologizes for the ample annotation which he has given to some contemporary historical sketches in German (23). The apology is not needed until we come to the annotation itself. Then unfortunately we find that the commentary, as is too usual, is swollen by the old fault of incorporating the dictionary and the grammar in it. The following, for instance, is not a note at all:—"Buntgestreift, 'bunt,' many-coloured, variegated, gay. Also simply 'coloured,' in contrast with black and white. Streif, stripe." It is merely an illegitimate confusion of the duties of the annotator and the lexicographer. But the critic who repeats this evident truth seems to lose his labour altogether. The incompetence of editors, the carelessness of teachers, and the laziness of pupils conspire to multiply the wrong sort of editing. Mr. Wolstenholme's commentary is not all of this bad kind, but too much of it is. Mr. Cartmell's reissue of Dr. Wagner's edition of Hermann und Dorothea (24) is much freer from this defect, but not quite free. It is, however, on the whole a very good piece of work. So also is Mr. Sheldon's Maria Stuart (25), in which we only miss a sufficient critical appreciation of the play. The space occupied by an index to the notes—a thing perfectly useless in a schoolbook and a mere concession to a passing fashion—had much better have been given to this. But there is no other important omission, and the ample historical elucidations in the notes deserve special praise. On the other hand, here as elsewhere, the etymology craze reappears. Why specially tell a student of Schiller what Whitney thinks and what Skeat thinks of the definition of Himmel? If this is done, why not tell him what Whitney and Skeat think of the definition of every word in the play?

REVIEWERS are beginning to fight shy of éditions de luxe, and readers will find this splendid "handbook" somewhat unmanageable. It is too heavy to hold in the hands; it is too short and thick to lie pleasantly on a table; if it is put on a "literary machine," it tumbles off, and it is too small to read when it is laid on one's knees. It has a parchment back, so one dare not hold it in the middle; and from its thickness it is a handful, or rather two handfuls, when held at the sides. It contains fifty-two original etchings, which at first sight appear very exquisite; but they are so minute that they require a magnifying glass, and when submitted to that trying ordeal they scarcely realize one's anticipations, although there is great merit in them. The paper is splendid, and the margins are very wide, but the type is small; and, while one's wrists and eyes ache, it is annoying to reflect that the book might be much lighter even if the print were much larger. This professes to be the first complete and unabridged translation of the Physiologie du Goût, and it is decidedly a good one. In a book containing so many technical expressions there are doubtless some renderings that will not satisfy all critics, and there are in this translation a few obvious mistakes; but, taken as a whole, the work has been well done.

The aphorisms in the Physiologie du Goût are often racy and poignant; but the general style of the book is too wordy to be suited to the taste of the present day. Many people who have been amused by crisp quotations from this work may be somewhat disappointed when they attempt to read it from end to end. It is rather a book to turn over for a few minutes than one to read at for a long time together. Indeed we may go so far as to say of this particular edition that its weight is well calculated; for when one's wrists begin to ache it is time to shut up the book; but if he uses it in this manner, the reader will often be glad to reopen it. Let no one suppose that this Handbook of Gastronomy is in any sense of the word a cookery book. Brillat-Savarin would have terrified any ordinary cook without instructing him. This is the way in which he begins to teach his own cook how to fry:—"The liquids that you expose to the action of fire cannot all be charged with the same quantity of heat; nature has given them all various properties, and this is an order of things of which nature alone has the secret, and which is called 'capacity for caloric'"; and he ends by warning him that "prolonged heat develops an empyreumatic and disagreeable taste, produced by some parts of the parenchyma, of which it is difficult to get rid, and which becomes carbonized." Yet this chapter on the theory of frying is worthy of careful study, and it makes us wish that the author had gone as carefully into the questions of roasting, boiling, and baking. There are not many receipts, properly so called, in the whole book, but here and there we meet with one or two. The author was evidently very proud of his own method of making a fondue, which he calls "a wholesome, savoury, and appetizing dish"; and after giving details of its manufacture, he adds that if it "be placed on the table in a hot dish, and if some of the best wines be produced, and the bottle pass pretty freely, a marvellous effect will be exhibited." Savarin sometimes contrived to get good feeding under adverse circumstances, and he gives a recipe for cooking eggs with gravy, which might prove useful in difficulties. He learned it in the following manner. He once arrived at an inn where nothing could be obtained except some eggs, as the cook said that a succession of travellers had eaten all before them. Nevertheless, a "most beautiful leg of mutton" was turning on the spit, but this belonged to three Englishmen, who had brought it with them. Savarin asked the cook whether he would poach his eggs in the gravy which fell from the mutton. The cook replied that, as the gravy was his perquisite, he could easily grant this favour, and began at once to break the eggs. While he was thus occupied, Savarin quietly opened his knife and made a dozen deep cuts in the leg of mutton, through which the gravy ran to the last drop; and, as soon as his eggs were poached in this rich sauce, he carried off both eggs and gravy in triumph, and enjoyed "the very substance of the leg of mutton," while the three John Bulls had "the trouble of masticating the residue." This is one of the latest recorded repues franches which seem to satisfy French ideas of legitimate joking better than English. One of the most elaborate prescriptions is for the preparation of a tunny-omelette, a dish which we have not had the pleasure of tasting. It consists mainly of an ordinary omelette beaten up with tunny fish mixed with carp roe. This dish is so excellent that it should be reserved for guests who "understand what they are eating, and do not eat in a hurry"; and, like all the good things that he recommends, he suggests that "it be especially washed down with some first-rate old wine, and you will see something wonderful." He seems to consider a pheasant the most difficult of all creatures to cook. Only a born gourmand can divine the exact moment at which to cook it at all. Decomposition must have set in—it was said that Savarin used to carry his game in his own pockets in order to facilitate this process—and it must be precisely the moment at which it combines the flavours of venison and chicken. Even then it will not be eatable unless stuffed with the flesh of two woodcocks, carefully truffled, and placed upon a large piece of toast spread with a paste made of "the trails and livers" of the woodcocks and saturated with the dripping of the pheasant itself. Then, if it is well cooked, and some bitter oranges are put round it, it will be "worthy of being served up to angels," especially if it is washed down "with some of the best wine of Upper Burgundy."

The method of treating small birds is much more simple. Few people, he tells us, know how to eat them, but the following is the proper method. "Take the plump little bird by the beak, sprinkle over him a little salt, take out the gullet, pop him skilfully into your mouth, bite him off close to the fingers, and chew it with might and main; you will have enough juice to flood the whole organ, and you will taste a pleasure unknown to the vulgar." There are small birds called fig-peckers, that have "a unique flavour so exquisite that, when they are eaten, all the organs of taste are brought into play, fully occupied, and wholly beatified." A very simple recipe for cooking meat was given to the author by one of his guests. "Cut a steak, salt it, put it between your horse's back and your saddle, and have a good gallop, at the end of which you will "have a dinner fit for a prince." He might have added, "and you will have a horse with a sore back." The chapter on corpulence proves that there was no great novelty in the system of the late Mr. Banting, and here we may learn not only how to get thin, but also how to get fat. John Sobieski is quoted as the most notable example of a corpulent hero. The author believed that literary men, to a great extent, owe their style to the condition of their digestions, and the whole process of digestion interests him so much that he describes it at great length. The only point of table etiquette on which he lays any stress is that guests ought to show signs of admiration and eagerness when dishes of unusual excellence are laid upon the table. On the other hand, if anything goes wrong with the dinner, they should look intensely disappointed. Those who fail in either of these particulars are not worthy of being invited a second time. It is "good form" to eat something from every dish, and to ask for everything that lies on the table, dessert included.

The author notices the curious fact, that before an important dinner many people always eat a gross of oysters—144, and yet eat none the less afterwards. He had a certain friend who used to complain that he could never get what we will call "his fill" of oysters—he used a more graphic expression. Determining to supply this want, the author invited him to dinner; but, when the man had eaten his thirty-second dozen, his host became so weary of doing nothing, that he said, "'My dear fellow, it is your destiny to-day not to eat your "fill" of oysters; let us now have some dinner.' We did so, and he behaved as vigorously as a man who had been fasting." Surely we must have degenerated in these days! Savarin writes at great length in favour of the wholesomeness of truffles; and, in proof of this theory, he quotes a certain Dr. Melouet, who "used to swallow enough" truffles "to give an indigestion to an elephant; yet lived till eighty-six." He also defends chocolate against the charge of over-richness; and he says, that if those who say that a cup of chocolate in a morning makes them bilious would only eat a heavy breakfast with it, they would have no further cause of complaint, and would feel as ready as usual for their midday meals. Chocolate, again, he recommends as a preventive of corpulence; but he warns people strongly against giving coffee to children. He tells us that neither coffee, sugar, nor tobacco was used in Europe until the seventeenth century; and that the secret of distillation only became generally known about the same time. Everybody may not be aware that turkeys were first introduced into Europe by the Jesuits.

The distinctions between the pleasures of simple eating and those of the table are drawn with solemn elaboration. While "the pleasure of eating requires, if not hunger, at least appetite, the pleasure of the table is most often independent of both." But it is on the after effects of the pleasures of the table that the author dwells with the greatest satisfaction. "In fact, at the end of a good dinner, both body and soul enjoy a particular happiness." Yet he maintains that "taste is not so richly endowed as hearing," and he considers mankind to be "much better organized for sorrow than for pleasure." Taste, however, he believes to be the sense which procures for us the greatest number of enjoyments:—

1°. Because the pleasure of eating is the only one that, taken in moderation, is never followed by fatigue;

2°. Because it belongs to all times, all ages, and all conditions;

3°. Because it occurs necessarily at least once a day, and may be repeated without inconvenience two or three times in this space of time;

4°. Because it may be combined with all our other pleasures, and even console us for their absence;

5°. Because the impressions it receives are at the same time more durable and more dependent on our will;

6°. Finally, because in eating we receive a certain indefinable and special comfort, which arises from the intuitive consciousness that we repair our losses and prolong our existence by the food we eat.

Having said so much on behalf of the pleasures of eating, it naturally follows that he should regard gourmandise as a most important science, and that he should consider that, "from whatever point of view" it "is examined, it deserves nothing but praise and encouragement." Moreover, after enlarging upon the physical advantages of gourmandise, he proceeds to say that "morally it shows implicit resignation to the commands of the Creator, who, in ordering man to eat that he may live, invites him to do so by appetite, encourages him by flavour, and rewards him by pleasure." Now we had already heard of the virtues of those who feed others, but we read for the first time in the Physiologie du Goût of the piety of those who feed themselves. To represent greediness as devotion is "going rather far." There is something pretty in the old idea that Fra Angelico and other pious artists prayed with their paint brushes, but there is scarcely so much pathos in the notion of a gourmand praying with a pâté de foie gras. Yet opinions may possibly vary on this point, and whatever may be its faults, the Physiologie du Goût is, and will probably long remain, a standard book. Therefore, to Englishmen who know but little French and can stand a good deal of coarseness, we would say, read A Handbook of Gastronomy, and, as Brillat-Savarin himself would put it, "you will see something wonderful."

RECENT VERSE.*

THE critic who surveys the heaven of contemporary poetry in the hope of seeing "some new planet swim into his ken" is constantly baffled by mere emanations of the marsh or the transient splendours of the penny squib. He suffers continual disappointment. Yet the honour of discovery gives zest to the search, and ensures his alertness. The present vacuity of the horizon favours the modest ascension of the coming bard; the hour is propitious, but the new poet lingers in the under-world. Still the bulk of recent verse continues to be of the old familiar type—vapid, insincere, pretentious, deficient in inspiration, and void of imagination. Mr. Pitchford's handsome volume is quite seductive externally, but its contents would be more fittingly bound in homiletic black. The Morning Song is a blank-verse poem of some eleven thousand lines, very pious in tone, exemplary in teaching, and insufferably prolix. Its didacticism is that of the last century. It suggests Hayley and The Course of Time and Night Thoughts. Wandering through its tortuous maze the reader strays upon many an excellent precept and ancient platitude dear to his youth; its morality is unimpeachable, its versification is correct, but its poetry consists of this:—

> Humanity hath fallen off from God,
> Like some fair branch that withers on the ground,
> Torn from its parent-tem, weeping its life.
> Man's sorrows have their deep significance,
> Their noble origin. Yet even here
> Goodwill is seen; the fallen are not lost;
> For He hath hedged the sinner's path with thorns,
> Embittered the false cup of sinful joy,
> And interposed to check the swift descent
> To evil, lest that man should there find rest;
> Surrounded life with pangs, restraints, and checks,
> Making sin difficult.

Theology and common experience are both opposed to the poet's notion of sin being difficult.

We owe Mr. Cliffe's contribution to our lyrical drama to his opinion that Alfieri in his Abel and Byron in Cain did not make a sufficient use of the Chorus; he further observes; "perhaps in pursuing an opposite direction I have erred in the other extreme, and the excessive lyric ornamentation may have weighed down the dramatic figures with its luxuriance, and concealed the dark and gloomy action like a serpent under flowers." We hasten to reassure Mr. Cliffe. Action in his tragedy there is none, and concealment is therefore impossible; and while his lyrical excesses are beyond all doubt heavy, no luxuriance whatever could injuriously affect his "figures," which are of the lay order. Satan and the Infernal Chorus are busy and bustling, full of empty fury and ludicrous importance; their speech is not free from anachronisms, such as "the Titanic sun" and Styx and Cocytus; while even Zillah makes learned allusion to Acheron. The most original scene is one wherein Cain is interviewed by Satan, and eventually is cast into a magic trance, to awake maddened and ripe for murder. Previously, Satan having magniloquently set forth his power, Cain rejoins—

> Tell others of thy power but tell not me.
> I seek for nothing; I have long disdained
> Such offers as are thine; I care for nobody
> And nothing cares for me.

With this new version of an old song, we take leave of Mr. Cliffe, recommending him to curb his lyrical ardour, and be less disdainful of dramatic action.

The Poems of Fanny Kemble are best described as fugitive verse. They are occasional pieces, pleasing and unaffected in sentiment, graceful in expression, and charmingly sincere. They belong mostly to the age of albums and Annuals, and are, in many instances, addressed to celebrities of bygone years; they present little pictures of America, vignettes of Rome, and reminiscences of foreign scenes. The retrospective poems are often instinct with a sadness that is too frank and natural to be morbid, and yet is not unaffecting, and is expressed with true poetic power. The sonnet following is remarkable for its bold imagery, if we except the little awkwardness of the second verse; it is curious, too, to read, now Italian unity is a fact:—

To Pius IX.

It may be that the stone which thou art heaving
From off thy people's neck shall fall and crush thee;
It may be that the sudden flood shall push thee
From off the rock, whence, prophet-like, believing
In God's great future thou dost set it free;
Yet heave it, heave it heaven high, nor fear
To be o'erwhelmed in the first wild career
Of those imprisoned tides of liberty.
That stone which thou must lifted from the heart
Of a whole nation shall become to thee
A glorious monument, such as no art
E'er piled above a mortal memory;
Falling beneath it, thou shalt have a tomb
That shall make low the loftiest dome in Rome.

All admirers of Mr. Lewis Carroll's peculiar humour will welcome his latest volume, although it consists chiefly of reprints, and what it possesses of novelty cannot enhance his reputation. "The Hunting of the Snark," the whimsical "Phantasmagoria," the delightful ballad, "The Lang Coortin'," and the admirable parody of "The Three Voices," are no new things, but they are ever fresh to all who are of Matthew Merygreeke's opinion that in true mirth there is much of mystery as well as health. "The Hunting of the Snark" needs not the apology of its explanatory preface, its ironical reference to a moral purpose, its considerate elucidation of the enigmatical. Mr. Holiday's clever and ingenious illustrations supply all the light required for its perfect comprehension. Who can forget, having once seen it, the expression of the butcher's face in the throes of his knotty calculation? Its concentrated agony of bewilderment is masterly, it haunts the memory like Hogarth's enraged musician. The remaining poems are illustrated by Mr. Arthur B. Frost. They are not all of equal merit, but there are few in which the spirit of the text is not happily expressed; their humour is fresh, their fancy delightful, and they exhibit abundant invention. In "The Three Voices" Mr. Carroll's conception is realized with a vivid power, a depth of sympathy, and an imaginative sense of the grotesque, that leave nothing to be desired; while in "Hiawatha's Photographing" the artist shows caricature power of a high order.

It is not possible to say much of Mr. Gilbart-Smith's little poem save that it is fluently written, easy to read, and commendably brief. It is fashioned after the so-called "Tales" of Byron, and professes to set forth the love of Vandyck for the Marchioness Brignole-Sale; but the great painter makes a shadowy appearance in the poem, and his vigorous personality is entirely missed by the author. The result is a flat and colourless sketch in correct passionless verse whose mediocrity is unrelieved by one ray of inspiration.

We have often derived sincere pleasure from the alluring and florid titles of the works of our minor songsters. They are as fanciful as the names given to villas in a new suburb, where each successive occupier outvies his neighbour until nomenclature becomes a difficult business. Is it that our versifiers are conscious of their chief offence that they discard the honourable title "poems" and offer their verses as if they were something different, which indeed they are? The title of Mr. Cowan's volume may be appropriate, but we cannot, after perusing his lyrics, regret his recent silence. This is how he writes of Israfel:—

Of all the choirs of cherubim,
None sing so wildly well
(Or of the choirs of seraphim)
As the angel Israfel.

I know not what thy theme can be
That makes the heavens stand mute,
To hear thee, angel Israfel,
Whose heart-strings are a lute.

By which we see Mr. Cowan is not unacquainted with Poe and The Ancient Mariner, and "conveys" wildly, if not well. The "lute-stringed heart" serves him in another poem. As he is fond of recondite titles, we recommend this to him—"Anathoth"—for his next volume.

Ione is a tale of chivalry in old Spain during the Moorish occupation, told with much volubility in the octosyllabic verse with which such a theme is naturally wedded since the success of Marmion. Its relation is better than its conception; the incidents are ill contrived, and the final catastrophe absurd. It is brimful of the well-worn properties of the romanticist, the stock-in-trade of the defunct Minerva Press. There is a proud and haughty Moslem, who is invariably stern, a beautiful and impulsive heroine, a Christian knight; there is a great deal of "the gentle muezzin's prayer" and the "quivering" dawn, the "impetuous barb," and so forth; while Ione more than once is represented as embracing the stern Moslem's brow—a curious form of salutation. The other poems in the volume do not rise above the respectable level of contemporary poetics.

Mr. Sherard's Whispers are such as all may hear unprovoked who are so minded. They are discreet in their confidences, and their eroticism is not of too fiery or pungent a nature. One of them, dedicated to a brother bard, however, passes the limits of a whisper; it opens with this ungentle description of the bard's poetry:—

A festering sea of spiced and sweetened slime,
A faint sirocco breathed o er putrid dead,
A throne enchancelling all unmanly crime,
Sewers usurping some fair river's bed.

All this, and more, emblematic and to the purpose. It is a pity Mr. Sherard does not courageously print the name of the poet he thus falls foul of.

The Goal of Time is a little blank-verse poem, very transcendental in style, that deals with man's continual evolution towards perfectibility, the survival of the fittest, the individual predominance of the best, an aristocracy of nature. These and other high themes are treated with a certain graceful fluency and facile rhetoric, in verse that is smooth and carefully modulated. It issues from Australia, and compares favourably with the sick fancies and super-sensitive egotism current with us.

It is not altogether unnecessary to warn ardent sportsmen who reverence the memory of Whyte-Melville that The Spirit of Sport in Nature is not addressed to them. They will find in it no spirited glorification of the autumn morning by the covert-side, the music of the hounds, the merits of "E O" powder; sportive elves, dancing fays, and the mysteries of fairyland and other pretty fancies, make up the volume. The author tells us that the late Rev. George Gilfillan discovered in his verses "genuine poetic and Milesian fire," hence their publication. It is always painful to dissent from authority; Milesian fire we would gladly dispense with, but in this case we have to do with neither.

The author of A Circle of Song does not reach the average of undergraduate verse. The subjects of his poems require a light and graceful touch and deft handling to make them tolerable; amorously to descant on such trivialities as "On laming myself in a Footrace with Gertrude" demands higher powers than are his. He has, however, achieved the rare distinction of rhyming distingué with dingy—the one notable touch in his volume.

Marian is the second portion of a lengthy blank-verse romance in narrative and dialogue. It is not without merit, but its defects of diffuseness, excessive volubility, and tedious ever-recurring soliloquy are overwhelming. It provokes the obvious and awkward question—Why was it not told in good honest prose? Prose, after all, is the natural language of romance; the narrative would gain in prose those qualities of lucidity and form it is most deficient in.

In Life Thoughts the disproportion between the grandiloquence of its title and the vaporous nature of its contents is striking. There is nothing in it of thought, in the philosophic sense, nothing that should make others think, "or even think of thinking"; some descriptive passages, however, possess poetic power and feeling.

TEUTONIC MYTHOLOGY.*

FOLK-LORE has taken the position of the more old-fashioned antiquarianism as the hobby of people with plenty of curiosity and leisure. Much as we value ourselves on the "scientific spirit," we are in matters of folk-lore and myth about as far from being scientific as ever. Still the old combinations of faint or even invisible analogies are woven into a shadowy warp and woof of theory. Still there are prevalent purely fanciful and unsupported ideas of what man must have been in the mythopœic stage. Still the great living mythopœic age of contemporary rude peoples is neglected in spite of the warnings of Mr. Tylor. Still are "the notes of the Will-o'-the-Wisp," as a lady writer of children's stories has it, listened to by credulous inquirers. The Will-o'-the-Wisp in this case is etymology. Theories are founded on fantastic ideas about the original meanings and derivations of names. On one side, we are told by Welcker that Cronus is a Greek divine name deduced from a Volks-Etymologie of Cronides, and therefore cannot come in Sanskrit; on the other side we have Kuhn deriving Cronus from "the Sanskrit krâna, der für sich schaffende" (Ueber Entwicklungsstufen der Mythenbildung, p. 148). Wilder yet and yet more dread are the mythologists who derive the Homeric moly from an Accadian word for a star, and the German rhyming nonsense limpete, from a Chaldæan word for the deep. Clearly we are drifting back into the system by which Bryant and Deane explained any word, in any language, by any other word in any other language which chanced to resemble it in sense or sound. In this carnival and masquerade of guesses and etymologies, the sanity and, on the whole, the scientific calmness of Jacob Grimm in the English translation are welcome. Mr. Stallybrass has reached his third volume, and has still to tackle the promised appendix. His translation is neither faultless nor complete, for he usually leaves unconstrued the long quotations from all sorts of tongues which Grimm in German fashion printed in the original. As folk-lore is, on the whole, a popular kind of study, pursued by quiet ladies and by the clergy in their leisure moments, as folk-lore is among sciences what croquet is among games, it seems a pity to make its pursuit too difficult. A very considerable proportion of Mr. Stallybrass's version will be heathen Greek to a very considerable proportion of his probable public. Yet, when he comes to the appendix, we can scarcely expect him to be nobly inconsistent, and to translate not only Grimm's writing, but Grimm's quotations.

The preface to this third volume (itself a collection of folk-lore rather than of the higher myths) contains some interesting expressions and reservations of opinion. Grimm laments again that his people, unlike the Scandinavian race, have had no Edda preserved to them. But Germany still keeps, in oral memory, her Märchen,

* Teutonic Mythology. By Jacob Grimm. Translated by James Stevens Stallybrass. Vol. III. London: Bell & Sons. 1883.

And what are Märchen but the higher myths in the making—myths not yet endowed with a local habitation, and busy with characters not yet dubbed with title or name? This, at all events, is our view of the relation of Märchen and myth, though now and then the relations are reversed. Probably some of the tales which Schmidt and Von Hahn collected in Greece are faint, blurred versions of the old Olympian myths, worn down by long travel per ora virum. Grimm himself writes thus:—"The ancient mythus combines to some extent the qualities of Märchen and legend; untrammelled in its flight" (like the Märchen), "it can yet settle down in a local home" (like the legend). German popular tradition, as distinguished from literary record, preserves not only the ancient peasant forms of myth, but retains innumerable heathen customs and rites—fire-lighting by friction, belief in healing fountains, rain-making, sacred animals, omens, spells, curses, holy plants and stones, and so forth. These things, we may say, though here Grimm would probably have differed from us, are perhaps older than the gods. One dynasty after another of Olympians, or dwellers in Asgard, is evolved from the faith or fancy of priest, poet, and philosopher, and is imposed from above on the acquiescent, unprogressive rural people. They accept the new faith and the new names, but do not get rid of the old magical rites. They only tell the old story of the new god; they only give the saint's name to the holy well, or put the sacred beast under the patronage of Apollo or St. Bridget, of Zeus or Our Lady. Thus it is probably the minor matters of the rustic faith that are the most old of all; the witch or conjurer more antique than the similarly endowed god; the mouse or wolf more antique than the god who patronizes mouse or wolf, Sminthian or Lycean Apollo. This view, a comparatively modern one, appears to be controverted by Grimm when he says that "divinities form the core of all mythology." To our minds divinities (like the British aristocracy) are rather the "upper crust" than the core. "Our gods were buried almost out of sight," says Grimm, "and had to be dug out." True, the gods were buried; because they were the open, official, established opponents of the new creed. Therefore, the priests of the new creed, leaving sacred beasts and birds and magic rites comparatively unmolested, turned with all their strength against Balder and Odin and Wuotan and Thunar, and the like. In precisely the same way when a country is conquered, the king and the nobles are dispossessed and disappear, the common people survive, and always make the bulk of the population. Therefore, when Christianity invaded German belief, the high gods were dispossessed and disappeared; the rural superstitions are alive to-day. This necessary truth in the evolution of religion and myth makes folk-lore more than a mere study of oddities. Folk-lore is that portion of human beliefs which has persisted longest under the waves of this troublesome world, the waves of advancing and withdrawing creeds and civilizations. The peasant holds to the rites and ideas that his ancestors practised while they were still savages, and before perhaps they had much acquaintance with the more poetic myths even about the heathen gods. To matter of this archaic sort Grimm's third volume (in the English translation) is devoted. It is the extreme antiquity of folk-lore derived from that stage of the human intellect which, all over the world, was most similar and least differentiated, that accounts for the wide diffusion of popular beliefs and popular tales. Grimm is an opponent of the theory which explains the recurrence and diffusion of similar stories and practices by borrowing. Certainly these practices and stories are always found most among the very section of the people that has travelled least, and that, in other matters, borrows not at all. The upper classes of France may borrow English ways, the educated class in England may borrow German ideas, but the peasants do not travel, do not read, do not imitate, do not borrow. How then is it that a Gaelic tale will contain features found in the corresponding Slavonic and Zulu stories, features which have dropped out of the cultivated French version of the Märchen, as dressed up by Perrault to be presented at court, and dedicated à Mademoiselle? Manifestly, if there was to be any knowledge in Western Europe of the Zulu or Servian Cinderella, Perrault was more likely to use the knowledge than a cotter in Barra. Yet the cotter narrator cleaves to the elements in the legend which Slavs and Zulus retain, while Perrault drops them. Thus Grimm wisely regards the diffusion of myths as "mysterious." "I believe myth to be the common property of many lands; that all its ways are not yet known." Grimm was apparently unaware that (not to speak of African myths, of which he had some knowledge), the early Spanish conquerors found parallels to German tales among the Peruvian tribes. The more the topic is pursued the more this extraordinary closeness of coincidence among the tales of every people is demonstrated. While this coincidence remains "mysterious" it entirely demolishes the theory that Indo-European tales are the result of forgotten meanings of words. The same words do not occur, to cause the same error, in South and North America, and Africa, on the Amazon, and on the Murrumbidgee. As a vigorous disbelief in borrowing or transmission usually accompanies the hypothesis that tales are the result of language misunderstood, the difficulties of the problem (to students who hold these views) must appear insuperable. But Grimm "does not deny that, besides this mysterious diffusion, there has also been borrowing from without—nay, that myths could be purposely invented or imported." Such intentional importing and borrowing, however, is characteristic of civilized and educated peoples. The Romans and the Ptolemies extended an open hospitality to deities of all lands, and mysteries and myths of every faith. All the civilized world has borrowed and adopted Christianity, Buddhism, Islam. But untutored races (among whom the myths Grimm speaks of are diffused) borrow as little as possible, though they have civilized religions imposed on them by the sword, or recommended as accompaniments to gunpowder and gin. Thus it must be admitted that borrowing, where we can watch it historically, has been done by civilized and, so to say, self-conscious peoples. The process will not account for the diffusion of European folk-lore and myth among shy peoples, neither self-conscious nor civilized. The diffusion among them must remain in part mysterious, in part may be explained by the fact that the ancestors of Europeans were once in the intellectual stage where the Nootkas or Hos remain. Some influence also must be assigned to the slow process of filtration and transmission of story and idea, along the paths of palæolithic commerce, and during the untraced and dateless wanderings of early humanity. Yet, after allowing for all these processes and possibilities, we remain puzzled when we find exactly the same series of incidents in a Malagasy and a Gaelic story, or in an Iroquois, Andaman, and Australian tale. The puzzle makes much of the pleasure of the study of folk-lore and myth.

Grimm was somewhat interested in animal-worship. Observing that Finnish races, like the people of Sweden and Norway, held the bear sacred, he also observed that "the constellation of the Great Bear would of itself seem an evident trace of his worship even among the Greeks." Bachofen, who wrote a tract on ancient bear-worship, would agree with this; and when we know that the Australians revere and seek oracles from all the bear they have to worship (the little "native bear"), and that Iroquois and Ainos do the same, while the bear is an American constellation, we cannot but see that the Greeks had religious ideas in common with very low races. But all this disappears when scholars and their camp-followers assure us that the Greek bear derives his name from a root meaning "bright," and that the "glossiness of his coat," and some linguistic muddle about the root ARK, caused him to take his place in the heavens. If this be true, was it by some astonishing coincidence in linguistic error that all the other bears of the Ainos and the other bear-worshippers forced their way into the realm of religion and myth? Would it not be odd if, in languages of all families, the forgotten meaning of words thrust bears, of all things, among the gods and the stars? The coincidences in themselves would be miraculous. But here Grimm's good sense comes in, and he has nothing to say about etymologies. Later, indeed, he falls into the trap of regarding inanimate objects religiously adored as "symbols of the divine force." But such objects—fetishes, if people will call them so—are more or less religiously revered by races who seem to have few large abstract "ideas of the divine force."

On the whole, Grimm is a model of the scientific temper, dealing with a class of subjects in which the unscientific spirit usually runs wild. But when is that successor of Grimm to come to whom he "bequeaths his gleanings"; the man who, "standing on Grimm's shoulders, shall get in the harvest of the full field"? The advent of this synthetic genius is scarcely to be expected in our generation; but come he must some day, when the historic and anthropological inquiries of the time reach their goal.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

NOTHING can better illustrate the immense literary diligence of Michelet than the fact that after the sixty or seventy volumes (taking modern and closely-printed editions) which he published during his lifetime, after the posthumous books, more than one of which has appeared since his death, there is still unprinted matter of his waiting for the light. It is true, as Mme. Michelet very fully and frankly informs us, that the Mémoire, of which Ma jeunesse (1) is the first instalment, are not autograph and holograph works of her husband's. From very early days he kept not exactly a journal, but a kind of intermittent autobiographic record; and on more than one occasion in later life he tried to get it into form, but unsuccessfully. The published work is, therefore, partly original and partly edited from materials. But no one who is at all familiar with Michelet's style is likely (even if there were any other reason for paying so bad a compliment to her) to suspect Mme. Michelet of invention. The book is signed, to those who can read, pretty amply. It fulfils its title closely, leaving Michelet a very young man with, despite his successes at the Lycée Charlemagne, nothing more to depend upon than the troublesome, undignified, and absurdly underpaid post of répétiteur at a private school. He had not lacked trouble before. He was miserable at school and starved at home; not at all owing to any unkindness on the part of his parents, but simply because they were not prosperous enough to feed him properly. But, as somebody has said, "a man of letters is never really unhappy"; and this boy of letters had abundant consolations, which may be read here. As usual with the author, there are abundant digressions, and the book is one to be returned to when it is finished or somewhat further advanced.

At this moment M. Duveyrier's pamphlet on the Senoussia (2), a network of Mussulman associations in North Africa, deserves to attract the attention of English readers. M. Duveyrier is one of the first living authorities on the Northern Sahara. He naturally pays more attention to Es-Senoussi than to his southern imitator and rival, with whom we are more particularly concerned, and his information does not much regard the Soudan proper. But it is known that the policy of the two Mahdis agrees pretty closely, and it is by no means certain that the organization set on foot by the one might not, if some great success like the death of Gordon or the defeat of an English force befall the other, be turned to account by him. How widely the network spreads, and how close are its meshes, M. Duveyrier shows to all who care to learn.

(1) Ma jeunesse. Par J. Michelet. Paris: Calmann-Lévy.

(2) La confrérie musulmane de Sidi Mohammed ben Ali es-Senoussi. Par H. Duveyrier. Paris: Société de Géographie.

Probably no such work as that which M. Picard (3) has produced in four mighty volumes on the history and system of French railway construction, maintenance, and administration is possible in England. Across the Channel the Ministry of Public Works has simply to give facilities for it, and it is done. Even yet the time which has elapsed since railways were first made is too short for what may be called a philosophical history of them generally. But M. Picard has collected the experience of France in a manner which will simply need continuation, not repetition, in the future. At present, we should say, his book stands alone, waiting not for rivals, but for imitators.

M. Lemerre's (4) always welcome collection of 24mo reprints has been increased by Alfred de Vigny's famous novel-history, and by what is perhaps M. Daudet's most popular work. We do not ourselves think it by any means his best.

The ninth volume of M. Gambetta's Speeches (5) (reaching October 1881) has appeared.

M. L. Galesloot (6) has published a brochure of very considerable interest to Englishmen, containing documents and discussions relating to the Duke of Wellington's visit to the capital of Flanders before Waterloo, and some subsequent relations of his with the city and neighbourhood. Among other things, M. Galesloot seems successfully to identify the disputed locality of the "sound of revelry by night."

The fifth yearly issue of M. Lafenestre's sumptuous Salon Album (7), as it may be called, in which the works of the year which receive prizes are described, and for the most part figured, is before us. The place of honour in the frontispiece is occupied by M. Rochegrosse's "Andromache." The etcher has not been too fortunate, for he has made that distressed mother apparently bestow a sweet smile on her own ravishers and the murderers of her child. Indeed, the illustration generally is not quite up to the mark, though exceptions may be made in favour of the plates giving M. Bouguereau's "Night," and M. Guillaume's "Castalie."

The very handsome volume which Mrs. Pattison has written for the Bibliothèque Internationale de l'Art (8) is appropriate enough; the author being English, the subject, the language, and for the most part the engravings, French. We have so large a part of the work of the great Lorrainer, whom some silly people, thinking it proper to follow what they sillily think Mr. Ruskin has said, despise, that the whole execution might well be English. Mrs. Pattison seems to have taken much trouble with her task, and she has been on the whole (not invariably) well seconded by her artists. The Amand-Durand photographic etchings are as usual impeccable. Let us hope in passing that Mrs. Pattison is wrong in accusing Earlom of tampering with the Liber Veritatis in order to make it easier to engrave.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE, 50 Regent Street, London, W.

City Branch—14 Cornhill, E.C. Founded 1806.

REPORT of the DIRECTORS, presented at the 78th ANNUAL MEETING at the Office, on Wednesday, January 30, 1884.

The Directors have to report that the transactions of the Provident Life Office during the year 1883 have been highly satisfactory.

Proposals for new Assurances amounting to £879,080 were received. Policies for £575,530 were issued and taken up, producing new annual Premiums amounting to £19,770, as against £19,311 for the previous year. These Assurances and new annual Premiums respectively represent the actual net amounts. No re-assurances were effected during the year.

The Proposals, declined and not completed, amounted to £163,550.

The Claims for the year were £192,755, being £26,416 more than the corresponding sum for 1882.

The annual Income is now £310,371, being an increase of £9,708.

During the year the sum of £19,620 was paid for the surrender of Policies. The values paid upon Bonus Policies ranged from 35 per cent.—the minimum surrender value—to as much as 634 per cent. of the Premiums received.

The total Funds of the Office on December 31 last were £2,383,384, being an increase of £24,197, a result very satisfactory considering the special extra payments required to be made on account of the recent division of Profits. The average interest realised was £4 5s. 8d. per cent., as against £4 4s. during 1882.

The large measure of public support received by the Provident Life Office, as shown in the still increasing amount of new business, is gratifying evidence that persons desirous of effecting Assurances are wisely alive to the advantages given by an Office which has all the experience to be gained from a successful existence of seventy-eight years, and which is ready to adapt its practice to the requirements of the present day.

A HISTORY OF THE INDIAN MUTINY

By T. R. E. HOLMES.

"Mr Holmes has approved himself a writer of rare qualities; he has spared no research..... He has produced a series of most admirable portraits of the leading heroes.....On the whole, the story of the siege of Delhi has never been told with more directness and power than here. .....The book is one that will form a valuable addition to the library."
British Quarterly Review.

"His work is perhaps as good as is possible in dealing with events so close to our own time. .....He has not contented himself merely with pictures of striking events, or with accounts of military exploits, but has realized the complicated nature of the problem, and its interest as illustrating the character of our rule in India."—Contemporary Review.

"Always lucid, often powerful and picturesque.....Particularly effective is his narrative of Sir Colin Campbell's and Sir Hugh Rose's campaigns."—Scotsman.

"A most readable book.....Admirably written history."—Times of India.

Morning Post.

"Of these and many other stirring deeds of that heroic time Mr. Holmes gives a most interesting, impartial, and graphic account."—Echo.

"Mr. Holmes's account of the growth of the sepoy system is singularly interesting and instructive."—Dublin Daily Express.

THE VALLEY OF SOREK:

NEW NOVEL.

By GERTRUDE M. GEORGE.

"The characters are clearly defined, the situations are strong, and the interest evoked by them is considerable. The women, in particular, are admirably drawn. Miss George..... may be recommended to persevere in her vocation."—Athenæum.

"The hero is drawn with skill and power. His lapses from the right path.....are portrayed in a forcible and natural manner. Graham is also a clever, if unpleasing, character study ..... The author.....possesses no inconsiderable talent."—Morning Post.

"Miss George possesses in no slight degree the power of investing her characters with life. .....Considerable insight into human nature is shown.....The story is well and powerfully written."—Globe.

"Her power in depicting the fluctuations of character between good and evil influences, 'betwixt Ormuzd and Ahriman' (to follow her Orientalism), is by no means small.....The work is praiseworthy and promising, and if the author should advance as happily as she has begun, her name may yet be famous."—Daily Telegraph

"No fault can be found with the tone or teaching of the book, if sometimes a little severe. In style there is much to approve."—Academy

"The influences of the charming, but weak and erring, Hebe is well depicted; the writer shows throughout power in the drawing of character."—Manchester Examiner and Times.

"Miss George can write very well."—Morning Advertiser.

THE BREAD-WINNERS. (The Much-Discussed Social Study.)

"'The Bread-Winners' is the work of a very clever man; it is told with many lively strokes of humour; it sparkles with epigram; it is brilliant with wit; it has depth; it has both feeling and imagination!.....'The Bread-Winners' is interesting, it is earnest, it is sincere; it is in many ways a very remarkable book, fine in its performance, and finer still in its promise."
Saturday Review.

THROUGH ONE ADMINISTRATION. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT, Author of "A Fair Barbarian," "That Lass o' Lowrie's," "Haworth's" "Louisiana," &c.

"The pathetic power which Mrs. Burnett showed so fully in 'That Lass of Lowrie's' is exhibited in many a touching scene in her new story.....The book is one of great interest and of striking ability."—Athenæum.

The LIFE and TIMES of JESUS the MESSIAH. By the Rev. ALFRED EDERSHEIM, D.D. Warburtonian Lecturer at Lincoln's Inn. 2 vols. 8vo. 42s.

"The distinctive character and, as we think, the great practical value of this book lie in the collection of what we may call Jewish evidence and illustrations, in the Jewish standpoint from which it is written, and in the Jewish atmosphere with which it is imbued. A Jew by birth, nurtured in the best Jewish learning, and with a large acquaintance with Jewish literature and customs, Dr. Edersheim is a Christian convert and minister, evangelical in his views and imbued with a devout feeling." RED DEER. By RICHARD JEFFERIES, Author of "The Gamekeeper at Home," "Wild Life in a Southern County," &c. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

"In 'Red Deer'—a book which should be precious to all true lovers of scenery in its noblest forms—Mr. Richard Jefferies has a subject of more common interest, and handles it with all his wonted force and directness. The red deer of which he treats are the red deer of Exmoor; and he knows as much of them, it would seem, as he knows of the wild things of the South Downs. Nothing could be better than his topographical chapters, 'Red Deer Land' and 'Wild Exmoor'; nothing more interesting than the discourse called 'Antler and Fern'; nothing more picturesque than his description of 'A Manor House in Red Deer Land'; nothing more fresh and amusing than his descant on 'Game Notes and Folk-lore.'" ATHENÆUM.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE FRANCHISE BILL.

IN introducing the measure officially called "The Repre-"sentation of the People Bill," but which in other quarters is disrespectfully described as The Continuance in Office Bill, Mr. GLADSTONE had before him an easy and congenial task. He had a great opportunity for making the kind of speech in which he excels, and for again asserting his belief in the capacity of the majority of the nation to exercise power with wisdom and moderation. The speech was not eloquent, as indeed Mr. GLADSTONE's addresses never are in any high sense of the word, the opinion of his partisans to the contrary notwithstanding. It was a lucid account of what the Bill is to do, and was almost free from the empty rhetoric which passes for eloquence with the critics of the Ministerial party. Mr. GLADSTONE went over the whole ground with his undoubted power of stating a complicated mass of details so as to make them clear to anybody who chooses to listen or read with a moderate degree of attention. He, in fact, did for the new Franchise Bill what he has done for so many Budgets. Enemies and friends alike must confess that he has stated the changes about to be made in the structure of the constituencies so as to leave their nature wholly beyond doubt. With extraordinary ingenuity, he contrived at once to make the most of those changes and yet to seem to minimize them. Although the PRIME MINISTER may have persuaded himself that he has little to fear from opposition, he was careful to conciliate the majority of his hearers, who, in their hearts, are afraid of any extension of the franchise, by dwelling on the much which the Bill leaves untouched. When the representation of wealth has been swamped by a flood of new votes belonging wholly to the wage-earning class, it is a matter of comparatively little importance that the property vote for the counties will be left nominally untouched. Both parties are afraid to defend the faggot vote publicly, although both have made, and do make, free use of it. When Mr. GLADSTONE showed how he proposes to attack this useful method of indirectly increasing the representation of property, he could safely rely on the support which every member of Parliament is bound by decency to give to plans for securing what is called the purity of election. He descanted on the other and more congenial side of his subject, the vast changes which the Bill will bring about, with manifest satisfaction. The new service, lodger, and household franchises of the counties were detailed at length. If Mr. GLADSTONE made any attempt to be eloquent in the course of his speech, it was in the passages in which he compared the timid measures of the first Reform Bill, and the half-hearted courage of the second, with the magnificent addition he now proposes to make to the constituencies. A big number always produces a considerable effect on a certain class of mind, and there are very many of Mr. GLADSTONE's followers in and out of the House who will be ready to believe that the Bill is a greater measure of reform than either of its predecessors, simply because it will add two million votes to the register.

It is no disparagement of Mr. GLADSTONE's Parliamentary courage to assume that the numerical weakness of the Conservative Opposition increased his enjoyment of the work he had to do. He cannot have enjoyed the opportunity of making a masterly précis of his Bill the less because he knew that at the bottom of their hearts the Conservatives, and no small part of his own followers, are utterly opposed to any further extension of the franchise, though the latter cannot venture to say so. That knowledge must have added considerably to the pleasure of showing active opponents and unwilling followers exactly how he proposes to do just what they dread to see done. It probably added further piquancy to this gratification that Lord HARTINGTON must have listened to his Chief's demonstration of the necessity of including Ireland in the Bill with feelings of a very mixed kind. If the crude truth had been told, or is to be told at any future stage of the debate, it would be that in point of fact the exact means to be used for nearly doubling the number of voters are matters of comparatively little importance. The essential thing is that, if this Bill passes in anything like the form in which it has been produced, the whole political power of the three kingdoms will be thrown into the hands of the working class. It is a merely plausible concession to leave a vote to the holder of 10*l.* clear yearly value in land free from the necessity of residence, even though it is to be no longer necessary that the holding should include a tenement. The voters who represent property will remain a fixed number. No addition can be made to them by any measure of the Legislature. But the addition to be made to the representation of the working class is enormous. Every one of the two million new voters will be added to his one part of the constituency. A complete alteration of the balance of political power of this kind cannot but be hateful to the Conservatives, and at least very unwelcome to the moderate Liberals. There is yet considerable hope that the Bill may be opposed on the ground that what it proposes to do will be bad in itself. Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, who has the courage of his opinions, did indeed state the actual truth, and gave the best of all possible reasons for condemning the Bill, when he declared that the new voters will be ignorant and indifferent to politics. Other members, no doubt, will be found to speak with equal frankness. Unfortunately, Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL had less to support him when he fell into the gratuitous error of prophecy and predicted defeat for the Ministry. Mr. GLADSTONE's Ministry has undoubtedly been discredited in many ways; but if it had fallen into a state of exhaustion, the Franchise Bill is directly intended to revive it. Wavering followers may possibly be rallied by a Radical measure. It may seem too much to hope that the Whigs who have submitted to so much will risk their cherished popularity with the constituencies, such as it is, by deserting their leader when he is engaged in doing what may be plausibly represented as the natural consequence of the traditional policy of their party. It is easy enough to prove to the satisfaction of any thinking man that the possession of a vote is not an innate right. That it can be proved to the satisfaction of the majority of electors is quite another thing. Workmen are doubtless as much pleased to possess a privilege as anybody else; and it may be that they are at present convinced, as far as they have any political convictions, that what power they already have will be increased by being conferred in greater quantities on their class. Moderate Liberals and Conservatives alike are well aware of the fact, and have hitherto hesitated to tell the majority of their supporters that the part of the population to which they belong is not to be trusted with political power.

Since it is obvious that Lord HARTINGTON's scruples have been removed or suppressed on second thoughts, the Bill will gain no little support by what is beyond all question its most dangerous element. If that revival of independence among the Whigs which is predicted from time to time were to be hoped for at all, it might have been expected to show itself when it is gravely proposed to swamp the Irish constituencies with voters who are sure to be the docile instruments of disloyal agitators. Lord HARTINGTON has, however, made no sign. He has eaten his words at home, and is now apparently prepared to give the Bill and all the Bill his steady support. In thus sacrificing his opinions to his party, the moderate Liberal leader will have the pleasure of acting with the Irish members of the Nationalist party. Nobody can accuse them of suppressing their principles, since it is their manifest advantage to support a measure which must largely increase their power. The discipline which has drilled the Whigs into obedience is relied on to keep them steady on the question of combining a measure of redistribution with the Franchise Bill. In and out of the House there is a natural unwillingness to leave it in the power of the Radicals to dissolve Parliament with the present constituencies just flooded with their friends; and this unwillingness may develop into a successful opposition to Mr. GLADSTONE'S determination to leave the matter to another Session. Nothing can be more fatal to the interests of the country than to assume that the hitherto proved fidelity of his followers is wholly impervious to argument. There is yet a place for repentance even in the majority on the vote of confidence last week.

EGYPT.

IT is rather surprising that no opponent of the Opposition has as yet hit upon a certain argument why Lord SALISBURY and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE should not pester the Government for declarations of policy. That argument is that, as the Government have no policy, it is utterly unjust to expect them to declare it. In the same way it may be considered unfair to demand information as to what General GRAHAM is going to do. It is very doubtful whether General GRAHAM himself knows; it is nearly certain that the Government does not. The truth is that, never since there was such a thing as an English army, was any force in such an extraordinary plight as this luckless scratch expedition which has been got together at Souakim. It was sent, if it was sent to do anything, to relieve Tokkar, and this, as everybody knew, it was too late to do. It is larger than is required to hold Souakim; it is too small to march up the country to Kassala or Berber, even if it had transport for that purpose, which it has not, or if the Government intended it to march up the country, which, at any rate when it was first sent, they certainly did not intend it to do. It has no quarrel with its nominal adversaries; for the Soudan has been declared independent, the garrison of Tokkar capitulated freely, and the Government expressly declares that the Sinkat massacre was an affair for which it had no responsibility whatever, and which therefore it cannot properly avenge. Some fervent Ministerialists apparently seem to think it a good opportunity to show that Mr. GLADSTONE can when he chooses do something else than order capitulations and retirements; but a campaign from this point of view must be left to the advocacy of professional philanthropists. If the Eastern Soudan is going to be cleared, well and good; but it is perfectly certain that General GRAHAM'S force was not sent to clear the Eastern Soudan, and equally certain that it is inadequate to that task. It may go somewhere, have a refreshing fight, and come back; after which, if Mr. GLADSTONE likes, it may march up Piccadilly. But the rationale of the whole proceeding will remain exactly as obscure as it is at the present moment. When there was something for it to do, the Government would not send it; when it is sent, they will not say what it has got to do; and when it is evident that there is nothing for it to do in reason, they decline to give any explanation of its existence. It was not our business, they say, to prevent General BAKER'S men from being killed; but it is, it seems, our mission to bury them. It would have been wicked of us to prevent the throats of the women and children at Sinkat from being cut; but we are entitled to punish the cutters. All this, it may be frankly confessed, is too wonderful and excellent for the plain man; and his natural confusion is not greatly alleviated by the violent cries of "Hush!" which are set up directly he asks for a little explanation. He may be ready to go very great lengths: to admit that it is a capital thing for English soldiers to go anywhere and fight anybody. But if it be so, why was it such a very bad and intolerable thing that they should do this a month ago, when three or four thousand lives would have been saved by so doing? Abyssus abyssum vocat, and there is no answer. It is difficult to imagine that any Doctor in Politics, Irrefragable, Subtle, Angelic, or other, can tell us what, on Gladstonian principles, is the business of General GRAHAM'S force at the present moment.

It would be paying the reader a very bad compliment to suppose him likely to mistake the drift of this argument. From Mr. GLADSTONE'S point of view, from any point of view possible to a devout but reasonable Gladstonian (if such a thing there be), General GRAHAM'S position is utterly incomprehensible, or utterly indefensible if comprehended. From any point of view whatever it is awkward, inconsistent, and fraught with difficulty. But Englishmen who are Englishmen (though they may not agree with Lord WOLSELEY as to the exceeding greatness and gloriousness of the possibilities of the present moment) have little doubt what it ought to do, and why it ought to do it. Not for the first time the sublime mismanagement of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Ministry, their irresolution—their reluctance to shed blood, if anybody pleases—has made bloodshed all but inevitable. The disgraces of Teb and Sinkat can only be washed away, the danger of greater disgraces and disasters, both in Nubia and in Egypt proper, can only be averted, either by giving the Arabs a sound beating or by forcing them to confess that Englishmen are their masters by declining battle and submitting. This, of course, is shocking to Mr. LABOUCHERE and Sir WILFRID LAWSON; and it is only fair to admit that Mr. LABOUCHERE and Sir WILFRID LAWSON are quite consistent in being shocked at it, and can exclaim at some of their own friends who are not shocked with considerable justice and force. Mr. GLADSTONE is doing at Souakim exactly what he refused to do—what he professed to be ineffably shocked at the bare notion of doing—after Majuba. He is fighting to recover prestige and to repair the effect of blunders. It is a very shameful thing, no doubt, that there should be any need for this; but the shame is concerned with the past, not with the present. If, as the only possible explanation of General GRAHAM'S proceedings implies, he has been commissioned to "find and beat" OSMAN DIGNA, his orders are in themselves very good orders. That they never ought to have been made necessary, that they could have been with the greatest ease made unnecessary, and that the fact of their being necessary is a proof of the utter incompetence of the Government, is a different matter. And it is a different matter still that the expedition is anything but well organized for its purpose, and that by simply retiring further OSMAN DIGNA can reduce General GRAHAM to a position of ludicrous helplessness and futility. That is another proof of the utter incompetence of the Government. But, so far as the find and beat order, if it exists, goes, it is a lucid interval, a deviation into sense, and as such one may be thankful for it, and hopeful for a good result.

It is not equally easy to be thankful for the news from Khartoum, for the restrictions which have hitherto made it impossible either decidedly to praise or decidedly to blame General GORDON'S proceedings still exist. Still, those proceedings have been merely preliminary, and they have been confined to a friendly town where General GORDON has a large force at his disposal. The jubilations over their "success" which have been uttered seem to argue either a remarkable want of judgment or a remarkable oblivion of the facts of the case. It is surely not difficult for any one, let alone General GORDON, to "succeed" in remitting debts, halving taxation, giving cheques on Cairo, and so forth, with full powers to do all this. It might be supposed from what has been said in some quarters that, if General GORDON had not been General GORDON, the prisoners in the Khartoum gaol would have hugged their fetters, the taxpayers would have burst into tears at not being allowed to pay full taxes, and the slaveholders would have formed a solemn league and covenant to resist to the last man the permission of slavery. Before the mission can be said to have succeeded, it must be seen how General GORDON gets on with the MAHDI, with the rebels on the Blue Nile, with the bands who keep SLATEN BEY shut up in Darfour and LUPTON BEY cut off in the recesses of Bahr el Ghazal. He may—everybody hopes he will—succeed completely. But his success up to this moment is no guarantee of this real success, the conditions being totally different. He has no worse enemies than the silly people who gush over his miraculous achievements in persuading debtors to take a receipt for their debts and slaveholders to go on holding slaves. Soon, no doubt, it will be seen what he really intends to do, and whether his intentions include what has been well and succinctly called "the MAHDI at Khartoum." That they do this is hardly believable, and it will take very strong and novel reasons to justify them if they do in[illegible] it. But it may be pointed out that all his acti[illegible]erto, the reduction of taxation, the legitimizing [illegible]very, and so forth, point distinctly in another direction. If, according to the preposterous plan which CHERIF PASHA refused, the whole course of the Nile above the second cataract is to be left to chance and the MAHDI next week, next month, or next year, there can be no sense or reason in General GORDON issuing any regulations about taxes, about the slave-trade, or about anything else. He has simply to proclaim "To your tents, O "Soudanese," to intimate that in those tents each man may do what is right in his own eyes, and to retire. That is pretty evidently not the policy, or anything like the policy, which he contemplates.

THE SPEAKERSHIP.

SIR HENRY BRAND is fortunate in having secured the respect and attachment of all parties in the House of Commons. Even Mr. PARNELL, though for political reasons he refused to concur in the vote of thanks, acknowledged the personal courtesy with which the SPEAKER had treated himself and his followers. Only one or two ill-bred Irish members took occasion when the SPEAKER left the chair to withhold from him the ordinary marks of courtesy. When Mr. BRAND was selected as the successor of Mr. DENISON some doubt was entertained whether a former Parliamentary Secretary of the Treasury was the fittest candidate for the office. A Government "Whip" is necessarily and properly a partisan; but it may be added that he has also something of a diplomatic character. He has to maintain amicable relations with similar functionaries on the opposite benches; and it is only by a conciliatory demeanour that he can discharge the duty of furnishing his chief with information as to the opinion and temper of the House. A man of the world and a man of business, he is extremely unlikely to be a political bigot or fanatic. Systematic and exclusive devotion to the interests of a Parliamentary party is scarcely compatible with enthusiasm. The doubt as to Mr. BRAND'S qualifications was soon dismissed; and experience has justified the general confidence in his impartiality. It happens by an odd coincidence that Mr. ARTHUR PEEL held a corresponding position when his party was out of office; but he had not time to perform its functions either before or after the change of Government. His political superiors must then have given him credit for the possession of tact, moderation, and good sense. Possibly Mr. GLADSTONE may not even have remembered that he was once a Parliamentary manager of the Liberal party. Sir HENRY BRAND has, during his occupation of the Chair, never exhibited unseemly preference of his former colleagues and allies. Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S speech in seconding Mr. GLADSTONE'S motion was evidently as sincere as it was cordial.

It was not merely in accordance with conventional form that the retiring SPEAKER attributed his success to the loyal co-operation of the House. At least, in the earlier part of his tenure of office he profited by the tradition that the honour of the House of Commons is concerned in maintaining the dignity and authority of the Chair. It has sometimes been remarked, in disparagement of the qualities required in a Speaker, that nearly all the occupiers of the office have been successful and popular. A part of the credit belongs to the Prime Ministers, with whom the nomination has rested; but average Speakers have not been distinguished by extraordinary ability. ADDINGTON owed his promotion exclusively to the personal regard of PITT, who had six months before placed his friend and cousin, WILLIAM GRENVILLE, in the Chair. MITFORD, afterwards Lord REDESDALE, a learned and able lawyer, only held the post for a year. ABBOT, who was also a lawyer, had made a special study of the forms and customs of the House of Commons; and in spite of strong political prejudices he was prudent and impartial in the discharge of his office, though on one occasion he was thought to have been guilty of indiscretion in making a speech against a Catholic Relief Bill. MANNERS-SUTTON, though his abilities were below mediocrity, enjoyed a calm and peaceful reign during the earlier portion of his career. After the passage of the Reform Bill, Lord GREY and Lord ALTHORP paid him the compliment of reappointing him for the purpose of reducing the reformed House of Commons to discipline; but in 1835 during PEEL'S short administration he was defeated by a narrow majority, some members justifying a strictly party vote by imputations on the fairness of the Speaker. It is not a little remarkable that the Duke of WELLINGTON during his abortive attempt to form a Government in 1832, had selected MANNERS-SUTTON to lead the House of Commons on the refusal of PEEL to engage in the hopeless adventure. Mr. GREVILLE records the forcible epithet by which LYNDHURST, after a two hours' interview, recorded his opinion of his proposed colleague. Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE, who the other night witnessed the retirement of his second successor, has always been regarded as a model Speaker; and it may be said that Sir HENRY BRAND was equal to any former incumbent of the office.

The Opposition was well advised in finally declining to propose a candidate of its own. On such a question as the election of a Speaker either party can poll its whole strength, and there would have been no advantage in unnecessarily recording the great preponderance of the Liberal majority. The disaffected Irish members, indeed, might probably have once more taken the opportunity of voting against the Government; but their alliance, while it added no credit to the regular Opposition, would have furnished captious partisans with a pretext for denouncing an imaginary coalition. If Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY or any other suitable member of the Conservative party had been proposed, the object of the proceeding would have been to reserve to a possible majority the right of electing another Speaker in a future Parliament. A precedent for such a protest might have been found in the Whig nomination of Sir GILBERT ELLIOT on two separate occasions in the early part of PITT'S long administration. FOX and his followers were aware that they must be defeated, nor had they any special objection to the choice of GRENVILLE or of ADDINGTON; but they wished to miss no opportunity of placing on record their want of confidence in the Minister. In the present instance, the right of the Conservatives to exercise an independent choice in another Parliament was sufficiently reserved by Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE in his speech of congratulation to the new Speaker. It is, on the whole, convenient that a neutral dignitary should not derive his official title from an active party struggle. A contest is unavoidable where the House is almost equally divided, as at the time when Mr. SHAW-LEFEVRE defeated Mr. GOULBURN by a narrow majority; but it is not worth while to disturb, without the hope of any practical result, the ostensible unanimity of the House.

The ceremony of last Tuesday was conducted with faultless propriety. Mr. WHITBREAD, who is understood to have on a former occasion declined a nomination to the same office, imparted dignity by language and manner to phrases which were necessarily commonplace or formal. He perhaps laboured unnecessarily his answer to the imaginary objection that Mr. PEEL had formerly held office. The instances which he quoted were more than sufficient to illustrate an almost undisputed proposition. Under-Secretaries are probably for the most part not stronger partisans than ordinary supporters of the Ministers of the day. As Mr. WHITBREAD said, there is no reason why an actual Minister should not be chosen Speaker if he were otherwise the fittest person who could be selected. Mr. GOULBURN was under PEEL one of the principal leaders of his party, and within two years from his defeat he became Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would be not merely hypercritical, but unjust, to complain of the enunciation of truisms in a necessarily conventional address. Both Mr. WHITBREAD and Mr. RATHBONE referred to circumstances which were more practically relevant to the immediate occasion. There could be no objection to statements that the labours of the House of Commons and of its presiding officer are greatly increased by the growth of Parliamentary interference with the administration of current business, and with foreign and colonial affairs. Mr. RATHBONE offered a partial explanation of the change by referring to the instantaneous transmission of news from all parts of the Empire and of the world. It would have been unseasonable to mention the equally notorious fact that the best Parliamentary traditions have been rudely disturbed, not only by the immoderate loquacity of members, but by the intentional disloyalty of a perverse and troublesome section. It was more decorous to remind the House that the SPEAKER is invested with new responsibilities. Neither the mover nor the seconder recalled the unwelcome circumstance that he has a new and rigorous code of procedure to administer.

The dignity of the new SPEAKER's demeanour and the good taste of his speech of acceptance left nothing to be desired. It is satisfactory to know that he commences the discharge of his duties with the advantage of having made a favourable impression on all his hearers. Both Mr. WHITBREAD and Mr. RATHBONE had naturally spoken of the name and descent which have probably contributed to his promotion; and Mr. GLADSTONE afterwards gracefully expressed his own grateful regard for the memory of his first political chief. Mr. PEEL himself said enough, and not too much, on the same gratifying subject. Hereditary pretensions always involve an element of becoming modesty, inasmuch as they involve an implicit disclaimer of personal merit. It will be interesting to watch the success of Sir ROBERT PEEL's youngest son in a new career of usefulness and distinction. If personal reminiscences had been appropriate to the occasion, Mr. PEEL might have strengthened Mr. WHITBREAD's defence of official or ex-official candidates for the office of Speaker. In the present instance the former Secretary of the Treasury had had the opportunity of proving that he was not a blind partisan. In 1880 he became a member of Mr. GLADSTONE's Government when Ireland was described on the highest authority as abnormally prosperous and tranquil. A few weeks afterwards it was found expedient in the interests either of Ireland or of the Cabinet suddenly to introduce the Disturbance Bill, which was afterwards rejected by a majority of Liberal peers. Mr. ARTHUR PEEL in a speech to his constituents intimated his disagreement with the novel system of legislation; and consequently, or at least subsequently, his health unfortunately rendered it necessary that he should resign his office. It is greatly to Mr. GLADSTONE's credit that he should not have further resented an exceptional display of independence. The SPEAKER's determination to be strictly impartial was expressed in a language and tone which evidently represented a strong conviction and a resolute purpose. Both parties will be anxious to support him in his endeavour to preserve order and freedom of discussion. Even if he should deem it necessary to exercise the powers which have recently been attached to his office, the House itself, and not its officer, will be responsible for his enforcement of invidious regulations.

DYNAMITE IN CLOAK-ROOMS.

THE latest attempt, or series of attempts, on the pockets of the New York housemaids does not materially differ from its forerunners. The first principle of Irish scoundrelism is "above all, no risk," the second is entire incuriousness as to the probable victims. Both conditions are so well fulfilled in the case of railway cloak-rooms that it is only surprising that they have not been selected by the advanced guard of the Parnellite party as battlefields before now. A parcel deposited on the steps of a building, on a window sill, or the like, is very likely to attract attention and suspicion. In a cloak-room it is among other parcels, and apparently at home. At the larger London stations the cloak-room business is, moreover, very considerable and extremely various, and a package must be of an extraordinarily tell-tale kind if it excites any particular misgiving in a busy and blasé porter or clerk. The American postmaster who drew the line at loose rattlesnakes was hardly more tolerant than such a clerk or porter is, by habit and necessity, likely to be. Nor is he at all likely to pay particular attention to the depositor; the voucher alone, not the signalement of the person obtaining or presenting it, is what he has to look to. Therefore the enterprise, which was partially successful at Victoria, and which was tried at Charing Cross and Paddington, has the first great charm to the Irish mind—that of almost absolute safety from detection. It has also the second and less explicable charm above referred to. It is nearly certain that the persons injured, if any, will not be persons even remotely connected with Saxon tyranny over Ireland, or with the nefarious desire of Englishmen to help landlords to some larger or smaller share of their rents. The few porters and inspectors who haunt stations at night are not usually members of Parliament, colonels in the army, or possessors of estates in Connaught.

The attraction of the particular form of crime for the criminals is thus partly evident, though as usual their motive in commiting the crime at all, unless it be that referred to in the first sentence, is still obscure. It may have been excusable in Irishmen to take Mr. GLADSTONE's word as to England being convertible by outrage, but it is not more than excusable. If they care to ascertain the state of English opinion at all, they may very easily discover what it is. A dozen of these dastardly crimes, or a score or a hundred, will not seriously frighten Englishmen, and still less will induce them to let Ireland go (what [illegible] may be the partial propriety of the excursion, considering the behaviour of some Irishmen) her own way to the Devil. Unless some very much bolder or some very much cleverer scoundrels are hired than have yet been hired, no very serious damage of any kind will be done, save by accident. It may reasonably be asked of the United States that the present extraordinary facilities accorded to conspiracy in that country shall be curtailed. Scolding America is, however, both useless and undignified, and while our own Custom House officers are so lax in allowing the import of dynamite, we cannot greatly blame those of the United States for not stopping its export. But, as Irishmen themselves have been more than once warned, a state of feeling may be created by the repetition of these outrages which they will find vastly uncomfortable. The victims of these explosions have in no case been many, but still there have been victims; they have been mostly of the lower class, and they have no doubt each had his or her circle of personal friends and sympathizers. The state of feeling in these circles is not likely to be friendly towards Ireland and Irishmen. Nor, though there has been (except in the columns of the Times) no panic, and is, it may be hoped, likely to be none, is the perpetually renewed irritation caused by these attacks favourable to the country which, as an Irishman pathetically remarked the other day, "Irishmen so fondly, nay so "madly love." Englishmen are extremely good-natured, rather unreasonable, slow to make up their minds, and easily placable; but they can be ill-tempered enough at times, and when their unreasonableness happens to be on the side of their ill-temper, it is bad for the objects of both. These are not by any means vague or idle words, though it is unnecessary and unadvisable to put them in an absolutely unambiguous fashion. Certain very well-known persons in Parliament might consider them with a great deal of advantage; and it may be that the next Irishman who is caught playing with dynamite will have cause to wish that he had considered them before so playing. Meanwhile, it is very curious that no kind of expression of disapproval ever comes from Mr. PARNELL's chief followers for these deeds; that they never, so far as is known, have raised a fund to compensate the victims; and that, whenever any rascal of the class concerned is brought to justice, they apparently take much interest in the said rascal, but none in the punishment or prevention of his crime. At every fresh outrage one naturally looks with eagerness for some eloquent and indignant protest from these indignant and eloquent persons, but somehow it is not made. This also may, perhaps, be considered when the day of reckoning comes. A few more explosions, and it may perhaps come quickly, and be a very ugly day for somebody.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S SHIPPING BILL.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S "Bill to provide for the "greater Security of Life and Property at Sea" has been so openly drafted that its provisions were fully known before it was published. The printed measure contains nothing of importance which had not been threatened or promised already. Such slight modifications of the first scheme as are to be found had substantially been agreed to by the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE at Newcastle. In the "Memorandum" at the beginning the aims of the framer of the Bill are stated in the words made familiar by various Board of Trade circulars, and not a few speeches. The great majority of the public who like to know what a Bill is meant to do, but are not disposed to learn by the laborious process of wading through a hundred and one clauses and a schedule full of repetitions and technical terms how far its objects are likely to be obtained, may read this preface with general approval. They can do so at second hand with the more ease because the Memorandum is admirably adapted for conversion into leading article. It states Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's intentions in sentences which are statements of fact on the surface and appeals to sentiment underneath. At the very threshold lies the cabalistic phrase that has done such excellent service already. "As to the first part," says this old preamble with a new face, "the leading principles on which the pro-"posed amendment of the law is based are, first, that in no "case should the loss of, or casualty to, a ship be a source of "gain to her owner; and, secondly, that the loss of, or "casualty to, a ship should in cases of avoidable negligence "subject the owner to liability." The second part provides for the establishment of a court composed of a Government official, a delegate of the shipowners of each district, and a representative of its seafaring population. This court is to exercise those powers for the detention of unseaworthy ships hitherto exercised by the Board of Trade alone. A third part deals with the question of tonnage measurement. Few of those who learn the nature of the Bill are aware that the system of Board of Trade supervision established by Mr. PLIMSOLL'S Act has proved both ineffectual and irritating. Still fewer know or care anything about tonnage measurement; but everybody is inclined to approve of a Bill which is to protect the lives of sailors, and check the evil practices of shipowners who send badly-found ships to sea. It is, at least, to be presumed that one way of improving the condition of sailors is to allow them a voice in the measures to be taken for their protection. The Bill therefore comes out with all the prestige due to its excellent intentions; and prestige, as Radical Ministers are beginning to learn, is also a thing which has a solid value. At any rate, it is a nicer name for the art admired by the pious editor of immortal memory. Whoever opposes Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S Bill must be prepared to be told that he is a greedy, heartless capitalist, ready to make his ignoble gains at the risk of men's lives, or else the flunkey of these wicked persons.

This is a highly ingenious method of clearing the road for a Bill and providing oneself with an approving chorus; but it will probably fail, and ought to fail, in preventing opposition. Three-fourths of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S measure will doubtless be accepted without demur. It contains much that will please its stoutest opponents—the Insurance Companies and the shipowners. The interests of these bodies are not so distinct as the generally friendly critics of the Bill seem to think. Vessels sailing from other ports than London are commonly insured in clubs composed mainly of shipowners or shippers of cargo who are neither so ignorant nor so unbusinesslike as to indulge in a practice of over-insurance which would result in a loss all round. Still there are many Insurance Companies which will be glad of the restriction to be imposed on reckless or careless owners. A meeting of underwriters at Lloyd's has pronounced in favour of the clause making it the law that every policy is to include a tacit guarantee of seaworthiness on the part of the shipowner, by which all the responsibility for a common venture will be thrown on one of the parties. It has also expressed its satisfaction with the rule that insurance cases are to be tried without a jury. A letter written last December by the Secretary at Lloyd's explains this feeling in the most lucid style. At that date it had not been proposed to dispense with the jury, and the underwriters had serious fears that it would be difficult to secure a verdict for the insurer who, after accepting the premium, should refuse to pay the insurance. A judge may be trusted to administer the law uninfluenced by sentiment. Even for the shipowners there is much that will be acceptable in the Bill. The new courts will prove a welcome substitute for the Board of Trade supervision. The abolition of compulsory pilotage, though it can only take effect in the dominions of Great Britain, will have their entire approval. It will remove a cause of expense, and greatly simplify the position of their agent, the master of the vessel. The question of tonnage measurement is not likely to give rise to much debate. But although so much of the Bill will be accepted with more or less approval, there are two parts which will most certainly be strongly opposed; and they are just those clauses which are the most characteristic portions of the Bill. Shipowners and insurers alike have good reasons for declining to accept the rules for preventing over-insurance. With the laudable object of making it impossible for the owner of a rotten ship to speculate on a wreck, the immense majority of those engaged in the business thoroughly sympathize. But the Bill would go far beyond that. It would in every case impose a heavy loss on the shipowner. He would be limited to recovering just the intrinsic value of what he had lost, with no margin for the profit which he had hoped to gain if the voyage had been successful. The expenses which the ship would have incurred between the time of the wreck and its arrival in port will be deducted from the freight insurance. There is a plausible appearance of equity about these provisions, which has fulfilled its object of blinding the independent critics of the Bill. Nothing looks more reasonable than that an owner should not be paid for what he never had, particularly when lives have been lost, or at least risked. The possibility that he should be so paid would seem to make it the interest of some to speculate on shipwreck. But in this matter, as in many others in our time, the real issues have been obscured by sentiment. The shipowner does not merely lose the vessel which has gone down. He is deprived of its services for a time, and what is called over-insurance compensates him poorly enough for that. If he is spared a certain outlay on the remainder of the broken voyage, he loses his expected homeward freight—or, since it is better to speak by the card, the profit he expected to make on a homeward freight—when the wrecked ship was outward bound. At present he looks to the insurance to give him a set-off for that loss of which he will be deprived by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S Bill. Both parties to an insurance have good cause to shrink from accepting the complicated and inquisitorial system by which the Bill proposes to make over-insurance impossible by setting underwriters and shipowners to be a check on one another and each other. The probability that the Bill may crush the dishonest shipowner is not compensation enough for the increased risk, and indeed certainty, of further loss which it will impose on the whole industry. The ninety-nine per cent. of honest shipowners may reasonably object to be mulcted because a few black sheep have hitherto been allowed to escape well-deserved punishment.

Another feature of the Bill is the extension of the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act to ships. This also will be strongly opposed, and not wholly unreasonably. As has been pointed out a hundred times already, the owner of a ship is by no means in the same position as an employer on shore. He is physically debarred from exercising that vigilant control over his vessel which the millowner can exercise over his mill. If the shipowners are wise, however, they will not decide to fight their battle on this ground. They are entitled to demand some modification of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S Bill; but it is time that an end should be put to a state of the law which allows the mates and seamen to be ruined, or at least reduced to a state of temporary pauperism, by a shipwreck for which the owner may be in part responsible. They are, however, fully entitled to insist that the Bill should define the nature of their responsibility less vaguely than it does. Before the clauses of the Bill come to be debated there is a preliminary matter to settle. It is known that a strong opposition will be offered to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S intention of referring the Bill to a Grand Committee. As this is a question affecting not only this particular measure, but the whole business of legislation under the new Procedure Rules, it is to be hoped that it will be thoroughly threshed out. What the House will really have to settle is, whether the Grand Committees are to deal not only with Bills of a purely business character, such as they may easily handle, but with great measures of general interest. Few will, we imagine, be found to doubt that measures of the latter kind are for the whole House to deal with. If so, the question is settled already. "The subjects," says the preamble, alias memorandum, of the Bill, "which are dealt with in this part "of the Bill [i.e. the second], and with reference to which "the Bill proposes to alter and amend the law, are "these; the law of marine insurance, the law relating to "shipowners and seamen, the law of carriage by sea of goods "and persons, the laws relating to compulsory pilotage, the "law in relation to joint-stock companies as owners of ships, "and the criminal law as it affects persons engaged in the "management and navigation of ships." Here are six subjects, some of the first importance, with which the Bill proposes to deal. The shipowners will be doing no small service if they take care that they are properly brought before the whole House.

RUSSIA AT MERV.

IN discussing this subject last week it was not possible to do more than anticipate the attitude of HER MAJESTY'S Government towards the new expansion of Russia's manifest destiny. It appears, however, that it was possible to anticipate it, and that it was anticipated. Sir CHARLES DILKE is very serious on the subject. Negotiations are going on; and though probably no human being (certainly not Sir CHARLES DILKE) anticipates that the result of negotiations will be the retirement of Russia from Merv, the announcement gives a cheerful air of business to the Central Asian policy of the Government. It is quite true that Russia has broken pledge after pledge if she has really accepted the submission of the Merv Turkomans. It is quite true that the bugbear held out three years ago that, if England held Candahar, Russia would think it necessary to advance to Merv, and that, if England abandoned Candahar, Russia would not, has turned out to be as absurd a thing as it was argued to be at the time. It is also true that the whole actual, as distinguished from verbal, conduct of the Government has been an invitation to Russia to do what she has done; and that its effect has been to render the doing less important simply because very much more important things have been done, and allowed to be done, before. But negotiations are in progress, and Sir CHARLES DILKE and the Government have suddenly discovered that Quetta is of great value (there is some chance, after this, of their discovering the value of Cyprus), and the tone of the PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD is that of a grave statesman who is almost a Russophobe. It has always been a pleasure to recognize the ability of the member for Chelsea in playing political high comedy. He would scarcely have been guilty of the innocent bêtise into which his successor at the Foreign Office fell. Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE insisted on the excellent conduct of Russia in stopping the Turkoman slave trade exactly as if a certain proclamation had not been published at Khartoum, and persevered in his philanthropy even after the friendly cheers of his foes had warned him of dangerous ground. It is very improbable that Sir CHARLES DILKE would have done this.

Meanwhile, the Russian comments on the subject and the events which have accompanied it are of much more actual interest than the language of the Government which abandoned Candahar, which allowed Russia to crush the Akhal Tekkes, and whose members, before it became a Government, devoted their whole energies to foiling Lord BEACONSFIELD'S plan for consolidating all Southern Asia into an English bulwark against Northern invasion. The Russians are still apologetic in word and deed, but with curious exceptions, and in a way which is not likely to deceive any one who does not wish to be deceived. The utmost regrets are expressed that anything should have happened which is likely to disturb or annoy "the "friendly GLADSTONE Government." It is pointed out that after all MAHOMET has not broken his word by going to the mountain, inasmuch as the mountain has come to MAHOMET. Nor are these obliging expressions left unaccompanied by deeds which no doubt are intended to be obliging. Word has apparently been passed to the SHAH to gratify England by putting some restraint upon AYOUB KHAN'S movements; and, more than that, General TCHERNAIEFF has been disgraced for daring to talk about invasions of India. Unluckily General TCHERNAIEFF is very subject to be disgraced, as a French scholar once said of Queen GUINEVERE that apparently she was "très sujette à être enlevée." It is not the first or the second time that his superiors have been shocked at him; but it does not appear that their indignation has ever led them to disgorge his conquests or abandon his plans. And if it were necessary to show how very unmeaning is this stale old farce of a disgrace accompanying an annexation, some comments on Central Asian affairs in the Russian press itself would supply quite sufficient illustration. The advance on Afghanistan from the West is made with apologies, and shyly, but at the same moment a clamour is raised for a rebuke to the presumptuous AMEER of that country because of his doings on the Upper Oxus. He has "sounded" that river—an abominable crime in a potentate whose dominions include its left bank for hundreds of miles. He has made claims on Wakhan (which is coloured as Afghan on every trustworthy map), and on Shignan (which is not coloured on any trustworthy map as Russian). The lamb is troubling the waters, and the wolf announces that he will have to look out.

After comparing the speeches of Mr. STANHOPE and Sir CHARLES DILKE with each other and with the facts of the case, there are few persons acquainted with those facts who will not say that Mr. STANHOPE'S, with all its moderation, was a very alarming speech, and that Sir CHARLES DILKE'S, with all its soothing assurances and its prospect of action, was utterly unsatisfactory. If the reader consents to forget all Sir CHARLES DILKE'S antecedents, and all the antecedents of those with whom he acts, the assurances of the command exercised over the Bolan, of the good disposition of the Beloochees, and so forth, may be very satisfactory things. And so might they be very satisfactory if he could forget that Russia is not, as she was recently, confined to the shores of the Aral and the Caspian. But these are exactly the things which it is impossible to forget. They might indeed be, if not forgotten, at any rate condoned, if the policy which Sir CHARLES DILKE, after his peculiar fashion, adumbrated were fully carried out; if railway communication were arranged and completed to the adits of Afghanistan from the south and east between and including the Khyber and the Bolan; if Quetta were transformed into a first-class military station; if the treaty hold which England possesses on Asia Minor were turned into a reality; and if means were taken to convert Persia, as it is still possible to convert her, from a Russian into an English satellite. In other words, if the English Government chooses to say to Russia "Come to "close quarters by all means; we are quite ready for you," that is an intelligible policy. It must indeed be a costly and difficult one, whereas the policy of keeping Russia at arm's length, or rather out of striking distance altogether, was a very easy and cheap policy. Yet it is in itself a manly, courageous policy enough, if a somewhat adventurous one. But who supposes that Mr. GLADSTONE'S Government will ever adopt any policy of the kind? Fortunately Indian administration even now goes on without very much meddling in detail from home, or even from Calcutta, and the Indian officials, who have made the best of the bad job of the abandonment of Afghanistan by strengthening the hold which Lord LYTTON established on Beloochistan, have done a very good deed. But it is impossible thoroughly to counterwork at Quetta the railway which will soon be at Askabad and the railway which a little later will link the Caspian to the Amu Daria. It may be said without undue pessimism that it is, thanks to the Government, impossible to counterwork them anyhow except by the above-mentioned scheme, which in the present temper of the constituencies and the present mischievous influence of that temper on foreign policy is very unlikely to be adopted. It is because of the difficult and costly proceedings which these later advances of Russia (as was fully foreseen and foretold) make necessary that any wise Government would have used all its efforts to stave off those advances at almost any cost. As the situation now is, Russia can choose her own time for striking, and can strike almost at once. Let it be said, if any one likes, that she is never likely to strike or to wish to strike—an enormous supposition considering the experience of 1878. It remains that to strike or not is with her, not with us. Under no circumstances, now that Candahar has been given up, and until it is reoccupied—until, indeed, occupation is pushed further still—can the initiative lie with England. We must be prepared for attack, and we must be prepared for attack on two different lines, to say no more—the line of the Khyber and the line of the Bolan. That is to say, in dangerous times we must have armies of observation both at Quetta and at Peshawur. That seems to be the actual policy of the Government, as far as they have any. Yet a dozen years ago a little firmness would have kept Russia far away from the frontiers of Afghanistan altogether, and three or four years ago a little diplomacy would have made it practically impossible for her to get nearer to them. The game which has been played on a small scale and rapidly in Egypt has, as Lord GEORGE HAMILTON observed with perfect truth, been played more slowly and on a larger scale in Afghanistan. That game is one of hesitation and shirking decided measures until either the stake is lost or it is necessary to play at ever higher and higher risk.

THE BRIGHTON ELECTION.

THE Brighton election, the issue of which will be decided to-day, is one of unusual interest. Since it has become clear that the votes of the electorate and the votes of the House of Commons are by no means as much in harmony as they were four years ago, the result of every election is keenly scrutinized as an index of public feeling. Even when the issue is a foregone conclusion, the increase or decrease in the number of votes given on either side, as compared with those given at the General Election, is a matter of interest. But the Brighton election, the result of which is still doubtful, has a further and special interest of its own. For the first time in the history of the present Parliament, a Liberal member, elected in a period of popular excitement unknown till then in this generation, confesses that he can no longer support even the general policy of the Government, resigns his seat, and appeals afresh to his constituents as a Conservative candidate. It is impossible to blame Mr. MARRIOTT for the step which he has taken. It would be more just to blame a good many others who are in the habit of voting on a division with the Government for not taking a similar step. When a member of Parliament finds that he disagrees, not with one or two of the measures of his party, but with the whole drift and tenor of its policy, he cannot honestly retain his seat. In resigning it, avowing his change of mind, and seeking re-election in a new character, he is only acting a candid and manly part. His conduct is the more to be commended because it is seldom for a man's political advantage (to whatever party he may belong) thus singly to dissociate himself from those with whom he has hitherto acted.

Mr. MARRIOTT's conversion from Liberalism into Conservatism is, we believe, only a sample of large numbers of similar conversions during the last few years. We have frequently maintained—and the fact is now too obvious to be disputed—that both the Liberal and the Conservative parties have of late years changed their characters. There is, therefore, nothing inconsistent in the conduct of a politician who ten years ago was able honestly to support the Liberal party, but who now finds himself out of harmony with it. Personal liberty, for example, was at one time supposed to be under the special protection of the Liberal party. But Local Option, for which Mr. MARRIOTT's opponent is now ready to vote, is only one of the vexatious and oppressive measures which are supported by important sections of the Liberal party, and to which the country may one day have to submit at the hands of a so-called Liberal Government. There are, again, important principles which were at one time supposed to be held in common by both parties, which therefore had no weight in determining a man's preference for one party to another, but which now are chiefly represented on the Conservative side of the House. Such, for example, is the principle of the rights of property in general and of landed property in particular, which no man who has watched recent legislation and the recent declarations of important members of the Liberal party can believe to be as safe in Liberal as in Conservative hands. Such, again, is the question of the safety and honour of the Empire—a question compared to which all others which divide parties are insignificant. During the lifetime of Lord PALMERSTON no one doubted that this question would be treated from the same point of view by him and by the late Lord DERBY, whichever of the two happened to be in office. A man zealous for the fair fame and Imperial greatness of England could then see a Liberal Government in office without fear that the one would be tarnished and the other endangered. Is that so now? Look at Egypt; look at the Transvaal; look at the whole course of Liberal policy towards Russia; look at the conduct of the Liberal party, almost to a man, during the two years of peril and anxiety which preceded the Treaty of Berlin. Whether in office or out of office, the Liberal party has borne itself in reference to this greatest of all questions as it would certainly not have borne itself twenty years ago. A man who supported the Liberal party then is not inconsistent if he opposes it now. For the party was one thing then, and it is quite another thing now.

Mr. MARRIOTT's conversion, it is true, has taken only four years to accomplish. But these four years have been full of events which have probably brought about a similar change of mind in more members of Parliament than would like to acknowledge it. One important fact, too, has now been made evident to the country. In 1880 we were all constantly assured that the Radical (if it is not better to call them revolutionary) elements in the Liberal party would be held in check by their Whig allies; and thousands of votes were won by this assurance. On this point the country is now undeceived. Neither consistency, nor self-respect, nor even self-interest, has prevented the Whigs from submitting to be used just as the Radicals please. They have swallowed doctrines as distasteful to them as to any one on the Conservative side of the House; and they have helped to set an example of agrarian legislation which may one day be used with disastrous effect on themselves. A man who calls himself a Liberal on the understanding that the Whig element prevails in the Liberal counsels is in no way inconsistent if he declines to do so when he finds that the Whig is a mere tool in Radical hands. For the difference between the Whig and the Radical is far greater than the difference between the Whig and the Conservative. But, easy as it is to justify on such grounds as these any secessions from the Liberal ranks, the great interest excited by the Brighton election lies in the fact that Mr. MARRIOTT is best known as a vigorous opponent of the Caucus—of the system, that is to say, which aims at making each member of Parliament the mere mouthpiece and voting instrument of a committee of his constituents, which committee is itself directed by a central wire-puller, to order the member how he shall speak, act, and vote. A system better calculated to impair the integrity of politicians, and to exclude from public life men of honour and spirit, can hardly be imagined; and on this ground alone, which ought to be common to both parties alike, we could wish Mr. MARRIOTT every success.

Mr. MARRIOTT has an able and energetic opponent in Mr. ROMER, one of whose disadvantages, however, is that he has been hitherto almost unknown in Brighton. To make up for this defect he swallows the Liberal creed whole, and is even ready to concede or to consider propositions which many staunch Liberals have hitherto found little to their taste. He is willing to support the principle of Local Option, than which few greater interferences with private liberty have been proposed in recent times; and he is willing at least to coquet with the Anti-Vaccinators, who interpret private liberty to mean the free dissemination of disease among children too helpless to protect themselves. By his first concession he has won the support of the Good Templars, but by the second has, at least so far, failed to win the hearty allegiance of the Anti-Vaccinators. On this subject an interesting and instructive letter appeared in the Times and other papers of Wednesday last. It had been asserted that Mr. ROMER's declarations as to his being open to conviction on this question, though he had not studied it in its medical bearings, had contented the Anti-Vaccinators, and that they consequently meant to support him in a body. Mr. TEBB, the author of the letter to which we refer, writes, however, to the papers to say that he and his Anti-Vaccinating friends are far indeed from being satisfied with Mr. ROMER's declarations. Indeed, they propose to withhold their votes altogether, unless between Wednesday and the day of election Mr. ROMER's researches into the subject (which he has not hitherto investigated) have convinced him, against the judgment of the vast majority of scientific experts, that vaccination does more harm than good to the human frame. Three days is a short time in which to master so complex a subject, especially when it has to be studied in the turmoil of an election; and if Mr. ROMER is able to give satisfactory and timely assurances to the Anti-Vaccinating party in Brighton, he must possess either a phenomenal quickness of intellect or a readiness, far from phenomenal, to win votes as a candidate by concession which he would hardly make as a private individual. The Liberal party in Brighton is straining every nerve to secure Mr. MARRIOTT's defeat; and if, in spite of all, he is again returned to Parliament, his success will be another proof that the country has reconsidered the verdict which it rashly gave in 1880.

JAMAICA AND THE COLONIAL OFFICE.

A DIFFERENCE which has arisen between some of the inhabitants of Jamaica and the Colonial Office will not be settled by reference to familiar Liberal commonplaces. Lord DERBY had some time since assented in general terms to the proposal that representative government shall be partially restored after an interval of eighteen years; but a despatch to Sir HENRY NORMAN, the Governor, in which he states his more definite conclusions, has given great offence; and the indignation of the malcontents is expressed with the vigour which characterizes dissatisfied colonists. Moderate politicians at home will be inclined to approve, not without a feeling of envy, the sound principles which Lord DERBY propounds for the guidance of electoral reformers. He wishes for further information to enable him to establish a franchise which will admit voters qualified for the trust by knowledge and education, so as to ensure the representation of all interests. HER MAJESTY'S Government, whatever may be its policy in England, has no intention of conferring in Jamaica political power on an ignorant and irresponsible rabble. It is much to be wished that Lord DERBY could frame and carry a Reform Bill for the United Kingdom without being hampered by his colleagues or by the Caucus. The lowest class in Jamaica is not more ignorant or more violent than the lowest class in Ireland, and it is incomparably more loyal. Even the agitators who condemn Lord DERBY'S scheme are willing that part of the Legislature should be nominated by the Governor, and that he should retain his veto on legislation. The modern doctrine that all political power should be restricted to the recipients of weekly wages has not penetrated to the West Indies.

A protest or answer to the obnoxious despatch raises objections which are not directly connected with the franchise. The promoters of the agitation are apparently confident that if their demands are granted they can control the elections. The main point in dispute is the proportion which the nominated members of the Council are to bear to their elected colleagues. At present there are nine official and eight non-official members, all appointed by the Governor. Lord DERBY is willing that the non-official councillors shall be elected by constituencies to be determined hereafter; but at present he declines to increase their actual or relative numbers. For the scheme which he has prepared he quotes the precedent of British Guiana, where a similar arrangement appears to work conveniently. He also offers that in ordinary cases the official members shall not take part in financial votes or discussions, though the Governor will retain the right of requiring their presence whenever he thinks it desirable. The opponents of the Government plan profess to think that the official members ought to be responsible for the financial administration, though the object would be scarcely attained if they were habitually outvoted. The real contention relates to the composition of the majority of the Council, as it would be highly undesirable that the Governor should in ordinary circumstances exercise his veto. When a deliberative Assembly consists of two independent and antagonistic elements, the rights of the minority tend to degenerate into fictions. Ex-officio members of an English Board of Guardians are for the most part systematically excluded from all share in the disposal of patronage.

The former Constitution of Jamaica, which still maintains a suspended existence, could boast of the respectable antiquity of two hundred years. An Assembly of forty-seven members elected by constituencies with a property qualification possessed the usual Parliamentary attributes, while the Governor of course represented the Crown. When Jamaica became an English possession in the time of CROMWELL, there could be no question of extending political privileges to negro slaves. In later generations, the planters who controlled legislation naturally opposed all measures for the prevention of the slave trade or for the relief or emancipation of slaves. The Constitution, which ostensibly resembled that of England, gave exclusive power to the dominant race; and after emancipation it was obviously impossible to redress the grievance by giving votes to the freedmen. The contumacious resistance of the planters and their Assembly to the philanthropic legislation of the mother-country induced Lord MELBOURNE'S Government, about the year 1839, to bring in a Bill for suspending the Constitution of Jamaica. The case of the Government is powerfully stated in some articles which Mr. SPEDDING, who had formerly been in the Colonial Office, republished, from the Edinburgh Review, shortly before his death. In substance the charge against the Assembly was that, exclusively representing the planters, it could not be trusted with the protection of the coloured population. The experience of many countries has since proved that Parliamentary institutions are ill suited to the needs of divided and heterogeneous communities. The planters would have done wisely in surrendering their privileges, at least for a time; but, with the aid of the Conservatives in England, they organized a successful opposition to a feeble and almost moribund Government. It was after a virtual defeat on the Jamaica Bill that Lord MELBOURNE resigned, with the result to the party of incurring further discredit in returning to office by means of the famous Bedchamber Plot.

The Whigs were not disposed to court a second defeat by persevering with the Jamaica Bill; and Sir ROBERT PEEL was unfortunately pledged by his previous action to maintain the Constitution; but the relations of the Assembly to the coloured people and to the Home Government became more and more unsatisfactory, till in the autumn of 1865 a disturbance, which was rather a riot than an insurrection, was suppressed by the local Government with merciless severity. Although the coloured rioters who had committed some excesses offered little or no resistance to the authorities, the planters were at last thoroughly frightened. A Commission which was sent to Jamaica in the following year recommended in substance the same measures which had been proposed a quarter of a century before by the Whig Government, and, with the express or tacit consent of the Assembly and of its constituents, the island was provisionally reduced to the condition of a Crown Colony. The reasons for the change were simple and conclusive. The coloured people were disaffected, not to the Crown, but to the local Legislature, which represented only the survivors or representatives of the former slave-owners. It was impossible to try the remedy of a wide extension of the suffrage which would reverse the position of the two races. The discretion of a Governor, assisted by a small Council in which the official members formed the majority, was the obvious mode of securing both sections of the community from oppression and disorder. The Imperial Parliament judiciously abstained from fixing a term for the duration of the experiment; but the arrangement was never intended to last longer than the circumstances which had rendered it necessary. It is not surprising that after a considerable interval a demand for the restoration of representative government should be preferred by a generation which imperfectly remembers former difficulties and complications.

Lord DERBY has probably good reason for the assumption that in the course of eighteen years the number of persons who would be entitled to the franchise under a moderate property qualification must have been largely increased. He undoubtedly exercises a sound judgment in requiring full information on the statistical facts which would regulate his decision. When classes are sharply defined and permanently divided, especially by race and colour, there is always a risk that the majority or dominant section of the community may be unsympathetic and intolerant. It may be inferred from Lord DERBY'S language that the franchise will for the present be narrowly limited; but former experience proved that in Jamaica station and property afford no sufficient guarantee for impartial justice. When the subject has been more fully discussed in England, the nature and object of the present movement will be better understood. It seems that Lord DERBY admits and offers to redress one grievance which forms a plausible subject of complaint. The elected portion of the future Legislature will, except in extraordinary circumstances, control revenue and expenditure. It may be expected that a judicious Governor will not be disinclined gradually to extend the influence of the representative part of the Council, although the ultimate control will remain with himself. It would seem that under Lord DERBY'S system the Governor will be sufficiently protected against factious usurpation. He will have a casting vote and a veto, and the majority of the Council, consisting of official members, is bound to vote according to his direction, though, except for special reasons, he will not interfere with their independent judgment. To these parts of the scheme the advocates of elective government offer no direct opposition. They perhaps wish that the heads of departments should have seats in the Council, and they are not disposed to grudge them the right of voting as long as they can themselves secure a majority. It is doubtful whether they hope to influence the choice by the Governor of his Ministers, which would reduce the power of the Crown to a fiction. It will be necessary to take precautions against the revival of an oligarchy which was reduced by its own defects to the necessity of abdication.

C. S. C.

THE gaiety of nations can no longer be eclipsed by the loss even of the dearest head and the silence of the wittiest voice. A gaiety cannot be eclipsed which has already gone out like a candle. But all English lovers of humour, of wit, of a genial and not too earnest temperament, all who can admire scholarship worn "lightly like a flower," are regretting the death of Mr. CHARLES STEWART CALVERLEY. As "C. S. C.," the author of Verses and Translations and of Fly Leaves was well known to every one who liked mirth. He had gained what the lover in his favourite THEOCRITUS coveted—his "name was in the mouths of all, "and chiefly in those of the young." As a matter of course, therefore, it is not in that useful compilation Men of the Time. Mr. CALVERLEY was certainly one of the most successful and popular poets of an age in which few poets see many editions. His Fly Leaves is out of print, introuvable, except by a rare accident. Fly Leaves is a book which people keep when it comes into their possession. It does not find its way, like the mournful "remainders" of poets greater and less than Mr. CALVERLEY, to the cheap bookstalls. Verses and Translations is in its eighth edition. Translations (English and Latin), being serious, has not been popular. Mr. CALVERLEY was at work on a new edition of his poetical rendering of THEOCRITUS before his death. These four books make up, we believe, all his literary baggage. It is not a large quantity; the author was indolent as well as humorous; but Fly Leaves and Verses and Translations will long float down the stream of time.

Mr. CALVERLEY's history was not eventful, but he became the centre of many floating myths. His college days must have been about 1852; his amusing Carmen Seculare is dated 1853. His family name was BLAYDS, and as BLAYDS he is still remembered at Balliol. Many distinguished men, as even her rivals will admit, have passed through Balliol in the last thirty years, or, by 'r Lady, two score. The College has entertained Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD, CLOUGH, Mr. SWINBURNE, and a host of minor stars in politics, law, literature, and so forth. Of all these distinguished persons, including famed old batsmen and oars of long ago, we believe that "BLAYDS" alone left a tradition in college. Freshmen when they come up hear stories of BLAYDS, of his repartees, his verses, his freaks, his admired and unusual powers of maddening the Dons. His fame survives as that of the cleverest, wittiest, and most reckless of freshmen. Other undergraduates have "leaped over a wall," but only he thought it advisable to remind the Dons, in scriptural phrase, of his triumph. BLAYDS migrated to Cambridge; took the name, by which he is best known, of CALVERLEY; became a Fellow of Christ's and a centre of Cambridge, as he had been of Oxford, fable.

Of literary ambition Mr. CALVERLEY seems to have had very little. He possessed a true taste in poetry. Perhaps this might scarcely be gathered from a perusal of his Homeric translations (1866). He was hampered by his use of blank verse. Only one or two men in a generation, or in several generations, can write blank verse. Apparently C. S. C. was not one of these.

> What God, then, bade those twain stand forth and strive?
> Zeus's and Leto's son, He, angered sore
> Against the King, sent pestilence abroad.

This does not adequately render the music of HOMER. No verse does, perhaps; but Lord TENNYSON's, in its style, is musical, and POPE's is adequate, in its style; whereas Mr. CALVERLEY's scarcely soars above COWPER's or WRIGHT's or Lord DERBY's. But, if he could not move in the fetters of blank verse, he wrote lyric measures—and, in fact, most rhyming measures, including the Spenserian—with wonderful ease, fluency, and skill. His THEOCRITUS, in which he employed many metres, is probably the best rendering of the poet we possess, though occasionally the modern note, and the note of cleverness (so antagonistic to poetry), are audible.

It is not by his serious classic work, nor by his elegant translations of English verse into Latin, that Mr. CALVERLEY's name will live. The delightful grave buffoonery of the Carmen Seculare alone would float a college reputation. In that description of winter at Cambridge all the familiar tags of Latin verse are woven into a comic whole with amazing skill. In parody C. J. C. was unmatched. Most parodists are dull people, like the person who lately turned Lady Clare Vere de Vere into a clumsy series of insults to the LAUREATE. CALVERLEY caught the spirit of his original, without following too closely in his steps. The delightful vagueness of the Grandfather—

> I knew not of what we pondered
> Or made pretty pretence to talk—is a travesty of the whole modern vein of indistinct diffuse sentiment. The story of the "bit o' a chit o' a boy" is dear to all men save members of the Browning Society. The skit on Miss INGELOW can only fail to divert people ignorant of the original. The parodies were never ill-natured. There was no ill-nature, nothing but healthy, open humour, fun, and very unusual command of verse, in the composition of CALVERLEY's Muse. What comic Muse is left to bewail him in accents of unwonted regret? Alas! the art of mirthful verse is all but lost, and there are few congenial singers to contribute towards Le Tombeau de C. S. C.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE reported revolt of part of the French shareholders in the Suez Canal against M. DE LESSEPS, and their determination to oppose the sanction of his agreement with the English shipowners, may or may not be serious as far as that very provisional agreement itself is concerned. But it is certainly not unimportant as bearing on the general question of the management of the Canal, which (pace Lord GRANVILLE) the agreement most assuredly does not finally settle. It may be very improbable that on this particular occasion the shareholders will prove indocile to M. DE LESSEPS; but clearly there is nothing impossible in it, and this illustrates the first great anomaly of the matter. All similar monopolies have their monopoly tempered either directly or indirectly; indirectly by competition, directly by the action of tribunals such as the English Railway Commission. Apparently the Suez Canal is free from either of these checks. M. DE LESSEPS, backed by Mr. GLADSTONE, protests that no competition with him is possible; M. DE LESSEPS's shareholders, in some considerable number, conceivably in a majority, protest that they are final arbiters in the matter of their own profits. Whence it would appear that, if the shareholders choose to charge any ship any sum they choose, there is nothing to prevent them. This, as EUCLID would observe, is absurd.

But there is something still more absurd. We have not noticed (we do not know whether it has been stated) what total of shares is represented by the Parisian meeting of protest. As the immediate supporters of M. DE LESSEPS are not likely to have been in the ranks of the malcontents, and as the entire amount held by persons other than the English Government is little over half the capital, it follows that considerably less than half must have been represented. The English Government holds, as has just been observed, not considerably less, but only a little less, than half; yet supposing the malcontents to be able to muster a bare majority of the shares other than those belonging to England—that is to say, something slightly over a quarter of the capital—it is clear that they might in the long run impose their policy on the Company. In other words, the holders of nearly three-quarters would be powerless against the holders of just over one-quarter. This absolutely preposterous state of things is quite untouched by the proposed agreement, and that agreement would be of very dubious force to prevent such a minority as has been described from reverting to the present policy and tariff—it would certainly be powerless to prevent them from so ordering the future policy and tariff as to make the agreement itself of none effect. So long as this state of things continues there can be no guarantee for the satisfactory administration of the Canal. All this has of course been pointed out before. But the value of the present incident is that it exemplifies and impresses the inconvenience in an apt and timely fashion. Whether it be a likely result or not, it is by no means certain that the rejection of the agreement would be an untoward result for England. For the remedy which it applies is merely topical and palliative, and leaves untouched both the main anomalies and founts of evil in the Canal constitution. The first of these is the evil of unqualified monopoly in the hands of irresponsible persons; the second, the practical annihilation of the rights of the holders of nearly half the capital. Alter or remove these, and the merely minor inconveniences of tariff and administration would very quickly redress themselves. Leave these untouched, and no redressing of the actual minor evils can be either thorough or permanent, while fresh ones are pretty certain to grow up. Lord GRANVILLE's complacent optimism in reference to the second agreement is from this point of view nearly as mischievous as the reckless concessions of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Childers in the first. Both, from the commercial point of view, leave an anomalous, an irresponsible, and an arbitrarily constituted lady sovereign alike over the rights of their customers and over the rights of their partners in the undertaking; while both entirely fail to obviate the special political objections which England may justly urge to the present government of the Canal. The leasing of the Canal by England which the revolters are said to suggest is a proposition too recent, and reported too little in detail, to admit of full criticism at this moment. It may be said however at once that, speaking generally, it presents several advantages over any plan yet proposed.

COVERT-SHOOTING, PAST AND PRESENT.

THERE is no more confirmed laudator temporis acti than what is generally known as a sportsman of the old school. Every modern innovation is looked upon by him with suspicion and distrust; and if by chance any invention or practice of more recent times should meet with his modified approval, it will generally be qualified by the assertion that the idea is merely a development of something which was perfectly well known and understood in his younger days, but which there were good reasons for not adopting at the time. The so-called sportsmen of the present day are a degenerate lot compared with what they used to be in his own time; there is no such thing as real sport nowadays; and so on ad infinitum.

It is to shooting more than to other field sports that such old-world criticisms are usually applied. Hunting, as long as it exists, will always remain much the same in principle. The pace may be faster and the hours later than in the good old days when our long-coated forefathers took the field at early dawn, and returned home in the middle of the day to spend a long winter's afternoon and evening over their port and their punch-bowl; but in other respects hunting will always remain a sport that can be indulged in according to the individual tastes of the sportsman. There can be no doubt, however, that a great change has taken place both in the theory and practice of shooting during the last forty or fifty years, and more particularly in that branch of the sport known as covert-shooting. The manner in which this pastime was carried on about the beginning of the present century has been made familiar to every one through the medium of the old sporting prints. We all know the long-gaitered, drab-coated gentleman, with a ruddy, smooth-shaven face and a tall hat, the tightness of whose many-buttoned garments must have made active exercise somewhat distressing, pausing, in a struggle through a sort of Indian jungle of underwood, to take a steady aim, with one eye carefully closed, at a woodcock which, according to the perspective, should be some hundred and fifty yards away, while a brace of open-mouthed spaniels spring excitedly forward, and in the middle distance another smiling gentleman, in a green coat this time, by way of variety, stands with his gun at the "port" to await the course of events. Or he is depicted in the act of almost treading on a species of bird of paradise, supposed by courtesy to represent a cock pheasant, crouching in the aforesaid jungle, of the immediate proximity of which the spaniels appear altogether unconscious, but which we feel will create a most startling effect when ultimately roused from its lair and well on the wing. But, in any case, the long-gaitered person hunted his game in a painstaking, business-like manner, much after the fashion of a Red Indian, and, whether alone or in the company of another tight-coated sportsman, his bag depended very much on his own exertions. To him an organized and disciplined body of beaters, such as may be seen at any average shooting party of the present day, was a thing unknown. As a rule, indeed, the presence of even a gamekeeper or other attendant seems to have been dispensed with, and one is tempted to speculate how our friend would have disposed of any game that he might be so fortunate as to secure. Occasionally, it is true, he carries a game-bag, but this is the exception rather than the rule. He may, to be sure, have used "hare-pockets." But the weight of a hare on each side, to say nothing of anything else, must have been a serious impediment to locomotion, and, besides giving the sportsman the appearance of a clown in a pantomime who has stolen a couple of geese and a string or two of sausages, must have rendered anything like quick shooting almost an impossibility.

It is rather a remarkable fact that there should be so few artistic records of the manner in which shooting is carried on at the present day. At the period of which we are speaking, every phase of the sport was elaborately represented by artists of more or less capability; and, to say nothing of London print-shops, it is almost impossible to enter an old country house, or even a country inn, without coming across one or more works of art of this description. But one may walk the whole length of Piccadilly and Bond Street without finding a pictorial representation of a modern "shoot." The few that do exist are well known, but do not appear to be sufficiently sought after to have made it worth the while of publishers and print-sellers to reproduce them in a popular form. This is all the more remarkable, inasmuch as there never was a time when other branches of sport were more profusely illustrated than at present. Not only does every description of hunting and racing print abound everywhere, but the shop windows are full of original sketches, of more or less artistic merit, which at any rate are improvements on the stiff, wooden productions of former years. It is true that the surroundings of modern shooting do not lend themselves to artistic effect in the same degree as of old. There is nothing very suggestive of the picturesque in a long line of guns and beaters manœuvring in a turnip-field; and the spectacle of a smartly-dressed gentleman, standing at the end of a plantation with his loader behind him, does not afford any great scope for the painter's imagination. Yet, even in these degenerate days of sport, there are occasional incidents that might well be turned to account by a clever artist. To a real sportsman, the pleasures of covert-shooting depend not so much on the number of shots he gets in a day as on their variety, and this will depend in a great measure on the nature of the ground. Where, as is often the case, the woods are low and the ground perfectly level, so that the pheasants fly out almost at the muzzles of the guns, or, at any rate, but a few feet over the heads of the shooters, there is really very little satisfaction in killing them, and the sport becomes simple butchery. And as coverts of this description are generally well adapted for the rearing of game, it is in such places that the enormous bags are made which have brought the practice of battue-shooting into such disrepute. But in a rough and broken country, where the coverts lie on hill-sides or steep banks, it is a very different affair. There is usually some hard and rough walking to be done, instead of the lazy saunter along smooth rides or gravel walks; and not only are a sure foot and a quick eye indispensable to success, but a very considerable amount of skill and practice are also needed. To bring down a "tall rocketer," sweeping down the wind from the top of a high bank, is by no means an easy performance, especially if the sportsman, as will very likely be the case, be at that moment balancing himself on a narrow footpath or floundering among slippery rocks at the bottom of a gully. A shot obtained in this way would, in many cases, afford a subject for a pretty sketch, and would certainly give as much scope to the artist as the old-fashioned "pot shot" with which we are so familiar. But, somehow or other, the subject does not seem to have commended itself to our sporting artists; and the sportsman of the twentieth century—if by that time such a thing as sport should still exist—will have little to guide him in the way of pictorial records as to how his more immediate ancestors were in the habit of killing their game.

But, however unfavourable may be the comparisons which the old-fashioned sportsman may draw between the present system of covert-shooting and that in vogue in his youth, it is a question whether the former does not, on the whole, afford more enjoyment than the latter, especially if regarded from a social point of view. To go out, as in old days, with a dog and a gun, and fight through briars and thorns all day in the hope of bringing home as much game as you can conveniently carry about you, may possibly be a more praiseworthy form of recreation than to form one of a party of gunners who have little more to do than to shoot the game that is driven up to them. But, after all, the primary object of shooting, like that of any other field sport, is to provide healthy amusement; and, if this can be secured as well in one way as the other, it is difficult to see any just grounds for invidious comparison. The physical aspects of covert-shooting, moreover, have changed very much during the last fifty years. Not only have the old-fashioned game-coverts almost ceased to exist, but the habits of their denizens seem to have undergone a change, and they cannot be sought for in the same manner as of old. High farming has in most districts done away with the old double hedgerows, forming the best possible covert for game of all kinds; copses have been grubbed up; and everywhere, in fact, there is less natural shelter for game than there used to be. The result is that both pheasants and partridges have taken to "running" in a manner which would have been scorned by their ancestors, and that they have to be circumvented accordingly. Here and there, in remote woodlands, it is still possible to enjoy a day's sport in the old style, with spaniels or beagles, but, as a rule, it is now found easier to rear game in smaller woods where hunting with dogs is altogether out of the question. By the time, indeed, that a sportsman of the old school would have got halfway through such a covert with his dog and his gun, almost every pheasant in it—every cock pheasant, at any rate—would have quietly run out at the other end, and he would very likely not get a single shot in a wood that he knew to have been full of game. In such cases the only way to get any sport is to make use of beaters, assisted by "stops" at certain points to prevent the game from running out. This, broadly speaking, constitutes the groundwork of the much-vituperated system of battue-shooting. But it is obvious that a system which is equally applicable to a "chasse" of either the smallest or the largest dimensions can scarcely with justice be condemned, because in the latter case it has occasionally been abused, and what ought to be a sport manlike and healthy recreation has degenerated into a mere slaughter. This, however, opens a wide subject, which it would not be convenient to discuss at present. But it may fairly be claimed for the modern as against the ancient style of covert-shooting, that it affords greater scope for social enjoyment, and has, in fact, become the raison d'être of one of the pleasantest aspects of English country-house life. In the old days, when an ordinary country squire went out shooting with his friend, his ideas did not as a rule go beyond his actual sport, or at any rate the dinner which was to follow it; and it would not have occurred to him to make it an occasion for filling his house with a mixed party of both sexes, some of whom, at least, would look upon the shooting as a mere accessory. All this has doubtless in many cases been overdone, in the same way as the shooting itself. The introduction of ladies, for instance, into an actual shooting party, is a questionable experiment at all times, and even the charm of their presence at luncheon-time will scarcely be appreciated by a keen sportsman; while "walking with the guns," which a few years ago had become the practice at many fashionable réunions, has now been generally admitted to be not only a serious drawback to the sport, but to be productive of but little satisfaction to any one concerned. But there are few things more enjoyable in their way than a well-assorted party at a well-appointed country-house, where there is good shooting for the men and pleasant society for the ladies; and there can be no doubt that if, through any combination of circumstances, covert-shooting, as carried on at present, should be interfered with to any appreciable extent, a serious blow would be struck at country society in general, and one of the few compensating advantages of an English winter would be done away with. The operation of the Ground Game Act has had a marked effect upon the lately-ended shooting season; the hare, in many parts of the country, will soon become as extinct as the bustard; and game-preservers will have to trust more than ever to the artificial rearing of pheasants to secure even the most moderate amount of sport for themselves and their friends. It is impossible to say what form the next agitation against game may assume; but as long as there are woods left in the country, and until the relations between landlord and tenant have been altogether broken down by mischievous legislation, it is to be hoped that the good old sport of covert-shooting will not come to an end.

GAMING-HOUSES FORTY YEARS AGO.

A LATE gambling prosecution in the West End of London has recalled many memories of the past to those who can remember the days of Crockford's, and during the past month plenty of long-forgotten stories about gaming have been told in the bow-windows of St. James's Street clubs. Comparatively few of us can recollect Crockford's, but those who can know what an important part it played in social life forty or fifty years ago. Nor was Crockford's the only place of gambling in the West End in those days. There were at least fifteen regular gaming-houses known to the police in the parishes of St. James's, St. George's, St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and St. Ann's, in the year 1844, besides numbers of cigar-shops, billiard-rooms, coffee-houses, and public-houses, in which gaming-tables were kept in back rooms. Minor gambling-houses, such as those last described, were popularly known by the ugly name of "copper-hells," and were chiefly frequented by City clerks and gentlemen's servants, amongst whom there was, then as always, a great deal of gambling. The practice of gambling has probably brought more ruin to City clerks than to any other class of men. The late Admiral Rous, when examined before a Select Committee of the House of Commons, went so far as to say that "if a man of 100,000*l.* a year loses it, the country will be the better for it; but if persons engaged in mercantile and banking establishments were induced to lose money that does not belong to them, the commercial and banking community would be very much injured." But the Admiral's views were peculiar.

Crockford's itself had had such a run that it was said the proprietor intended to give it up, because there were not enough unbroken gamblers left to make it pay its way. It was calculated that, according to the ordinary chances of the game (hazard), if a man staked the same sum every time the dice were thrown for about a couple of hours, he would lose exactly that amount. The rules of the Club were not drawn up by Mr. Crockford, but by a committee; and finally Mr. Crockford gave up the Club entirely into the hands of the committee. A bill was filed against him "as a winner of money on certain games" to the amount of 300,000*l.* When examined before the Committee of the House of Commons, he said:—"A nest of informers came about me, and wanted to take 20,000*l.*, and then 10,000*l.*, and I met it in court, and they would not meet me, and so it was all over." Before the same Committee the Chairman of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions gave evidence of "a class of people in the metropolis who live by the prosecution of gaming-houses." These rascals indicted the proprietors of gaming-houses, and then obtained bribes from them on the promise of proceeding no further. This evil was to a great extent abolished by obliging the prosecutor to enter into his own recognisances of 100*l.* to proceed in the case. Another class of men, who lived by the gaming-houses, decoyed what were technically known as "flats" into low gambling-rooms, and after making them half drunk, urged them to play for every farthing they had about them. These fellows often received twenty-five per cent. of the sums lost by their victims to the proprietors of the tables. Many men were also employed to watch the proceedings of the detectives and inspectors of police. A well-known superintendent used to say that he never left his station at night to go westward without being followed by gaming-house spies. Crockford's was a private Club, many members of which never gambled; and according to the law, as it stood in those days, there were supposed to be some difficulties in the way of dealing with it. There were, however, many small gaming-rooms almost within a stone's throw of Crockford's, ten being open every night, except on Sundays, between Bennett Street and Jermyn Street. In most rooms of this class a billiard or other table, covered with a green cloth, had a thin hazard cloth laid upon it, and when there was an alarm of police this was whipped off and hidden or carried away. Counters, too, were generally used; so that the police could not swear that the players whom they found had been playing for money, although it was well known that each counter, according to its markings, represented a certain sum of money, for which it was bought and sold before and after play. Even at Crockford's itself counters were used at one time; but Mr. Crockford found the aristocracy very slack in the matter of payment unless they produced all the money they played for in cash; and, as the use of counters had led to easy-going practices about cheques which were dishonoured, and I.O.U.'s which were never paid, a rule was made that cash, and cash only, should in future be the medium of gambling in the Club.

An entry into one of the small gaming-rooms was no easy matter, and even when made it was seldom effectual. Several doors would have to be forced open, and by the time this was done no one would be found in the house, with the exception of some women and children sleeping soundly in their beds—although a supper-table laid for several people in one room, and general disorder in another, would give a broad hint as to what had been going on. The police once broke into a gaming-house in St. James's Street, and found a supper-table, a hazard-table, and a roulette-wheel; but the only living occupants of the house were "two females" and some children, all in their beds. On "the second-floor back," however, they found an open window, with a chair placed before it, while outside were two ladders, secured with ropes, by which the gamblers had effected their escape into a court or passage leading into Piccadilly. At the orders of Sir Richard (then Mr.) Mayne, a superintendent of police, accompanied by eighteen constables, made a raid on a gaming-house kept in Bury Street, St. James's, soon after one o'clock one morning in May 1844. On ringing the bell the door was opened, when the doorkeeper and another man, formerly a policeman, were at once arrested. The superintendent then opened a side door into a passage, across which was a very strong door, cased inside with strong iron binders and bolts. This door was forced with sledge-hammers and crowbars. In a large gaming-room, quite at the back of the premises, were two men, and on the tiles of the roof one other man was found. Before the entry was made, some police-officers were placed at the rear of the house, so that nobody could have escaped that way. The hiding-place or means of exit of the rest of the players remained a mystery. Three roulette-tables and one hazard-table were found in this house. On another occasion, during the same month, the police made a raid on a gaming establishment in Piccadilly, and captured four persons, but the following note is added to the superintendent's report:—"Has reason to think notice had been given, and parties escaped by two trap-doors upon roof; one of which doors communicates with the —— Club-house." In the report of a police entrance into a house in Albemarle Street, we find that "Several of the prisoners having, at the time of entry into the gaming-house, attempted to escape by crossing the roofs of adjoining houses, and having taken their gaming implements with them, which were found on the party-wall, between the roofs of the houses, the police not being able to prove those implements to have been in the house, the prisoners were discharged." A large gaming-table had been found on the previous night at the adjoining house, and on that occasion also a man was arrested on the roof. Roof-climbing was apparently a necessary accomplishment for gamblers forty years ago. One of the most respectable gaming-houses was in Jermyn Street, and was commonly known as "The Cottage." The police found both a hazard-table and a roulette-table in this house, and arrested four men in it, all of whom were fined. Sir Richard Mayne believed that in many cases lights were put in houses in order to deceive the police and induce them to make a forcible entrance, under the impression that they were gambling-houses, and thus lay themselves open to an action for trespass.

After a gambling-house in Leicester Square had been invaded by the police in 1840, the proprietor was fined 100*l.*, two croupiers were fined 50*l.* each, several players 5*l.* each, and the porter was fined a sovereign. In the year 1843, the occupants of a gaming-house in King Street, St. James's, met with more severe treatment. The lessee was sent to the treadmill for six months and fined 100*l.*; the porter was sent for six months to the treadmill without a fine; and two other men, who seem to have been hangers-on or touts to the establishment, were each sent to the treadmill for four months and fined 50*l.*

It was not only in London that gaming-tables were kept forty years ago. During most of the principal race-meetings numbers of gaming-rooms were kept open in the nearest towns. A magistrate gave evidence that when the races were going on at Warwick, he had seen gambling going on in nearly every house in one particular street "with the windows open." Some years earlier, during Doncaster races, forty or fifty gaming-houses were kept open in the town without the least pretence of secrecy; indeed men were stationed in front of these houses offering cards advertising "Roulette, Bank 1,000*l.*," or whatever it might be, to the passers-by. At last a determined effort was made by the Government to suppress roulette and hazard at race-meetings, and a certain official of high standing especially distinguished himself by his zeal in the holy war. On the evening of the Derby day he asked his son what he had heard at the races. "I heard everybody d—ning you," was the pleasant answer. At the period of which we are writing there do not appear to have been many gaming-tables at Newmarket. Yet in the time of Charles II. more money was said to be lost at Newmarket through play than through racing, and each of the King's mistresses had a house of her own in the town in which she kept a gaming-table. Nevertheless a famous Act against excessive gaming was passed during his reign.

There can be no doubt that while Crockford's existed, it was a crying evil; but it may interest some people to learn that when Crockford's was in full force, there was little or no gambling at the ordinary clubs, whereas a few years previously the play in the clubs, at hazard and games of that character, had been very high. Whether there is less gambling at present among English people than there was forty years ago, it is not easy to decide. We certainly have no Crockford's, but we have a very fast train to Monte Carlo, where numbers of English crowd the tables. As to what may go on in certain clubs at the present time we have no wish to inquire, nor do we wish to enlarge on the amount of play for something more than small sums now going on in private drawing-rooms, which ladies appear to enjoy at least as much as men; but it must be remembered that betting on horse races is much heavier now than it was forty years ago. On the other hand, in the year 1844 both Mr. Tattersall and Mr. Crockford gave evidence that the betting on racing was far lighter than it had been, which goes far to show that when there was much gambling at gaming-houses there was less on the Turf. Altogether it would be difficult to make any exact estimate of the difference between the amount of gambling in 1844 and 1884; but it would probably be pretty safe to prophesy that in 1924 there will be about as much gambling in one form or another as there is at present.

PROPOSED VANDALISM AT WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

MR. FERGUSSON has long been known to the archæological world as one of the boldest and most self-confident of theorists, whose delight is to come before the public with some new theory as to the date and purpose of a building or ancient monument, upsetting all the conclusions of previous writers, and demanding the acceptance of his solitary verdict as the dictum of infallibility. But however much we may be constrained to differ from Mr. Fergusson on those and other points, they are matters on which he has as much right to have an opinion of his own as any one else. But it is another matter when theory threatens to become practice; and no less a victim has passed into the cells of the Inquisition than Westminster Abbey.

The note of warning has been sounded in the Builder of February 16th, which was privileged to publish Mr. Fergusson's scheme for spoiling the Abbey. The overcrowding of the interior of Westminster Abbey has been a subject of anxiety for many years past. Many of the existing monuments, including some of the highest artistic and historic interest, are almost invisible. Removals and curtailments have been made, but without much good. To quote Mr. Shaw Lefevre, in the January number of the Nineteenth Century, "The available space in the Abbey is too small for what already exists there; and it is certain that in the future monuments must either be reduced to the smallest busts, to be stuck up wherever a vacant corner can be found and irrespective of their surroundings, as is now too often the case, or the demand for this national recognition must be refused altogether." Fully agreeing that it would be "a most serious misfortune" that such a refusal should become necessary, and thus "a break made in the continuity of this splendid roll of monuments to the great and illustrious men of the Empire," we have long looked with anxiety for a satisfactory solution of the problem. There is no probability of any lessening of this demand; nor, considering how completely "the Abbey" is identified with the highest and most ennobling feelings of Englishmen, could we desire that there should be. It is true that the present Dean of Westminster does not display the same avidity for the interment of departed notoriety which was sometimes a cause of sarcastic remark in regard to his highly-gifted predecessor. But cases will be periodically occurring when the nation will call for a monument in Westminster Abbey, while the power of complying with the demand, consistently with the architecture and uses of the building, will be more and more curtailed. In point of fact there is not proper room for a single additional monument in the Abbey, except perhaps in some of the eastern recesses of Henry VII.'s Chapel.

The scheme proposed by the late Sir G. Scott was to form a kind of "Campo Santo" in immediate connexion with the Abbey, by the erection of a cloister or elongated monumental chapel along the line of the houses on the west side of Old Palace Yard and Abingdon Street, communicating with the Abbey by a covered way passing beneath the flying buttresses of the Chapter House. This plan, though comparatively harmless in itself, as involving no destruction of ancient buildings or undue interference with the existing fabric, is open to not a few objections, financial and artistic. Mr. Shaw Lefevre proposes as a substitute for Sir G. Scott's cloister, a monumental chapel occupying the ground to the east of the lesser cloisters, between them and Old Palace Yard, but "united to the Abbey in the manner proposed by Scott." The plan would only call for the demolition of the houses in Poet's Corner and Old Palace Yard, at a cost of about 80,000*l.*, and in Mr. Lefevre's eyes would be "one of the most splendid improvements in this part of London." We are constrained to add that it would also be one of the most destructive of historical associations on a site where almost every stone illustrates some page in the annals of the nation.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre's plan for relieving the Abbey, which assumes considerable importance when we bear in mind that it emanates from the First Commissioner of Works, brings us to Mr. Fergusson's proposal, which is framed the same idea on a more extended and pretentious scale. In its main outlines Mr. Fergusson's proposal is identical with that of the First Commissioner. He proposes to clear the whole area, both east of the "Little Cloisters," originally the cloisters of the Infirmary of the Abbey—now occupied by what are slightingly called "second-class clerical residences"—up to the Jewel Tower, and to pull down—what, indeed, we could well spare—the houses in Old Palace Yard and Poet's Corner, and erect on the ground thus left vacant a vast aisled edifice, 275 feet in length from north to south, including the vestibule, and 100 feet in breadth, and as many in height to the ridge of the roof. The portentous dimensions of this huge "annexe," which its designer audaciously calls "a new south transept," may be estimated when it is stated that it is larger in every dimension than Ripon Cathedral (exclusive of the transepts), not very much smaller than King's College Chapel, Cambridge, longer and higher than the nave of York Minster, and only six feet less in breadth, and that in every measurement but height it considerably exceeds the nave of the Abbey itself. Is it wasting words to show how completely such a huge addition would throw the whole of the ancient fabric out of scale, and how ruinous it would be to its outline and general effect? Instead of its being an appendage to the Abbey, the Abbey will be an appendage to this cumbrous, self-asserting mass. It required Mr. Fergusson to assert that his new building will "group most pleasingly with the Chapter House and the Abbey," and that "its greatest merit is that it can be made to appear part of the Abbey itself." Such an assertion is contradicted by the ground-plan; while to say that "it is practically throughout mathematically an extension of the south transept," and to give it the name of "the new south transept," is simply to throw dust in people's eyes, in the hope of blinding them to the real character of the design. It is, as the Builder happily terms it, "a verbal illusion," seemingly adopted to convey an idea of a closer union with the original building than its position and arrangements warrant. "Monumental chapel" is the true designation. It is true that, according to Mr. Fergusson's plan, it and the south transept will be entered from the same corridor, curiously playing at hide and seek among the flying buttresses of the Chapter House. But the new building will not touch the walls of the Abbey on any one point, and will be as completely a distinct fabric as St. Margaret's Church is now, and would continue to be if—which is another of Mr. Fergusson's suggestions, though only proposed to be almost reluctantly rejected—it were to be united to the Abbey by a covered way, and Parliament were to decree that burial there was equivalent to burial in the Abbey. However connected the two would be, practically, and we are inclined to believe in popular sentiment also, separate buildings.

Into the architectural features of this monstrous scheme it will be needless to enter. Its position and dimensions are sufficient to ensure its condemnation. It would form a huge nave of seven bays, entered by vast pillared vestibules to the north, with side aisles running round the south end, the style to be the same as in the Abbey itself, from which every detail is to be copied. With his old unreasoning aversion to stone vaults, Mr. Fergusson proposes that the roof of the central aisle at least should be of wood; not, however, a copy of stone groining, like the ceiling at York and the new roofs at Chester and Ripon have, but of the same type of open beams and panelling which is believed to have been exhibited, though at a considerably later date, in St. Stephen's Chapel, and later still in Westminster Hall. To this last, with some little disregard of chronology, Mr. Fergusson refers as showing "how ornamental such a roof may be made."

We must add one word as to the buildings to be swept away in carrying out either Mr. Shaw Lefevre's or Mr. Fergusson's plans, which the latter contemptuously condemns as "second-class clerical residences." It is evident that he can never have examined the site, and that he must be writing in complete ignorance of the history of the Abbey. Among the slighted buildings are the Infirmary Hall, a building of the fifteenth century absolutely complete, including its open roof; the houses on the north side of the Infirmary cloister, formerly the chambers of the sick brethren, the doorways and windows of which remain, with a good deal of mediæval work incorporated in the more modern buildings; and the most valuable relic of all, the nave of St. Catherine's in the Infirmary Chapel, with its south arcade of Transition Norman work still perfect, with the walls of its chancel and its altar still in situ. When it is remembered that, apart from its architectural and archæological interest as an integral portion of the great Benedictine Monastery of Westminster, this chapel was the place of meeting of the twenty-four provincial councils of Westminster, and of the consecration of several of our leading mediæval bishops, among whom we may reckon St. Hugh of Lincoln and Bernard of St. David's; that from this chapel Anselm issued his canons, which included in their denunciations the long locks of laymen and the marriage of the clergy; that here took place the memorable squabble for precedence between the two primates, Richard, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Roger, Archbishop of York, in the presence of the Papal Legate, when, as Fuller has it, "York, finding Canterbury seated on the Legate's right hand, fairly sits himself down on Canterbury's lap—a baby too big to be danced thereon"; and "Canterbury's servants dandled this large child with a witness, who plucked him from thence and buffeted him to purpose"—his fellows beating him with sticks and fists—"baculis et pugnis," writes Gervas, tore off the Archbishop's hood and robes, and dragged him out of the chapel; and that here also Henry III. swore to maintain the privileges of the Church in the presence of the assembled archbishops and bishops, who "dashed their candles stinking and smoking to the ground, with an anathema on any who should violate them"—it is evident that these "second-class clerical residences" have something to urge for their preservation as historical memorials, which we are sure only requires to be known to have its claim allowed.

It may be asked, if this scheme of a monumental chapel is set aside, what alternative can be proposed to relieve the plethora of the Abbey? We ask, Might not the Triforia be thus utilized? Some little while back we showed how extensive these galleries are, and what abundance of room they permit for monuments for a long time to come. Now employed for storing odds and ends, they might claim a nobler use as monumental galleries. They are lofty and well lighted, and broad enough for easy passage to and fro. All they require is to be made readier of access than by the existing newel staircases.

VENDETTA IN NAPLES.

A FOREIGN visitor to Naples who glances through the police reports in one of the local papers will probably form but a poor opinion of the security of the city. He will read, among other things, that from four to five persons are on an average daily found stabbed in the streets, and that those of the victims who are still living almost without exception declare that they are unable to supply any information with respect to their assailants. This in itself is startling; but when he learns that neither the killed nor the wounded have been robbed of a penny, his surprise will increase, and he will not improbably arrive at the conclusion that the town is infested by a band of miscreants who take a disinterested pleasure in murder, and look upon stabbing as a legitimate form of sport. The fact is that these crimes have all their origin in the vendetta, and that the lips of the sufferers are sealed by a sense of honour not more perverse than that which would prevent any gentleman from reporting the name of an opponent by whom he had been wounded in a duel. Both the vendetta and the duel are unquestionably barbarous and immoral; but to take an unfair advantage in either is base, and this is a baseness of which the lowest of the lazzaroni, to do him justice, is rarely guilty, even in his death agony.

The Neapolitans boast that they are not a revengeful people; and this is true if we compare them only with the Corsicans and the Calabrese. They stand too fully under the impression of the moment; they are too light-hearted and also too good-natured to hoard up the memory of an insult as if it were a secret treasure, and to wait and watch patiently for years for an opportunity of wiping it out in blood. Hence family feuds are almost unknown among them, though family is constantly quarrelling with family. Almost as soon as the traveller southwards passes Salerno, he finds himself among a different race. The forms are taller and sturdier, the features more strongly marked, and the movements heavier, but at the same time more decisive; energy is no longer expended in constant gesticulation; the faces of men and women alike are stern, almost forbidding, in their aspect, though he can hardly fail to be struck by the fact that there is more physical beauty here than in the region he has just left. The population seems to be wanting in the imagination, the spontaneity, the quick responsiveness, the poetry, the wit, and the humour of the Neapolitans, though their unintelligible dialect renders it impossible for him to be quite certain that he may not be mistaken on any of these points; but he feels that the persons whom he meets, though less amiable, are men on whose friendship he could rely more firmly, and whose enmity he would have more reason to dread. He has entered the country of the true vendetta.

Yet in Naples, too, as we have seen, it exists, though in a far milder form, and it is easier there to obtain trustworthy information about it. It is not the wild and reckless vengeance which foreigners usually suppose, but vengeance reduced to rule and recognized by public opinion. It is only in the most highly-civilized societies that men are content to entrust the defence of their honour to the law. Indeed, England is almost the only country in Europe in which the upper classes do so frankly. Everywhere else it is felt that there are personal wrongs which must be personally avenged, and any attempt to bring these before the public tribunals is considered an act of cowardice. What constitutes a technical insult of this kind is a question on which we cannot enter here, as the details of the code differ in different countries, and even in different classes; but it is perfectly well known to all whom it concerns. Now the lazzaroni entertain these feelings as strongly as the most chivalrous nobles; the vendetta is their duel, and any peasant or fisherman who shrinks from entering upon one when due cause is given is treated with as much contempt by his equals as a German officer would be if he refused a challenge. This explains a fact that has often puzzled strangers. When a man has been stabbed the sympathy of the populace is almost invariably on the side of the assailant, whom they consider the probable victim of an unjust and cruel law. The act of which he has been guilty is no crime in their eyes. They know that his life would have been rendered intolerable if he had not committed it, and that now the only prospect before him, if he be discovered, is death or a lifelong ignominy. In the old days the brigands were constantly recruited by men who had had such a "misfortune," and who fled to the mountains to escape the galleys.

Vendetta may be incurred in a number of different ways. When a man has been slain or a woman seduced, the duty of revenging the act falls upon the nearest male relative, though if he be advanced in years it will probably be undertaken by a younger kinsman. In these cases punishment follows as a matter of course, and no warning need be given. The worst of personal insults is a remark casting direct obloquy on a parent, especially a dead mother. Merely to curse her soul is comparatively harmless, and even an allusion to her past life need not be taken amiss. There are a number of Neapolitan expressions which a stranger rarely hears, as they are only used for purposes of provocation, and which, with a very different meaning, have the same weight which such terms as liar or coward would have if addressed to a Continental officer. A blow from a master or an acknowledged superior is rarely seriously resented; from an equal it is said that one given with a stick may be forgiven, while one with the hand must be avenged. It is difficult, however, to obtain accurate information as to this and several other points in the lazzaroni's code of honour.

As soon as a man feels himself aggrieved he must give fair notice to his enemy; even if he intends to avenge the insult on the spot, he must allow his opponent time to unclasp his knife. Nor is this all. There is a strange courtesy and consideration for others in these hot-blooded Neapolitan beggars. A crime of violence is very rarely committed in the house of a friend or in a tavern, as this would cause the host unpleasantness. When young men quarrel over their wine, they do not fly at once at each other's throats; they talk and gesticulate fiercely, so that the stranger thinks a free fight may begin at any moment. While the noise lasts there is no danger; as soon as the matter grows serious those concerned become quiet and drop away in groups to settle their differences where nobody but themselves will have to bear the consequences.

A warning of vendetta may be given in so many words; but this is rarely done except in private, as, if the threat were known, the danger of the victor would be increased. The language of signs which every Neapolitan of the lower classes knows is generally made use of, and the gesture most commonly employed is made by pressing the thumb and the forefinger together in such a way as to leave a small narrow space between them, which is supposed to typify the hole the challenger hopes to make in his adversary's body. In Naples, too, men still bite their thumbs, as they did in the days of Sampson and Gregory; and this is not an expression of contempt, but a declaration of war. This gesture, however, has fallen a good deal out of use of late, as it is apt to attract attention, and it is said to be discouraged by the Camorra.

When the warning has once been given and understood, the claims of honour are satisfied. From thenceforth each opponent is free to guard his own life and attempt that of his adversary as best he can. He may lurk in dark and lonely corners, and stab him in the back without shame. This, which seems to an Englishman the foulest spot in the vendetta, has certainly been spreading of late years, since the vigilance of the police has rendered a fair combat almost impossible, and cunning and secresy are the only arts by which the victor can hope to escape. In the old days, when an offence was slight, a fair combat with knives which ended in a scratch is said to have been thought as satisfactory by the lazzaroni as it still is by the journalists of Paris, though the fiercer kind of vendetta has always existed in the South. Yet, even when it assumes its wildest form, there are considerations that will stay the hand of the avenger. We have the following story on what seems to us good authority. A Calabrese who had incurred vendetta fled to the neighbourhood of Naples, and remained there between five and six years. A marriage then took place in his family; it was desirable that he should be present, and he thought the interval was long enough to permit him to visit his home in safety. He invited one of his new friends to accompany him. They met his old opponent in the street, and he passed them without notice; but, on meeting the Neapolitan alone one evening in the tavern, he treated him with very marked, though not effusive, courtesy. The two acquaintances returned to Naples without the slightest unpleasantness. A year or so later the Calabrese, thinking that the affair had blown over, resolved to settle once more in his native place. In a very few days he was found stabbed to death. After some years the Neapolitan once more accepted an invitation to the village, and when there spoke about the murder of his friend to the tavern-keeper. "It was the old vendetta, of course." "Yes, but —— had several opportunities during the wedding; why did not he take advantage of any of them?" "That would have been painful to you, and no Calabrese would willingly be rude to a foreign guest." There was a good deal of provincial bravado in the reply, no doubt; but the sentiment that prompted it was real. That was what the innkeeper thought it would be truly noble to do; perhaps, after all, it was what —— did.

To return to Naples. Men will often speak in the heat of a moment words which they regret when they are cool. A vendetta seldom arises out of these, unless the two opponents are alone and draw their knives almost at once. If they have companions, two parties are immediately formed by a common understanding, and each of the adversaries is accompanied home by his supporters on roundabout ways which prevent the chance of a meeting. One friend has cigars to buy at a particular shop, another must pay a little account, a third is obliged to speak a word or two with his cousin. The rage of both the adversaries has generally cooled down considerably before they reach their own doors, and in an hour or so afterwards they are ready to listen to reason. If the case be a difficult one, a Camorrist is called in as umpire to decide who has been technically in the wrong, and the man against whom judgment is given is expected not only to make an apology to his opponent, but to invite him, the friends who prevented the fray, and above all the Camorrist, to a sumptuous dinner. It may be remarked here that the Camorra undertakes the task of avenging the wrongs done to its own members. If any one of them be killed or wounded, his kinsmen are informed that they have neither the duty nor the right to undertake the vendetta; vengeance in such a case belongs to the association alone, and it rarely fails in inflicting it.

Old men among the lazzaroni assert that the vendetta has been demoralized of late. Thirty years ago the offences that must be answered by the knife were clearly known. Now, men stab each other in a passing fit of passion, or, what is worse, from rivalry in business, and the populace which would formerly have torn such a culprit to pieces is now eager to screen him. They complain that in momentary encounters the due notice is not always fairly given, but that a man often draws his own knife from his pocket and even unclasps it before he speaks a word of warning, and that such an act of murder, not vendetta, is not sufficiently resented. Whether these things are so or not we cannot say, and we have no desire either to contribute to the re-establishment of the vendetta in Italy or to acclimatize it in England. If we have thought it worth while to give this rough sketch of its character, it is because it is the last poor and degraded survival of a condition of things through which every civilized country in Europe has passed, and which, when it was in the ascendent, formed the theme of a thousand romances, some of which are not yet forgotten.

HANDEL'S ACIS AND GALATEA AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

LAST Saturday's Concert at the Crystal Palace was intended as a commemoration of the birth of Handel and the programme consisted entirely of his Serenata, Acis and Galatea. It is true that this beautiful work is but too rarely heard; yet all lovers of music must be familiar with its every note. It would be well, indeed, if many of our modern composers would devote a little time to a careful study and analysis of this great work In its character it is essentially dramatic, and there are yet among us some who can remember its production on the stage in the form of an opera, with Clara Novello in the part of Galatea, and Staudigl in the part of Polyphemus. Those who can remember this will tell us that, in spite of some liberties taken with the score, in spite of obvious difficulties in the dramatic representation of some of the characters, and in spite of the necessity of filling up the gaps necessarily left in the work in its Serenata form, its success, not only with the dilettante, but also with the "town," was very great. The lesson which we think many composers, or would-be composers, may learn from Handel's dramatic work is that fine, strong, dramatic musical feeling does not necessarily demand eccentric and novel methods of musical expression; and, secondly, that the old classical methods, even when rigidly adhered to, do not necessarily destroy or obscure poetic thought. The performance given last Saturday was, on the whole, one of very high merit. In the overture and throughout the orchestral passages one could not help feeling that Mr. Manns was rather keeping his powers of expression under, in deference to that curious bugbear the Handelian tradition. We do not wish for one moment to hint that his reading of the music was cold; but the feeling was produced that he would willingly have infused more life and passion into it had he not been restrained by the fear of being un-Handelian. It must be confessed that the somewhat exacting music of Acis and Galatea brought out to some degree a slight want of finish in the performance of the band. It is but rarely at a Crystal Palace concert that the conductor has occasion to strike his desk with an audible beat, but on Saturday last Mr. Manns was several times compelled to use this extreme measure.

In discussing the performance of the chorus we must always bear in mind that the Crystal Palace choir but rarely has an opportunity of singing in public at concerts in which the orchestra is also employed. On the whole, they displayed a good quality of tone and very true intonation; but, though their attack was occasionally excellent in points to which attention had obviously been directed in rehearsal, in their level singing there was frequently a certain woolliness or haziness, due no doubt to want of practice in singing together in public. Miss Mary Davies sang the music of Galatea. Her vocalization was all that could be wished, but unfortunately there was on several occasions traces of the inroads of that fatal and insidious malady, the tremolo. Charming though her singing was, during the earlier part of the Serenata it appeared to us to be too cold. For instance, Galatea's reply to Polyphemus—

> Of infant limbs to make my food,
> And swill full draughts of human blood!
> Go, monster! bid some other guest;
> I loathe the host;—I loathe the feast.

the words of which are surely strong enough, and the music of which appears most perfectly to express the dramatic situation, was sung by her without a particle of feeling or effect. Later on Miss Davies seemed to warm to the sentiment of the music, and her singing of the last recitative and air, "'Tis done, thus I exert my power divine," was charming from every point of view. The part of Acis was sung at short notice by Mr. Piercy, who replaced Mr. Winch, absent through indisposition. We need only say that he possesses a voice of extremely good quality, and showed signs of musical powers of great promise. Mr. Bridson sang the music of Polyphemus, and though in some of the more florid music his vocalization may not have been all that the most exacting critic could desire, yet, by his fine voice, artistic method, and strong dramatic feeling he achieved an undoubted success. Mr. Charles Chilley, who has a pleasing baritone voice, with a strong touch of the tenor quality, sang the part of Damon most successfully. Indeed, it would be difficult for any artist to excel him by far in the recitative "Would you gain the tender creature"; and perhaps Mr. Chilley sang his words even more audibly than the other artists, though all sang them with a distinctness of articulation unfortunately too rare.

POLITICAL JAPAN.

APPRECIATION of her art and artistic products makes the name of Japan familiar enough upon our lips, yet how little most of us know of the country and its people and government. In spite of publications, the mere titles of which fill many columns of library catalogues, the general level of information about the Japanese people and their political condition is probably not unfairly represented by two anecdotes, trite enough among residents in the Far East, but presumably not so well known to the generality of our readers. One of these stories tells how, not so many years ago, when a Special Ambassador from Japan, charged with an important political mission to the Great Powers, was about to have audience of the Prince-Chancellor of a certain nation in the middle of Europe, the great man, absorbed in European problems, after beating his brain a few moments to bring it to bear on the new subject of attention, sprang up at last fully prepared for the interview by the sudden inspiration:—"Ah! Japan. Of course; that's where they do the butterfly "trick!" The other story is related by an Englishman who some years ago had charge, on his way home, of two or three young Japanese gentlemen going to Europe to pursue a course of foreign study. They travelled by way of San Francisco, and, a few days out from land, the American skipper came up to our friend and, with a backward nod of the head and a jerk of the thumb over his shoulder in the direction of the young Japanese, inquired—"Princes?" "No." "Acrobats?" "No." "Then what the 'nation are they!" Yet, with all due allowance for those doubtless important classes, there are some thirty-five millions of people in Japan who are neither princes nor acrobats, and who would be sorely put to it if called upon to do the butterfly trick. Nor are curios the sole product of the country; though the aspect of the Japanese Court at the recent Fisheries Exhibition would lend some colour to this supposition; and a country is apt to be known only for that characteristic which most meets the public eye—

> India mittit ebur, molles sua thura Sabæi.

But the thirty-five million people of the Japanese Empire have a history of their own—though, to be sure, they did their best at one time to break with it: but that phase is over, and progress now takes the healthier direction of an adaptation of the old forms to the new ideas and requirements rather than the wholesale substitution of an alien for an indigenous civilization. They have also present interests and aspirations, moral and material, social, political, and intellectual, of a very rare kind: and they have a policy, foreign and domestic, that must shape for good or for evil a future destiny, the development of which will be watched with the curious interest attaching to an experiment unique in the history of civilization.

The new departure in Japanese history, precipitated and its direction determined by the advent of foreign fleets in 1854, and the conclusion of treaties opening the ports to foreign commerce, dates from the revolution which in 1868 overturned the old feudal system, and destroyed the power of the usurping Captain-General, known to us under the title of Tycoon, and restored the Mikado to the de facto as well as de jure position of an absolute Emperor, the paternal despot and central figure of a completely centralized Government. The constructive work of the subsequent period—the introduction of wholly new political machinery, legislative, administrative, local, and judicial; the creation of a national army and navy and mercantile marine; the introduction of railways, and the completion of a domestic service of posts and telegraphs equal to any in the world, and brought into union with the international systems; the erection of lighthouses, harbours, docks, arsenals, and fortifications; the creation of a national mint and a coinage of unsurpassed beauty and finish and unquestioned purity; the formation of a universal system of education, higher and lower, and the training of large numbers of selected students at home and abroad in theoretical and applied science, law, medicine, and general learning—all these works we can but refer to as the results of the laborious genius and statesmanlike initiative of a Government new to most of such duties, retarded at first by rebellion secret and overt, weighted by an inheritance of internal debt (largely increased by the demands of the new epoch and of the compensation due to an expropriated feudal aristocracy), and hampered throughout by the imperfect enlightenment of its subjects and doubtful loyalty of some of its own followers, as well as by the restrictions of an anomalous international status. The political achievements of Japanese statesmen have not passed unnoticed by thoughtful observers like Miss Bird, and the late Mr. Mounsey, in his History of the Satsuma Rebellion, not to speak of other writers, whose fulsome laudation of everything Japanese deprives their compilations of all real value. But the full magnitude of all this has probably yet to be generally recognized; and it is the opinion of many who have had opportunities of watching history being made in Japan, that there is a breadth of political conception, and a boldness and originality of action, about the men who made the revolution of 1868, and those who are still carrying forward its spirit and its aims, that should give them a high place among those who have given to the world its greatest monuments of constructive political genius. It is well worthy of remark that of these men almost all came from the lower ranks, comparatively speaking, of the official class. A few there have been, and are, among them of men born to the highest stations; but these are found in the position of leaders solely on account of their personal qualities; the majority of their order retain not even the semblance of power.

The present in Japan is essentially a period of transition. The Oath of the then youthful Emperor at the restoration of his dynasty to actual power in 1868—the Magna Charta of Japan—promised the ultimate adoption of popular institutions and constitutional government. At that time the machinery of even bureaucratic methods had to be erected anew on the basis of centralisation; and constant modifications have scarcely yet ceased to be made towards the perfection of the mechanism. But the Imperial promise has not meanwhile been forgotten either by people or rulers. Renewed and ratified on more than one subsequent occasion, it has always been a living reality. The first steps towards its direct fulfilment were taken a few years ago in the creation of elective local assemblies in all divisions, from the village community and town ward up to the city and prefecture. Sufficient success attended this tentative measure to justify the Government in yielding at length to the demand unceasingly made in the press and on public platforms for the assignment of a definite date for the complete fulfilment of the charter by the introduction of the representative system into the control of national as well as of local affairs; and by an Imperial Rescript given in 1881, the year 1890 has been fixed for the crowning of the constitutional edifice. It is a bold venture for a nation that will by that time have barely attained its majority since the new birth that succeeded the collapse of a decrepit feudalism. But there seems no ground for undue anxiety for the consequences. Much has already been done by the introduction of the representative principle into the management of local affairs, and by the influence of a newspaper press, not free, as we understand freedom, but subject only to such restraint as is necessary among an excitable people new to liberty, and only beginning to imbibe political knowledge. Much, however, no doubt remains to be done. But if, as there is reason to believe, the parliamentary forms of the German Government are found to predominate in the scheme now being elaborated for Japan, another proof will have been given of that cautious conservatism which so strangely mingles with the reforming energy of those who are moulding the political character of this remarkable people. Whatever the beauties or shortcomings of the German Constitution, it cannot be accused of too democratic a tendency. Be the electorate large or small, the representative Chamber itself will no doubt consist exclusively of the "gentry," who formerly monopolized all, and still fill all the highest posts, both civil and military—the "soldiers, scholars, poets" of the race. To obtain a good Upper Chamber the nobility will have to be rehabilitated—at present they can as an order be scarcely said to exist—and their ranks stiffened by a considerable addition from the higher grades of officials and gentry. These represent at present all the superior education and political capacity in the country. As for the power of the Crown and its Ministers, there is no fear of that being left out of sight in a system modelled as this one is likely to be.

The constitutional change effected by the introduction of the principle of representation, great and fundamental though it must be, will not conspicuously affect the administrative work of the Government. As it exists at present, the Government may be called (if the paradox be permitted) a constitutional despotism—that is to say, though it lies solely with the Emperor and his Council of Ministers to order or to modify the form of the administration, and though all effective legislative power resides in the same body, yet there is not that arbitrariness generally associated with the idea of absolutism, especially in the Orient. The Emperor and the Council are bound, and feel themselves bound, by the solemn promise of the oath or charter, to carry on the Government "for the sake of the governed," as our phrase goes. Every administrative act, every exercise of secondary legislative power, depends upon a written "Constitution," and is restricted by the power or authority so conferred. Below the Emperor's Council of Ministers, which is the supreme power in the State, the individual member of the Council, presiding as a Minister over each administrative department, has authority strictly limited by the written constitution of his Ministry, for the exercise of which authority he is responsible to the joint body of his colleagues and to his Sovereign; while, as towards the rest of the world, the principle of Cabinet solidarity and joint responsibility is fully recognized and acted upon. The application of the last-named principle is exemplified from time to time by the secession of some Minister unable to go with his colleagues in this or that policy. In the earlier years of the present form of government, such seceders, not infrequently diverging on fundamental questions, became sometimes the leaders of abortive revolutions, whereby the foundations of the Government have by this time been firmly cemented. Nowadays, of those who thus retire, though not all capable of forming among themselves a homogeneous party, the majority nevertheless fall somehow into the ranks of a body which, if bound by no other ties, is at least united by hostility to the existing Cabinet. Out of this body and their followers, when the time for parliamentary government arrives, will be formed no doubt in the most natural way possible a political party ready to assume at once the attitude of a Parliamentary Opposition; and, once given a party of "ins" and a party of "outs," the rest, we all know, is simplicity itself.

The powers of administration and of subsidiary legislation vested in the provincial governments and prefectures are fixed, like those of the central departments, by a written Constitution. The governor or prefect is responsible to one or other of the central Ministries, according to the nature of the case, as public works, education, and so forth, the general control being in the hands of the Home Department. The elective county and district boards, already alluded to have likewise their functions and scope strictly assigned and limited. The conflicts between these and the prefects give rise, now and again, to some very pretty constitutional quarrels, for the composing whereof a special Committee, representing the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary, is appointed ad hoc in the Privy Council Office.

Thus it will be seen that Japan has already reached the point of political development represented by a smoothly-working centralized bureaucracy. In this cursory bird's-eye view we must pass lightly over other features of her polity. Finance, after passing through troubled times, has, it may be hoped with some confidence, been placed at length upon a sound basis. The external debt, never large, has been almost extinguished. The internal liabilities, consisting principally of a fiat currency, have now, by a judicious system of amortisement, been so dealt with that, if no war or other national disaster interferes, specie payments may be resumed before many years. Law and judicature, already for many years radically reformed since feudal times, are still in the crucible. Complete codes of civil and criminal—to which will have to be added constitutional—law, have been compiled by the aid of European jurists on Western models. Of these, the Criminal Code and Code of Criminal Procedure—formed principally on the lines of the Code Napoléon, but drawing also upon all known codes—have been promulgated and put into force now some two years or more. The various branches of civil and commercial law will follow very rapidly, being, it is understood, on the point of final revision. Meanwhile, the judiciary is being remodelled, and its ranks recruited from the now numerous class of younger men who have received a complete training, either at home or abroad, in Western jurisprudence. It is probable, too, and very desirable, that, when all the codes are in force, the new legal and judicial machinery should be set in motion by the aid of a certain admixture of foreign lawyers appointed as judges in its courts by the Japanese Government. But this suggests one of the burning questions of Japan's foreign relations; and of those relations generally we hope to give a brief sketch another day.

A FRENCH SALON.

IN English it is difficult to find a word that shall adequately connote all those ideas of sociability which a Frenchwoman has in mind when she claims a friend as an habitué of her salon. We do not frequent the drawing-rooms of our friends in England in the sense in which various persons become the habitués of certain salons in Paris; and the fact that in English society the habitué is such a rariссima avis (if not a biped altogether unknown) may be said to mark the wide difference of national character so striking to any one who mixes alternately in the society of the two countries separated by but one score miles of shallow sea. The only place of which the Englishman can be called an habitué is his Club. The London man certainly does frequent his pet Club with an assiduity and a faithfulness that is in marked contrast to his erratic movements and uncertain presence at the social entertainments of his friends.

In France le Club is socially speaking of little import. It is even now after years of acclimatisation but an exotic, fostered by the tender care of those who love to make a display of their Anglomania, and the cafés have had no cause to complain of any diminution in their customers since the institution of the Cercles. To obtain information, to rest his brain, to find companionship, the Londoner goes to his Club; while with the like purpose, the Parisian takes his hat and cane, and with the same latitude in the matter of dress which is the privilege of Club-life with us, he will betake himself to some private house and form one among the circle of friends, gathered together without special invitation on certain afternoons or evenings, in the drawing-room of some lady who has the art "de faire salon." Here he will find, should he want it, the person from whom he may acquire his information; he may discuss the current news; or he may simply listen, for listening is much cultivated among even the most witty of the French. Of French society the elementary unit is without doubt the habitué, and, it will be noted, the habitués of a salon, though they may not become intimate friends, are assuredly not to be placed in the category of mere acquaintances. So and so, it will be said, can hardly be your intimate friend, since you still call him Monsieur after having met him regularly at a certain house for the last quarter of a century; but, though you may know nothing of his private affairs, or of his relatives, you are intimately acquainted with his views and his ideas on men and things; and although you may in point of fact have but little in common with him, you would miss him from his place were he gone, and sincerely deplore his absence, for his presence has contributed an item to form the very agreeable whole presented by the drawing-room of your friend.

To have a recognized salon is the ambition of every Frenchwoman who aims at social success, and dinners across the Channel are not the indispensable rite that they are in society with us. It is still possible to get people to meet and talk in Paris without supplying them with food, and a cup of weak tea is more often than not the sole stimulant of much excellent conversation. To become more intimate with their acquaintances it is customary for French ladies to receive one day in the week during the afternoon, and on this day every one must call, at least once, who wishes to profit by the evening gatherings, and continue the acquaintance made at some chance meeting.

On this point the social law is very strict, and it will be noted that throughout society in France, and on the Continent in general, though there is little ceremony, etiquette is strictly observed, and any breach of its regulations is seldom condoned—even in an (ignorant) foreigner. In English society, until the precincts of the palace be reached, the rules of etiquette are almost unknown, or if known, are more honoured in the breach than in the observance. But across the water this is by no means the case, and that English people with difficulty comprehend this, is perhaps one reason for their finding French society somewhat exclusive. Furthermore, as with the rule of the road, customs in England and France generally go by contraries. For instance, the last arrivals call first, and further instances might easily be adduced; but these are elementary rules that an Englishman does easily learn. It is in the drawing-room, however, that he is most apt to sin through ignorance. For who shall tell him that during an afternoon call he must leave his greatcoat and umbrella in the ante-room, that into the drawing-room he is expected to bring his hat, and that at the beginning of the visit, in any case, he should keep on his gloves? These are matters which we in England hold to be optional or indifferent, but on which French bienséance is inflexible. To call on a Parisian lady in an overcoat and carrying an umbrella is deemed almost as insulting as to go into her drawing-room with your hat on: and were her husband your candid friend he would probably inform you that his wife's rooms were warmed, and that the rain did not come through.

But it is in her talent for combining the various elements of her society that the genius of a French hostess shows its highest development. Heine, if we are not mistaken, was wont to say, in characterizing the society of London and Paris, that the English were gregarious but not sociable, while the French were sociable but not gregarious. The innumerable balls where the majority do not dance, drums where people will not talk but where there is abundant food and drink for those who have already dined, entertainments, in short, such as we are perpetually "going on to" during a London season, are of rare occurrence in Paris. We give ourselves endless trouble in the lighting up of our houses, the providing of victuals, and the getting together of more people than our rooms will conveniently hold; but, when the guests are assembled, the part of the hostess too often ends with their reception. She does not regard it as incumbent on her to try to elicit the conversational powers of her friends and make them give of their best by, so to speak, fathoming their minds and drawing up that which is valuable in them. To be introduced is considered a bore, if not an absolute insult. The French hostess, on the contrary, is perhaps a little oblivious of the creature-comforts of her guests; but then she gives herself an infinity of trouble in the management of her salon; and, although she herself may talk but little, she is the prime mover in the conversation, keeping up the ball by an occasional word thrown in adroitly from time to time. Since crowds are, as a rule, avoided, the conversation is kept more general in France than with us, tête-à-têtes in a low voice not being encouraged; each one talks, but not all at once; for it will be observed that from the earliest age a talent for narration is much cultivated, and that a Frenchman knows how to put his ideas into the compact form fitted for their comprehension by an audience of several persons. On the avoidance of tête-à-têtes it may be related how, at certain little dinners of eight or a dozen at most, at a house in the Faubourg St.-Germain, all private conversation with one's neighbour is absolutely prohibited; each guest must address his or her conversation to the whole table in general; and, should any offend the rule, a call to order is immediately made by the tingling of a little bell at the right hand of the hostess's plate. This is, perhaps, carrying matters to an extreme; still it clearly marks the general tendency.

In a salon such as we have now in mind we must admit that young ladies are but of little account. In France they neither rule the roast socially, as is the case in America, nor do they monopolize the attention of the less ornamental portion of humanity and throw the dowagers into the shade, as is the case with us. From her education and the early age at which girls in France generally marry (or are married), the conversation of young ladies is but little appreciated by men who are already in the world engaged in the battle of life. And in further explanation of the insignificant position occupied by the Parisian "girl of the period," it must be borne in mind that our British method of courtship by flirtation is little practised over the water, also that what men there seek in the society of women is just that companionship and sympathy which the unmarried woman is least capable of giving. A matter of continual surprise to an Englishman who has the luck to gain admittance to a French salon is the truly catholic range of the matters that will come under discussion. There is no subject that a Frenchman will not discuss seriously, and think it is to his profit to do so, with a Frenchwoman. It might almost be said that there is no serious subject that in London a man will discuss thoroughly with a lady; for, as a rule, he does not hold that he will increase his stock of ideas by giving himself the trouble. In Paris men, whether from vanity or from other reasons, talk their best when ladies are their auditors, and they assuredly seek the society of women far more from sympathy with their minds than from admiration for their outward attractions. Esprit, which is not wit, but which has been defined as that "quick perception which seizes the ideas of others easily and returns ready change for them," is in truth what men most prize in women, it being a quality independent of beauty, and, while the mind lasts, not lessened by age. It has been frequently remarked how in their old age French men and women preserve not only their good-humour, but their gaiety, to the last. This is of course in part dependent on good health, for with them gout and dyspepsia are not common maladies. But for the cheerfulness of his declining years a Frenchman will look to the salons of his friends, and, since it has ever been the custom for intimate society in France to assemble in the evening, he, after dinner, not being a club man, will take his hat and cane to go out and pay his visits. In some dimly-lighted salon au 3ième he will find a welcome from the circle gathered round the fireside, where all are habitués, and where each, eschewing the weather and the discussion of his personal health, brings forth his remarks on passing events, and contributes some new observation to the common stock.

Paris has still many things in points of material comfort that she might copy with advantage from London; we admit that her hackney-carriages are vile, the coachmen demanding pourboires, and driving abominably; that her postal service is dear, and uncertain; that her theatres are uncomfortable, tawdry, and, as Mr. Matthew Arnold might say, lubricitous. But society is understood better there than it is with us. Although all human beings are social, women are more so than men, and in their taste for analysing sentiments, and in the delight they take in seeing into the minds of others, have created, in France especially, the great art of conversation which has long since become the favourite excitement of the French nation.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.

THE practice of exhibiting an artist's works by themselves is growing rapidly. Mr. Halswelle's Upper Thames sketches were only withdrawn on Saturday, and on the same day an exhibition of Mr. W. L. Wyllie's watercolour drawings of the Lower Thames was opened at a private view. They are at the rooms of the Fine Art Society in New Bond Street, where Mr. Hunt's pictures may still be seen in two adjoining galleries. The introduction to the catalogue is written by Mr. Grant Allen, and consists chiefly of a history of the Thames as the port of London. Into no other river of Europe does the tide penetrate so far. Besides being the deepest and safest estuary and river in England, it looks eastward towards the flourishing cities of the Low Countries; and in early times its chief port lay far in the interior of the country, and was comparatively safe from the attacks of free-booters. As a fact, however, London suffered heavily in the Danish invasions. Yet Mr. Allen does not, in his historical sketch, so much as name them. He appears, too, to be under some vague impression as to the continuity of London commercial life from Roman times, an idea which has been frequently combated of late. For the rest, though his introduction has nothing to do with Mr. Wyllie's pictures, it is pleasant reading, though we cannot agree with him when he asserts that the impartial foreigner generally describes the first sight of England as "dismally ugly, dull, and monotonous." Coming up the Thames from abroad on a sunny morning, with views of Kentish cliffs, woods, and churches on the left, and with the wide green meadows and far blue hills of Essex on the right, seldom fails to impress the foreigner very favourably. The Australian, who must on this point be reckoned as a foreigner, is astonished beyond measure at the verdure. He has never seen anything like it at home, and in this respect we venture to think Mr. Wyllie falls short of our expectations. It is true there are many grim places, black with smoke and brown with filthy mud, on both banks, but there are quite as many pleasant meadows and timbered parks. Except in a view of Leigh (25), there is very little of this kind of scenery represented, and in this view the watery foreground is not successfully painted. As a rule, however, Mr. Wyllie excels in the difficult task of painting waves in pure watercolour; and one little picture, "Our Wake," not catalogued, is a marvel of skill in this respect. Every one who has indulged in the luxury of a sea voyage in a large steamer will remember the fascination of gazing over the taffrail and watching the ever-changing mosaic of blue and white which the vessel leaves on the surface behind her. This Mr. Wyllie has caught with amazing skill and fidelity. "Tilbury Fort" (41) is disappointing. Mr. Wyllie has given us a very breezy sketch; but the old fort, which Wren built under the direction of Samuel Pepys, plays a very subordinate part in it. A twilight view of the "Worcester Training Ship" (48) is clever, and so is "Southend Pier" (24); while the wreck on "Margate Sand" (14) has a most melancholy effect. Mr. Wyllie has been most successful, perhaps, in giving a picturesque effect to a commonplace subject; and there are no sketches in the Gallery prettier than the "Nore Light Ship" (21), or the "SS. Tongariro" (58), a vessel which is celebrated in certain circles as having made "the quickest passage known from New Zealand to Plymouth." A very pleasant hour may be spent among Mr. Wyllie's sketches, especially by any one who has been over the ground yachting or otherwise.

Mr. Tooth opens his Gallery in the Haymarket to-day by a private view of a large number of important pictures. There is a small Fortuny, "In the Vatican," some connoisseurs examining a portfolio of old drawings, which alone would make it worth while to visit the Gallery. In addition there is a Long, painted in 1868, but now first exhibited, "Christmas Day at Seville"—a lady distributing alms to gipsies and others—which will please people who prefer Mr. Long's early manner to the later. It is flanked by two landscapes by Mr. Ernest Parton, one of which, "Autumn on the Warfe," contains the portrait of a most graceful birch-tree. "The Carpet Seller," by Benjamin Constant, is in the same room, and is full of the light and colour to be seen in the courtyard of an Arab house at Algiers. Mr. Burton Barber contributes one of his charming scenes of child and dog life, "Charity begins at Home." Signor Raffaelle Sorbi's "Card Players" will be welcomed by those who remember his dancing scene last year. It is marvellously finished and delicate. Mr. Stewart, the young American artist of whom one hears so much now in Paris, exhibits "The Leisure Hour," a lady in grey standing in front of a wide white window. The treatment is masterly. M. Sadée shows his usual "Beach at Scheveningen," the sobriety and delicacy of which never pall. We must return to this Gallery next week; so far we have only mentioned pictures in the outer room.

Messrs. Agnew have a good exhibition of their recent acquisitions in Old Bond Street. It includes a little Walker and some fine Turners. There is a typical William Hunt, the "Cymon and Iphigenia," a Cox, and a number of Rossettis, besides works by living artists—altogether an interesting and well-assorted collection of watercolours. Mr. Halswelle's "Flood Time" will attract most attention, perhaps, among the works of living artists; but there is an Arab sheikh by Mr. Carl Haag, a series of sketches by Mr. Birket Foster, a frame of drawings by Mr. Randolph Caldecott; and many other favourite names are equally well represented.

In our recent notice of the Dudley Gallery we spoke of "'A Pottery Shop at Bruges' (96), by Miss Tanner." This work was, we learn, painted by Miss C. A. Channer.

HAVE WE MADE EGYPT BANKRUPT?

THE mismanagement of affairs in Egypt by Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet has not only plunged that country into political and social confusion, but has once more raised the question whether she is able to pay her way? Ministers intervened in Egypt protesting that they intended only the benefit of the Egyptians, but the result has been to render the condition of the fellaheen more miserable than ever, and to bring the Government near to insolvency. Already we hear suggestions of a fresh liquidation. Liquidations have been too common in the past. A fresh one would not be a creditable outcome of the intervention of a Minister who is a financier before everything. It was in 1862 that the Khedive first applied to the money markets of Western Europe as a borrower, and so well did he use or abuse his credit that fourteen years later Mr. Cave found that he had burdened his people with an annual charge on account of debt of over 7¾ millions sterling. This was considerably more than a guinea a head per annum for every man, woman, and child in Egypt, and it could be paid only out of fresh loans. The credit of the country was already exhausted, and fresh loans could not be obtained from the public. The Khedive, therefore, had to apply to usurers, who accommodated him at extortionate rates of interest, plunging him deeper and deeper in difficulties. This could not last, and Messrs. Goschen and Joubert, as representatives of the English and French Bondholders, entered into a compromise with the Khedive by which all existing loans were amalgamated into two consolidated debts; the Preference Debt of 17 millions sterling, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and the Unified Debt of 59 millions sterling, bearing 7 per cent. interest. A little time elapsed, and it became clear that the reduced debt charge was still too heavy. The Khedive satisfied his creditors by constantly adding to his floating debt, and the danger of repudiation once more became imminent. A Commission of Liquidation, representing fourteen foreign Powers, was assembled at Cairo, and a new arrangement of the debt was arrived at. The floating debt was consolidated, increasing both the Preference and the Unified Debts, and the interest on the latter was reduced to 4 per cent. The interest on the Preference Debt was unchanged, and to pay it the revenues of the railways, the telegraphs, and the port of Alexandria were assigned. If this should not prove sufficient, the revenues assigned for the payment of the interest on the Unified Debt were to make up the balance. These latter consisted of the revenues of four provinces, and the customs and tobacco duties. It was further stipulated that a sinking fund should be provided sufficient to extinguish the Preference Debt in sixty-five years. And if any excess remained after paying the interest on the Unified Debt, it was agreed that it should be applied to the purchase of Unified bonds in the open market at the price of the day. Hitherto the assigned revenues have not only sufficed to pay the interest on the Preference and Unified Debts, and to provide a sinking fund for the former, but they have yielded a considerable surplus for the reduction of the Unified Debt by purchases. In addition to these two State debts there are two other debts—that of the Daira Sanieh and that of the State Domains—which are both specially secured by the mortgage of land formerly belonging to the Khedive and his family. If the revenues of these lands are not sufficient to furnish interest and sinking fund, the revenues allocated to defray the cost of administration are to make up the deficit. If properly managed, these lands are ample security for the debt secured upon them. But they are not properly managed. Besides, the precautions by which they are hedged around prevent the Commissioners from forming reserve funds in good years to meet any deficits that may occur in bad years. Consequently these debts are a constant charge upon the public exchequer. At present the outstanding amount of the four debts is about 95¾ millions sterling, and the revenue required for the payment of interest and sinking fund in the present year is about 4,373,000*l.* Furthermore, Egypt is bound to pay as tribute to the Sultan about 682,000*l.* per annum, the tribute being mortgaged for loans advanced not to Egypt but to Turkey. Thus the total debt charge of Egypt for herself and Turkey somewhat exceeds 5 millions sterling. And as the revenue of Egypt is roughly about 9 millions sterling, the debt charge amounts to about 56 per cent. of the total revenue.

As long as it was thought certain that England and France would enforce the Law of Liquidation, it worked satisfactorily. There was a surplus yielded both by the assigned revenues and by those remaining to defray the expense of administration. It was therefore found possible to reduce the debt, and at the same time to construct useful public works. But the rise of Arabi led to a large increase in the army expenditure. And the war that followed not only wasted wealth, but disorganized trade and gave a blow to credit from which it has not yet recovered. The massacre of Alexandria drove out of the country the principal merchants and capitalists. And the protestations of the British Government of its resolve to evacuate the country in a few months prevented the revival of confidence; while its meddling destroyed the prestige of the Khedive. Lastly, the disasters in the Soudan have completed the political and economic disorganization. In consequence Alexandria has not been rebuilt; nor has there been an inflow of capital to give an impetus to trade. The rate of interest payable by the fellaheen, too, throughout the country has risen very greatly, and their misery has been aggravated. The result is that the Egyptian Government finds itself in serious embarrassments. There was a large deficit last year; and the debt is once more rapidly growing. Already compensation to the amount of nearly 4 millions sterling has been awarded to those who suffered from the burning and bombardment of Alexandria; while to cover the extraordinary expenses occasioned by Arabi's mutiny and by the expedition to the Soudan the Egyptian Government has incurred a new floating debt to the full limit allowed by the Law of Liquidation—that is, 2 millions sterling. In addition, the withdrawal from the Soudan will involve a large outlay. And, lastly, the indebtedness of the fellaheen is so great that something must be done to protect them from the usurers. It is estimated, therefore, that to cover compensations, fund the floating debt, and meet all extraordinary charges, an addition must be made to the consolidated debt of about 7 millions sterling. It is obvious, however, that in the present state of Egypt she can borrow only at a very great discount. As the price of the Preference Bonds at present is only about 90, it is probable that she could not obtain 7 millions sterling in money by a new issue of these bonds at a higher price than 85*l.* per bond of the nominal value of 100*l.* This would add 8¼ millions to her present debt, which, at 5 per cent., would add to the annual charge about 412,500*l.*, without speaking of any provision for the sinking fund. But already, as we have said, the extraordinary charges to which she has been put have caused a considerable deficit in the revenue available for State purposes, and the addition of this new debt would increase the deficit very seriously. Moreover, to add to the taxation for the purpose of paying interest on this debt would plunge the fellaheen deeper and deeper in distress, and, before long, would lead to the bankruptcy of the country. In these circumstances it is clear that some reduction of the burden upon the peasantry ought to be effected. If Mr. Gladstone were willing to assume a protectorate, it would be easy to do this without touching the Law of Liquidation. A State governed by England could easily borrow at 4 per cent. or less; there would be no difficulty, therefore, in converting the existing Egyptian debt in such a manner as to leave enough for the payment of the interest on the new loan. Furthermore, by converting the debt which is now secured upon the Turkish Tribute a considerable sum might be saved. But it is hardly worth while pointing out how this could be done, since Mr. Gladstone will not frankly recognize the responsibilities he has undertaken. There remains the suggestion of Mr. Goschen; a reduction of the interest on the Unified Debt. In the way of this, however, stands the Law of Liquidation, which cannot be touched without the consent of all the fourteen Powers by whom it was sanctioned. It is scarcely to be expected that France, for example, will agree to give up any claims of her own people upon the Egyptian Government for the sake of smoothing away England's difficulties on the Nile. A modification of the Law of Liquidation is hardly to be looked for unless our Government is prepared to give some compensation to the Continental holders of Egyptian Bonds, and we fail to see any compensation that would be likely to satisfy them except some kind of guarantee by our Government that the reduced interest would be punctually paid. A guarantee of the Egyptian debt is, however, not to be thought of. We do not guarantee the debts of our colonies or of India, and there is less reason for guaranteeing the debt of Egypt.

The formal assumption of a protectorate and a reorganization of the debt would be the most effectual way of dealing with the matter. It would relieve the taxpayer and satisfy the creditor. But there are other means of restoring a mere equilibrium between income and outlay. Mr. Vincent, the financial adviser of the Egyptian Government, has just left Alexandria to consult Ministers on the subject; and it is understood that he brings with him a scheme elaborated by Nubar Pasha and Sir E. Baring which will put an end to the deficit. At the first, the evacuation of the Soudan will impose a very heavy burden on the Exchequer of Egypt, but ultimately will relieve it of an annual charge of about 200,000*l*. At once, therefore, future deficits are reduced by this sum. Furthermore, it is clear that all foreigners should be subject to taxation in the country where they reside, the protection of whose laws they enjoy, and where they are free to own land, to fill public offices, and to carry on business of every kind. In former times there were, no doubt, reasons for withdrawing Europeans from Egyptian taxation. But, now that the Government of Egypt is in the hands of Englishmen, it is monstrously unjust that foreigners should be allowed to compete with natives, and to hold office over them, and yet be exempt from contributing to the support of the Government which protects them. Various estimates have been put forward of the amount that would be yielded by the taxation of foreigners; but it appears that, coupled with certain changes in the Customs and other taxes, it might be made to yield nearly a quarter of a million sterling. Thus, by the reduction of expenditure and the increase of taxation, we find the position of the Government improved by something over 400,000*l*. a year. Next it seems evident that great further reductions might be made in the Egyptian army. It has now been proved entirely useless for all warlike purposes, and it might therefore safely be reduced to the strength requisite for mere police functions. It has been suggested also that the charge of the army of occupation should be defrayed by this country, not by Egypt. Indeed if we keep up, for some purpose of our own, a useless native army as well as a useful British army, there may be some ground for arguing that we should pay for the unnecessary additional burden imposed. Again, the administrative services admit of great reductions. We are maintaining two staffs—a European and a native—in all the higher departments; and in addition there is no doubt that the number of persons employed in inferior grades is too great. That considerable economies can be effected by reorganization of the administrative services is certain. Furthermore, the Egyptian Government is at present paying 5 per cent. on the price of the Suez Canal shares sold by the ex-Khedive to our Government, although we raised the money at a considerably lower rate of interest. It seems only fair that we should remit to Egypt the difference between the interest we ourselves pay and that which we receive. Lastly, a more important saving still can be effected by the sale of the State Domain and the Daira lands. They are badly administered at present, and are charges upon the public exchequer. If they were sold to peasants, the price would pay off the debt to secure which they are mortgaged, and the purchasers would pay the Land-tax, which would go to increase the revenue. The sale would thus increase the income and decrease the expenditure. It is to be feared, however, that a sale of these lands on satisfactory terms can hardly be effected while the Government of the country is in its present confusion. The fellaheen must be rescued from their present wretchedness before they will buy. Above all, confidence must be restored. If it were certain that an English protectorate would be established, Europeans in large numbers would buy land, capital would be introduced into Egypt, money would be spent there in establishing new industries and carrying out improvements, wages would be raised—in short, an impetus would be given to the prosperity of the country. The main cause, then, of the existing financial difficulty is the unwillingness of our own Government to accept the responsibilities entailed by its intervention and act in a statesmanlike manner. At the same time the reforms we have pointed to would certainly put an end to the deficit in the Budget, and would afford time for improving the political situation.

REVIEWS.

THE IMPERIAL CHANCELLOR.*

THESE volumes will be read with eager interest by every one who is desirous of forming a just estimate of the present condition of Germany and of the man who has done more than any other, except the Emperor, to impress upon her public life the form it has assumed. We must confess that we opened them with serious misgivings. A former work of the author—pleasant, chatty, and garrulous as it was—did more harm than good to the cause he had at heart. In Germany, where every one is familiar with the policy, the speeches, and the public character of Prince Bismarck, this may not have been the case. There the familiar details may only have served to render the heroic figure more human, and therefore more attractive; and every reader may naturally have concluded that, if the Prince talked a good deal about eating and drinking, it was for the reason that Walpole gave for indulging in less edifying discourse, "It was a subject everybody could understand." Here in England, where only the outline of the statesman's career is generally known, the impression produced was different. Many readers closed the book with the conviction that the Chancellor united the least amiable of the characteristics of Mephistopheles and Falstaff, and that, whenever he was not engaged in intriguing against the liberties of his own countrymen or the independence of neighbouring States, he spent his scanty leisure in inventing strange, monstrous, and unholy dishes, which must inevitably prove fatal to the digestion of any one who ventured to partake of them.

We are glad to find that no similar charge can be brought against the present work. The author has seriously endeavoured to give not only a true but a full picture of his hero, and he has succeeded to a degree that we believed entirely impossible when we opened his first volume. This is principally owing to the novel plan he has adopted, which is worthy of the highest praise. The time has fortunately not yet come when an historical portrait of Prince Bismarck can be drawn, and when it does, we trust the task will fall to a Carlyle rather than a Busch. Genius demands genius in its biographer; and when the battle has been lost or won, and the last great man of modern Europe has gone to his rest, we shall demand discrimination as well as appreciation in the historian who endeavours to paint his likeness and record his deeds. But now, while the conflict is still raging, and the cry, "The Philistines are upon thee, Samson," tingles in every ear, while Herr Richter is encompassing the giant's feet with a net of platitudes, and Dr. Bamberger assailing his eyes with clouds of tiny arrows, a partisan may well be forgiven if he refuses to acknowledge that the object of his adoration ever mistook the way, or even made a false step. Under such circumstances, to doubt would be a kind of treachery, to deny would be treason. Herr Busch is far too sound at heart to be guilty of either; if the Chancellor could himself make a free statement as to his life and policy, he would in all probability confess to errors our author will not allow, and he might do so freely without endangering his fame.

The political speaker has this in common with the journalist, that his best thoughts are usually employed only to illustrate themes of passing interest, and are therefore generally forgotten as soon as the question of the day has been answered or pushed aside. Few speeches or articles deserve a better fate, but there are exceptions. Every Englishman knows what a fund of political wisdom may be gathered from the speeches of Burke, and since Burke there has been no parliamentary speaker of the highest order who has so frequently referred to great general principles as Prince Bismarck. Herr Busch has hit upon the plan of extracting these passages of universal interest, and bringing them together under suitable headings. Thus the greater part of the two volumes before us consists of the very words of the statesman they are intended to praise. The design was admirable, and it has been carried out with great tact and skill. Any one who has studied the speeches and the published letters and despatches of the Prince with the attention they deserve will of course find that many of his favourite passages are left out. It is always so with a selection from the works of a great author; but no candid reader can deny that Herr Busch has on the whole made an admirably characteristic choice, though an Englishman would doubtless have included many extracts that he rejects, even at the cost of losing some that he has admitted.

Unser Reichskanzler offers us therefore the studies for a portrait rather than the portrait itself, and this is the great merit of the book. What Herr Busch thinks about Prince Bismarck is a matter of comparatively small importance; what the Prince himself thinks on matters of general interest is what we wish to know and we can hardly turn a dozen pages without coming upon some profound thought or pithy saying which casts an entirely new light on a subject that has perhaps been so often discussed as to seem exhausted. But what strikes an attentive reader most is the self-consistency of the statesman, the clearness with which he forms and the pertinacity with which he pursues his purposes, together with the versatility of the means he employs to accomplish them. No man's mind was ever more free from cant. In 1878 he declared, "Since I have been a Minister I have never belonged to any party, nor could I do so. I have been hated by each in turn, and loved by some." Again, in 1881, he said, in a passage we regret to be obliged to shorten :—

"I have never in my life belonged to those who believe they have nothing still to learn; and, if anybody told me, 'Twenty years ago we were both of the same opinions; mine have not changed, and yet you are opposed to me,' I should reply, 'Yes, twenty years ago I knew as much as you do now; but I have learnt something since.' Still, I do not say this to excuse myself. I have always had one compass and a single pole-star by which to steer, salus publica. When I first came into office, I may often have acted hastily, perhaps rashly; but, as soon as I have had time for reflection, I have always subordinated my personal feelings and wishes to the question what is best and most useful for my country—while I had only to think of Prussia, for my Royal Master and his dynasty; now, for the whole German nation. I have never been a passionate supporter of any system; the doctrines by which parties are united and separated have always had only a secondary interest for me; my chief interest is centred on the nation, on her independence, her position with respect to other States, her organization in such a way that she can take her place freely among them. All the rest—the Liberal, Conservative, or reactionary form of the Constitution—that, gentlemen, I must frankly confess, is a matter of inferior importance in my eyes, a question relative to the luxury of our furniture, which it will be time enough to settle when the house is built. When the interests of the country require it, I am ready to approach one or the other party on such questions; as I have said, I hold their doctrines very cheap. . . . Many things may be done either in this way or in that; there are many roads that lead to Rome. There are times when the country must be governed on Liberal principles, others in which a dictatorship is necessary; everything changes; nothing here is eternal. But I demand that the structure of the Empire, the unity of the German nation, shall be founded upon a rock. . . . From the first moment I have devoted my whole political energy to creating and consolidating it; if you can point to a single moment when I have not steered in the direction thus given by my compass, you may perhaps show that I have been guilty of an error in judgment, but not that I have ever lost sight of the great national aim."

It is much that a statesman who is no longer young should be able to speak such words as these; it is more that among all his opponents there is none who dares to contradict them. In the days of peace and safety Germans may choose Dr. Windhorst, Dr. Virchow, or even Herr Bebel, as their representative; in the hour of danger they know they can depend on the genius and the patriotism of Prince Bismarck. If there were any real question of displacing him, there are now hardly ten constituencies in the whole Empire where his opponents would have a majority. But worrying a Prime Minister who enjoys the confidence of his sovereign is almost as popular a sport in Germany as bull-fighting is in Spain. This is perhaps the least amiable characteristic of the nation, and the one which a foreigner finds it most difficult to understand.

In the short space a weekly review can afford it is of course impossible to draw even the sketch of a great statesman. We have preferred to give what we believe to be the central idea of all his policy to discussing such questions as that of the proposal made to Austria in 1866, which have been already sufficiently argued by the daily press. Most readers of the book will probably cut open the last chapter, which treats the "Prince as a private man," first. It brings little that is new, and is perhaps the most disappointing in the whole work, which is only natural, as men of the Chancellor's calibre do not generally make speeches about their wives and children, or enlarge in public on home matters. It was already known that the Prince was once a distinguished swordsman among the Corps Burschen; we are here told that he fought about thirty duels while a student in Göttingen and Greifswald. The must, to use Goethe's expression, seems to have fermented in rather a wild way. It is pleasant, on the other hand, to hear that the first decoration granted to the Prince was a medal he won by saving the life of a drowning man at the risk of his own. A soldier was thrown from a horse he was watering, and overcome by the current. Herr von Bismarck, a young officer at that time, sprang from a neighbouring bridge to save him; but the soldier, in his terror, clung to him in such a way as to render escape impossible. Bismarck dived and kept the man under water until he became insensible, when he brought him safely to shore, and animation was soon restored. This is a characteristic story, and much of the Chancellor's so-called inconsiderateness is in fact as considerate as the force he then exercised in a way which was doubtless thought for the moment to be unkind. That he was well known as a marksman and fond of every form of sport in his youth, and that he still retains his love for dogs and horses, Englishmen hardly need to be told. It will be more surprising to many readers, though not to those who know such of his private letters as have been published, to learn how keen his enjoyment of natural scenery is, and how graphically he can describe it. It may be worth while to notice that the heather blossom is his favourite flower. Is it a mere chance that the two greatest Conservative statesmen of our generation have felt an especial fondness for the homeliest flowers that grow wild about their homes, or may we see in it a proof that they have possessed the "quiet mind" our old poets loved to praise? Herr Busch hints that Prince Bismarck has no great love for Schiller, which we can easily believe, and that his favourite poets are Goethe and Shakespeare. Is there not a certain concession to German susceptibilities in this statement? We believe that for every quotation or allusion to the German poet in the Prince's speeches, at least two similar references to the English dramatist may be found.

Herr Busch, as we have seen, deserves our cordial recognition on some points; indeed, we have only one serious fault to find with his work. He has, we believe, been a journalist, and, if so, he must surely know the value of an index. It is no easy matter for a busy man to keep the contents of 892 closely printed pages in his head; it is still harder to remember under what heading the author has thought it right to insert the passage to which he desires to refer. The closer his study of the original has been, the more likely he is to feel at a loss; for the connexion of the thoughts is broken, and he finds one part of a speech reproduced in one part of the volume, and another in another. Besides this, Herr Busch must know that such volumes as he has now produced, under auspices sufficiently official to induce the North German Gazette to publish a leader in support of his accuracy, have more than a temporary value. Future historians will have to consult this book as one of the principal authorities on the heroic period of German policy. Among these there may possibly be a writer or two worthy of some respect. Is each of these to make a table of contents for himself? We do not know whether the fault lies chiefly at the door of the author or the publisher; but we trust that it will be remedied as soon as possible, and venture to suggest that those who have already purchased the work should be enabled to procure the index in a similar form and at a moderate price.

ON THE BORDER LAND.*

ALL boys, and all men who retain anything of the natural boy, welcome a new book by Mr. Frederick Boyle. The author has seen a great deal of the dark places of the earth, which are full not only of horrid cruelty, but of wonderful adventures, beautiful quadroons, Herculean swordsmen, stealthy slaves, sapphires, opals, and all the enchantment of the Arabian Nights. To think that all this ancient and gorgeous state of things is existing still on the borderland of civilization is to feel that the world is not yet worn out, that romance is still possible. To our mind, Mr. Boyle and Mr. R. L. Stevenson are much the most romantic of living English writers. The difference between them is that Mr. Boyle has seen with his own eyes all the marvels of the world adventurous, while Mr. Stevenson rather knows them by intuition, or as a man might remember some former life. On the other hand, Mr. Stevenson's style, his power of constructing a story, all his literary qualities in fact save one, are of a much higher order than Mr. Boyle's. The chief literary gift of the author of On the Border Land is his power of making a reader feel the air, atmosphere, and colour of the strange and remote places he describes. In the very first story here, "A Strange Wooing," we have a vision of a baking, mouldering, dusty, and ragged tropical settlement of half-breeds, as clear as if the place were reflected in a mirage. The next story, "The Romance of a Mirage," is equally remarkable, if one may borrow the talk of the art critic, for distinct and rare effects of light, colour, and hot tremulous air. There is something like genius in the opening of this story, in the vision of a great Oriental palace, with all its crowd of men and women, daily beheld by telegraph clerks in a Red Sea port. In the same tale the description of an Oriental prison where the Turkish captives starve is wonderfully vivid. Again and again Mr. Boyle displays this power, which it is scarcely fair to call word-painting. His effects are produced without obvious effort, but naturally occur in the course of his story. He does not seem to say to himself, "Now for a description," but beneath his pen the picture rises before our eyes exactly as in a mirage. The events, however, which pass in these scenes, so curiously real, are perhaps less interesting than in some of Mr. Boyle's earlier collections of stories. The characters seem less real than the places in which they have their momentary being. Mr. Boyle is a skilled teller of stories of adventure. But one sometimes feels as if the thread of a love adventure which runs through his pages were of secondary importance to the author. This is not always the case. In "A Sapphire" there is much pathos, a touching natural sentiment, in the wistful and innocent passion of the Pasha's daughter for a dissipated renegade. In "Captain Wrench's Illusion," on the other hand, the interest of the narrative is quite subordinate to the general stage effect, to the grouping of necromantic Hindoo gipsies, high-caste Eurasians, and "volcanic" Roumanian officers. One admires the picture of Hagar, that fiery beauty; one is not very keenly concerned about her fortunes. The same remark applies to the little quadroon firebrand, the heroine of "A Strange Wooing."

In this volume Mr. Boyle's occasional papers are, perhaps, rather better than his stories. He has our respectful sympathy when he writes, "I should not value the companionship of a man who did not like to handle and see and own jewels." He moves a natural envy when he admits that he has "owned a pretty little heap of pearls, emeralds, and diamonds." With this romantic appreciation of precious stones (not for wearing purposes of course) Mr. Boyle is naturally interested in Aggry beads and Popo beads. As most people know, those treasures (which our glass-makers cannot imitate) are found in the soil of Ashanti, and are highly valued by the people. To an English eye the success of our imitations is perfect, "but the youngest negro is not deceived." Mr. Boyle agrees with "the best authorities" that these beads are ancient Egyptian articles of commerce. But the beads are "seldom or never" found with mummies. Apparently the Egyptians only used them, if use them they did, for traffic with the inland peoples of Africa. The beads must have travelled from hand to hand across the continent, from the Nile to the Prah. They are found in the earth because they were concealed there by, or were buried with, their ancient owners, who may have died in Rhamses's time. There is much romance in Aggry beads, about which Mr. Boyle tells one of his best stories. His paper on "Courage" is full of exciting modern instances. His essay on Arab and Sepoy, showing how the Sepoy despises the Egyptian, and how "a vague Panislamism" might overcome this contempt, is very opportune. All Mr. Boyle has to say about the Arabs, their character and their future, is most useful at present, and gives additional value to his stories, romances, reminiscences. The best parts of the book are like good talk by a man of much and strange experience and of vivid imagination. To every one who likes such talk we recommend On the Border Land. By the way, Mr. Boyle claims the license of the story-teller. But is it true, or only a touch of art, that the Ashanti chiefs have their totems fashioned in gold, and crown their umbrellas with this ornament? If we had our crests as handles for our umbrellas, errors of a deplorable sort might be less common.

MEMOIRS OF JAMES ROBERT HOPE-SCOTT.*

JAMES ROBERT HOPE-SCOTT was a man the record of whose life, ranging from 1812 to 1873, was well worth writing, not because he appealed with the undivided personality of a whole symmetrical career to the sympathies of a broad mass of survivors, but on account of the separate and ostensibly diverging circles with which one after the other he contracted ties not easy to be forgotten. The High Churchman is anxious to hear of the early life of the typical lay member of the great Newmanite set at Oxford; the Romanist longs to know more of so distinguished a convert; the lawyer and the railroad speculator must be warmed to one whose reputation in Parliamentary committee-rooms was that of a success of unparalleled brilliancy; the literary man and the disciple of Scott has kindly associations with the adopted son and master of Abbotsford; and London society cannot yet have forgotten one so handsome and so attractive. Mr. Ornsby's sympathies are with the Roman Catholic element of this multiform character; and it is no little praise to be able to note the honesty, fairness, and industry which he shows in presenting so fully the other sides.

The value of the book is much enhanced by the copious collection of letters which it contains, some from Mr. Hope-Scott himself and others addressed to him by his correspondents, notably Cardinal Newman and Mr. Gladstone, as well as by the sketches of his personality respectively offered in Mr. Venables's note on his forensic characteristics, in Cardinal Newman's funeral sermon, and in Mr. Gladstone's letter to Miss Hope-Scott. Mr. Hope-Scott had the good habit of keeping letters, and the world has profited accordingly. On the other hand, there are only three letters by Dr. Pusey, and none from Mr. Keble, Bishop Wilberforce, or Montalembert, all of whom it might have been supposed would, either in earlier or in later days, have been among Mr. Hope's correspondents.

James Robert Hope, born in 1812, was the third son of Sir Alexander Hope, a distinguished general, and brother of one still more eminent, the Earl of Hopetoun, known in the Peninsular war as Sir John Hope. His eldest brother, from whom much had been expected, died young, from the effects of a sunstroke; but the next one, Mr. C. W. Hope, passed with much credit and popularity through public life, having been Under-Secretary for the Colonies in Sir Robert Peel's Government. James Hope was pupil at Eton of the genial and enthusiastic Edward Coleridge, and proceeded in due time to Christ Church, at an interesting period, for the college was then at a high academic level, and the seed-plot of future Tractarians and Peelites. The handsome, energetic youth soon became the most popular of undergraduates as one of the "three Jems" (the others being future Governors-General of India, as Lord Dalhousie and Lord Elgin); but the coming intimacy with Mr. Gladstone was still only acquaintanceship. To the disappointment of those who were looking for great things, Mr. Hope's academic career resulted in an honorary fourth; but in due time he was elected—on reputation, and not by competition—to a fellowship at Merton, an institution which at that time reflected its mediæval picturesqueness in the spirit of some at least of its members. James Hope was not long in falling under such attractive influences. He sought the acquaintance of Mr. Newman, and enlisted under his banner. A mental struggle as to the choice of profession gave a grave tone to his years of early manhood, characteristic of a man whose constitutional reserve took the shape of masking deep feelings under external sunniness. Barrister was ultimately his decision rather than clergyman, although the good old general his father exerted his influence on that side. But it was a choice made under the deepest religious feeling, and the hope of reviving the much neglected study of ecclesiastical law was obviously a strong operative inducement. At this period, too, he had turned his thoughts to the science of academic and religious archæology, and a history of Merton College, travelling over the field of University and collegiate antiquities, was taken in hand, although somewhat inexplicably left to drop without, as far as we see, a fragment surviving the change of purpose. When he was only twenty-eight years old, a rare opportunity fell to Mr. Hope, and it was admirably taken hold of. The Cathedral Chapters were threatened in 1840 with that rash and ignorant legislation from which they have been ever since suffering; so they decided to appear by counsel at the bar of the House of Lords, Mr. Knight Bruce, their leader, made a speech which was sound and dry, and Mr. Hope, the junior, followed with an oration alike conspicuous for argument and logic, and which at once made him famous.

The Chancellorship of the diocese of Salisbury was appropriately conferred on him by Bishop Denison; and so, alike by his merits and through his professional and official standing, he stood in the enviable position of trusty counsellor of a party of high principles, much learning, ready talents, buoyant resolves, and self-assured of a future which was sure to live in history whether beaten or victorious. But the worm was soon at the root of the vine. Of the complications arising out of Tract XC. we need not speak; they did not directly affect Mr. Hope, but they must have left their mark on his soul. In 1841 and 1842 a storm suddenly beat up, to the full burst of which he found himself exposed. Events travel so fast that some of our readers may be grateful if we help them to realize the once distinguished Prussian, M. de Bunsen, by noting that he was not only a keen and practised diplomatist, and a wide-read scholar, but a mystic and picturesque religionist, and father of the phrase "the Church of the Future." In all his characters he unhappily fixed his attention on Jerusalem, and conceived the idea of balancing the political and spiritual influence of the Greek and Roman Churches at the Holy City by evolving some dignitary who should represent a combination of general Protestantism. This he proposed to do by setting up a joint bishopric for England and Prussia; the prelate to be, indeed, consecrated in England, but on conditions which really involved a surrender by England to the "Evangelical" Establishment in Prussia, and not the acceptance by that country of Anglican principles a bishop who should be ornamental to Prussia, without committing it to the principle of Episcopacy. The scheme was hurried through by an Act of the short autumn Session of 1841, which had much else to think of now that Sir Robert Peel had just returned to power. Archbishop Howley and Bishop Blomfield strayed afield at the spiriting of M. de Bunsen, and even such men as Samuel Wilberforce and Dr. Hook favoured the project. For a time, too, Dr. Pusey and Mr. Hope were a little fascinated, but they did not go beyond the limits of graceful and dignified retreat; and, as far as Mr. Hope is concerned, the upshot was the issue of his one publication, a very powerful pamphlet. But the wound rankled, and its results were even more disastrous with a more distinguished man; for to Mr. Newman, as he has told us in the Apologia, the Jerusalem bishopric was in fact the beginning of the end, though that event was heralded by the publication of The Lives of the British Saints, on which he consulted Mr. Hope. The correspondence published by Mr. Ornsby will be curious for the historian of the Church Revival. Mr. Hope's advice was on the side of toning down the visible tendencies to Romanism of the biographers, but chiefly upon grounds of prudence.

Mr. Newman's secession in 1845 left Mr. Hope a working and pious member of the Church of England. But the old vigour and confidence were gone. No doubt also, although Mr. Ornsby touches rather briefly upon the incident, and does not recur to it, his alienation was helped in the slight put upon him by the rashly cautious dignitaries of the Scotch Episcopal Church, who avoided putting him upon the Council of Trinity College in Glenalmond, in helping to found which he had so nobly lavished time, thought, and means. This was a wrong which would have deeply, if silently, burnt itself into his sensitive nature. A similar repulse in reference to a similar institution in Ireland did not shake the faith of the man who, in the nobility of his character and the charm of his personal aspect, might be compared to James Hope. We mean of course Augustus Stafford. But it did the mischief with some other colleagues who could ill have been spared to the Irish Church. Then in 1850 came the Gorham judgment, on which in the same autumn was piled the burden of the Papal aggression madness; and on an early Sunday in 1851 Mr. Hope and Archdeacon Manning were received into the Church of Rome. Society was startled at this act on the part of the layman, so carefully had he been for years nursing his thoughts within his breast.

The last occasion on which Mr. Hope appeared as a champion of the Church of England was in the early days after the Gorham judgment, in March 1850, when he was forward in promoting, in concert with a few other leading Churchmen, a declaration, half protest and half prophecy, in deprecation of the conclusions reached by the Privy Council. Mr. Ornsby gives two paragraphs from this paper, but he does not quote that passage which probably more than anything else dissuaded persons who agreed with its general scope from signing the paper. The assertion therein contained was to the effect that, unless in some way the Church of England formally repudiated the judgment, that would eventually bind the Church to its false teaching, and so unchurch it. The ambiguous eventuality had, no doubt, a specific meaning to each signer, but not one and the same meaning on which all must agree, and no one could take diversely. The result was that out of the small band Mr. Hope, Archdeacon Manning, Archdeacon H. Wilberforce, and Mr. Badeley, in no long time—four years being the longest term—joined the Roman communion. Drs. Pusey and Mill, Mr. Keble, Mr. John Talbot, and Lord Richard Cavendish died in full and trusting communion with, and doing earnest work for, the Church of England, and Mr. Bennett still survives, the honoured Vicar of Frome.

Mr. Hope-Scott's personality in the days of his fervent Anglicanism may best be summed up in Mr. Gladstone's touching words in the letter which he addressed to Miss Hope-Scott after her father's death, and which Mr. Ornsby prints in its integrity:—

> From that time I only knew of his career as one of unwearied religious activity, pursued with an entire abnegation of self, with a deep enthusiasm, under a calm exterior, and with a grace and gentleness of manner, which, joined to the force of his inward motives, made him, I think, without doubt the most winning person of his day.

Before we pass from this chapter of the history we may sum up its incidents by saying that it clearly shows that James Hope had a character remarkably distinguished both by weak points and by strong points. The weaker points were in the direction of indolence, indecision, and a conscience so tender as at times to be self-tormenting. The strength of his nature lay in the abstract realization of the duty of working as the raison d'être of living, with the strength of purpose to give effect to this conclusion, and in that physical power of work which may and often does coexist with the temptation of indolence, although seldom efficacious unless supported by a strong will and clear sense of duty. The secretiveness which his friends were apt to complain of, doubtless with sufficient reason, was the natural result of both phases of his temperament. He was too sensitive in his self-communing to want to be seen into, and his will was too potent to desire to fall under the control of others, however valued and beloved.

In the meanwhile two incidents of great importance had made their mark on Mr. Hope's life; both of them, Mr. Ornsby seems to think, encouraged by his growing religious unsettlement. We will not admit this as regards the first, nor accept the half-apologetic form with which the biographer tells us that his hero took to wife an exceptionally attractive lady, daughter of Lockhart and grand-daughter of Sir Walter Scott, whose name and status still live through her—though it has passed by three distaffs—in Mr. Hope-Scott's, as he then became, daughter, Mrs. Maxwell Scott, lady of Abbotsford. The other incident, natural enough to a mind disturbed with troubles over which it brooded silently, was that, in the height of the railroad mania, Mr. Hope plunged into the business of that strange tribunal where there is no judge, but only a jury which charges itself, and no standard of right or wrong either legal or moral, but only a fleeting expediency. He rapidly became a leading, and in due course the leading, counsel at the Parliamentary Bar, practice at which disqualifies from Parliament, and never leads to a judgeship, but is abundantly and sometimes enormously lucrative, with the advantage of a complete holiday through the recess. Mr. Ornsby's picture of that peculiar profession is vivid and intelligible to outsiders, and his selections of cases in which Mr. Hope-Scott particularly shone well made. But the gem of the chapter is an essay—brief, logical, and brilliant—on the character of Mr. Hope-Scott in his forensic aspect by Mr. G. S. Venables, himself a most eminent illustration of the same Bar. The holidays seem to have been devoted to building and planting—fascinating tastes, and easy to be indulged by a gentleman who was proprietor at Abbotsford, in the Highlands, in Mayo, and at Hyères. But were such seasons and such recesses the horoscope which would have been cast in the days of buoyant Tractarianism for Hope of Merton?

That which then would have been anticipated, and which without respect to differences of communion we should now have wished to record as having come from the pen of Mr. Hope-Scott, was a labour of toilsome days—a magnum opus, or opera—in which he could have raised a durable monument in aid of religion and the Church as they might have presented themselves at the time of writing to the eyes of the writer. It may be said this was all well for an Anglican, as Mr. Hope was when he took up and abandoned—why Mr. Ornsby does not very clearly explain—the history of Merton College. No doubt a layman has not the elbow-room in the Roman Church on such questions as he would possess in the English communion. But still he has a wide field, as Kenelm Digby could testify, and W. G. Ward, whose second state was that of layman, and abroad writers such as De Maistre, Montalembert, Rio, and Ozanam. Yet none of these was a canonist as Mr. Hope was, so that he might have had even a higher vocation. Was the vocation of manipulating railway cases, involving the most versatile ingenuity, quite as high? We do not blame Mr. Hope for choosing this career. The solid reasons for the decision were weighty. Still, as a question of distinct preference, we should have felt the ideal was more nearly reached through a course of life differing in some important details from that on which his most general fame was based. It is not censorious to say that the Church of Rome had something of a moral right to anticipate solid contributions from a recruit at once such a scholar and so accomplished. Not even a review or a magazine article, as far as we are told, ever fell from his pen as Anglican or as Roman, except that one which he wrote, still very young, on Merton College in the British Critic while Mr. Newman continued to edit it. We do not dwell on that other avenue to fame by work well done, the public life; for Mr. Hope-Scott's special profession, with its tempting material advantages, was a block to this. The excuse—unanswerable within its own sphere—was ready for the refusal to embark on that career of member of Parliament for which Mr. Hope-Scott possessed such conspicuous qualifications in the etiquette which declares membership incompatible with pleading before Committees; but in compensation the greater Bar, with its higher aims and wider area, was then lying open at the disposal of an advocate so eloquent and so ingenious, and with a brilliant reputation ready-made.

It would also be cruel not to take into account the deep wounds to his affectionate home-loving nature of the deaths of Mrs. Hope-Scott, and of a second wife, most worthy also to share his affections—Lady Victoria, the Duke of Norfolk's sister—and of multiplied bereavements of infant children.

Cardinal Newman indeed in his funeral sermon, so happily published by the biographer, suggests that Mr. Hope-Scott's "refinement of mind"—a phrase by which he clearly points to something not far removed from fastidiousness—might have stood in his way in the race of public life. The answer is easy. It was not found to be an obstacle in the committee-room, where neither clients nor opponents are apt to be the worse for over-refinement, nor yet the tribunal before which the counsel is pleading. But again the Cardinal points to the groove in which the public man must move. But was there no groove in the occupation which his friend made his own? He is equally emphatic on the want of ambition which he attributes to the famous advocate, and in this he is enthusiastically seconded by Mr. Gladstone in his letter to Miss Hope-Scott. We can but bow to two such authorities, and both of them so intimate with the subject of their criticisms. But still we must ask what was the feeling, if it was not ambition, which led Mr. Hope so eagerly to strive after, and so industriously to cling to, the leadership in his branch of the legal profession? Ambition is not confined to the hunger for title, place, and pension. It is as ambitious to wish to be recognized a poet as to be created a baronet.

So, to conclude, we are driven to say that Mr. Hope-Scott's own previous studies would have qualified him, as we have already hinted, for exceptional services on behalf of the communion of his predilections. None of the writers whom we have referred to possessed any knowledge of Canon Law; and in Canon Law he was reputed a master. From the point of view of the Roman Catholic Church, we cannot conceive any more valuable contribution to its cause than a vindication of its disciplinary system by an Englishman at once laic and lawyer, skilled in rhetoric and brilliant in society. We believe Anglicanism would not have suffered from the assault, but probably gained by the conflict of wits which it would have provoked. But, if we belonged to the other side, we should have felt that we had not netted all that we had a right to expect from Mr. Hope's change. In short, it must be mournfully confessed by both parties in the controversy that, with all private virtues and all his self-sacrificing and boundless charities, with all his triumphs before Private Bill Committees, the later compared with the earlier life of James Hope-Scott must, by those, be they Romanists or Anglicans, to whom the Kingdom of God on earth is a reality, requiring for its building up learning not less than piety, be sorrowfully accepted as a disappointment. We who knew James Robert Hope know what he was; but he leaves a reputation which must every year become more indistinct as his personal friends drop off. What will remain will be the tradition of a man whom all believed capable of enriching posterity with enduring legacies which stand represented by one eloquent speech, and one pungent pamphlet, spring fruits both of them.

FIVE NOVELS.*

MRS. COMYNS CARR deserves a wreath in the Capitol, or at least a crown of violettes de Parme, sent with great care from Italy to England. She has succeeded in writing a novel of Italian life that reconciles the savage critic, who from much provocation has been wont to gnash his teeth over such novels, to the subject, or rather (which is in fact what all good books do) she has made it unnecessary for the critic to bother himself about the subject at all. It is sufficient that her characters are men and women, quite true and real. Whether (which they probably are also) they are exact copies of the actual peasants round Genoa becomes a merely academic question. At least they do not found their pretensions to be Genoese on the fact that they are not human beings, as is the case with certain literary, or would-be literary, compatriots of theirs in the world of fiction. But it is hardly fair to Mrs. Comyns Carr to judge her in this "comparative, rascally" fashion, for her book has the merit not merely of recompensing the reader for the many woes which he has heretofore suffered at the hands of Italianate novelists, but of making him forget them. The main theme of La Fortunina is simple enough. A young peasant who has remained unmarried out of deference for a rather masterful mother, discovers on his way to market a child abandoned on the bank of a stream, and in danger of perishing. He rescues it, and, after intending to deposit it in the Foundling Hospital of the town, relents and determines, in spite of scandal and in spite of his mother's grumbles, to bring it up as his own. Things go on for some years, during which he cherishes the infant (the ill-tempered old mother, but not so ill as ill-tempered, disappearing early) and the memory of a kind of dream-love of his—a girl whom he has seen at a village festa and long lost sight of. Then the intrigue knots itself. The girl reappears, and the reader, if not Pietro Paggi, the hero, knows at once that she, Vittoria Vite, is La Fortunina's mother. But Pietro has slipped rather than fallen into the nets of a damsel of his own neighbourhood, Teresina della Fontana, in whom Mrs. Comyns Carr hesitates not to let us see a very much worse specimen of womankind, for all her demureness, than the lost and reckless Vittoria. Then there is the male villain of the book, Carlo Strappa, "the Americano," as the somewhat envious inhabitants of the village to which he has returned with money (no one quite knows how got) call him. How the Americano, designing to do Pietro the worst of injuries, in reality brings about the happiness of his life; how the child Fortunina is a good angel both to her real mother and her putative father; and how a very unpromising business comes to a very good ending may be left for readers to discover. The book, it may be repeated, is a really pleasant one. Local colour is used and not abused; there is no topsiturvification of sentiment; and if the reader is inclined to think Vittoria on the whole rather too good for her lot, that is a reflection which has frequently occurred in reference to the things of this world to many persons, from Alfonso el Sabio downwards. What is most particularly to be commended in the book is its comfortable freedom from fine writing. On the other hand, as it is well to temper unqualified eulogy, Mrs. Comyns Carr may be reminded that the phrase "figure of a man," "figure of a girl," and so forth, which she uses not unfrequently, is not commendable unless in evident and designed burlesque. We really have nothing else against La Fortunina.

"Remember," said an aged journalist once to an aspiring novice, "that you must not be too clever." Mr. Norris has always been in need of this admonition, and in Thirlby Hall he is perhaps more in need of it than ever. To explain, or at least to illustrate, what we mean, it may be well to say that before reading the book we gave it to another person, a confirmed novel-reader, to read. The verdict was very unfavourable. Our verdict after reading it is not unfavourable; but we have not the least difficulty in accounting for the discrepancy. In the first place, Mr. Norris is a long time in getting any story that he has to tell into working order. In the second, his hero is justly described by the best character in the book, at the end of it, as "having no definite ideas, never knowing what he would be at, and possessing just enough intelligence to spoil a pleasant stupid fellow without making a clever one of him." In the third, the villain is such an exceedingly refined and quintessential villain that it is not quite certain whether he is a villain at all. Now all this, especially when the indeterminate hero tells the story with a great deal of very faintly accentuated irony of himself, and when he tells it at very great length, is quite fatal to that honest, straightforward enjoyment which the majority of readers look for in novels. We shall go further, and say that, though we have got some enjoyment out of Mr. Norris's book ourselves, we are not sure that we ought to have done so. His novel-style is something like a conversational style which, if not very common, is not unknown. The talker does not say anything very striking or very witty; but he has an obliging air of leaving his auditor to put the dots on the i's, and a still more obliging air of feeling sure that the auditor is a clever enough fellow to do it. If the said auditor is not stupid enough, or honest enough, or impatient enough to get tired of this sort of thing, he sometimes feels it flattering, and sometimes when his own mood exactly supplements that of the speaker he really enjoys it. But these cases are perhaps rarer than that of simple impatience. Mr. Norris is always laughing in a mild, gentlemanlike, sleeve-contained manner at his heroes, and his personages and himself. Speaking as personally as a critic has any right to do, that is a mood with which we have much sympathy; but it is not a mood with which the majority of any public, and least of all the British public, is likely to sympathize. As for the story of Thirlby Hall it is double. It turns partly on the machinations of a finished vaurien who has been disinherited and turned out of doors by his father to get himself, or at least his son (for he has this redeeming spark of natural feeling), reinstated, and partly on the schemes of a femme incomprise, Lady Constance Milner, to get married well, and for choice to Charles Maxwell, the hero who is, in default of the vaurien and his child, the heir. Charles Maxwell, so excellently described in the passage quoted above, is really in love with another young woman, but is quite bewitched and mastered by Lady Constance's wiles, not to mention that he is made a complete fool of by his cousin the vaurien. The actual story is slight and a little improbable; the chief appeal of the book lying in the character-sketches and in the running commentary of mild sarcasm which the author (through the not very well selected medium of Charles Maxwell himself) pours upon almost every one of his personages. Not for the first time it is evident that Mr. Norris has read his Thackeray too well and not quite wisely enough. We have very strong doubts whether Thackeray as a novelist is imitable at all, his method being almost irreducible to any general principles that can be safely applied by an inferior hand. At any rate, Mr. Norris, though both here and elsewhere he has produced work of considerable interest and merit, does not seem to manage it.

The novels of Mrs. J. K. Spender increase in number, and they do not show any appreciable falling off in merit. But unluckily theirs is a kind which had need to show some appreciable advance. They are quite readable, and by no means ill-written, while the author appears to take some considerable pains with their construction. Mr. Nobody itself, though the idea of an ill-treated outcast coming back as a millionaire to lord it in the neighbourhood of his youthful troubles is not very novel or very promising, has a tolerably sufficient differentia of plot and some fair incident. Vere Rashleigh, the heroine, is a rather agreeable heroine. But the reader fails to take much interest in Reuben Sellwood's vindictive and rather unintelligible plans against the Rashleigh family, and his son, Godfrey Sellwood, who may be supposed to be the hero, is desperately conventional—only less conventional than his friend the Hon. Charles Lloyd. It is impossible to say that no young man ever talked such dreary trash as Godfrey Sellwood talks to his unhappy father (who is very long about turning him out of doors); but any young man who does so talk has no business in a novel except as a butt. Lastly, the story which, in the midst of the humours of a rather odd kind of election, frightens Reuben Sellwood out of his headstrong attitude, is a story of a cock and of a bull which such a man would have been very unlikely to be cowed by. However, the heroine makes some amends for all this; and the book, as has been said, is by no means devoid of interest. The author should be a little more careful of the quotations and illusions with which she garnishes her work. We are not aware that Mme. de Maintenon ever said, "After me, the Deluge." In the first place, there was no reason why she should; and, in the second, her piety and propriety would have been much shocked at any such sentiment. There is a difference between Louis XIV. and Louis XV.

A novel by a novice (and such Mr. Wynter Frore Knight would seem to be, for the mention of no previous work is tacked on to his ingeniously-devised pen-name), which contains a murder, a mystery, and a trial, is likely to strike the breast of the fearful reviewer with alarms. It does not become less alarming when it is seen that the author is jocularly inclined in the interval of his mysteries and his murders. Early Lost, Late Found, however, rather agreeably disappoints him whose experience of many woes makes him apprehensive of more. Mr. Knight needs practice in the charpente of a plot, and his social satire shows more good intention than polish, more ingenuity of conception than patience of execution. But his story and personages (the latter are rather unnecessarily numerous) are not without interest, and he sometimes succeeds in being really funny. The devotion of an aged clergyman to his pigs, and the way in which he mistakes admiring expressions from his daughter's lovers for tributes to his favourites, is not perhaps a very novel or a very merry jest, but another sprout of Mr. Knight's fancy is not bad. A sporting squire is killed, and a certain humanitarian couple among his neighbours, who look upon field sports with horror, hit upon an explanation of the mysterious death which is quite satisfactory to themselves. The horrid man was never happy unless he was killing something, and, being for the moment out of victims, there can be little doubt that he killed himself. This kind of wit, however, is particularly likely to be overdone, and Mr. Knight has certainly overdone it. In the same way he has got to learn that serious characters need not, and, if they are to be successful, must not, talk "book." In fact, he has plenty to learn, but it does not appear by any means impossible that some day or other he may learn it. Now there are a good many of his fellow workmen and workwomen in the craft of novel-writing of whom it would be very rash to say this.

Dr. Heidenhoff's Process is one of those books which are likely to be very differently judged, and in reference to which it is not very easy even for a wary and experienced critic to assign final reasons for his own judgment. For it is a book liking or disliking of which will depend wholly on what has been called the "total nervous impression." In our case that impression is distinctly favourable, but it is easy enough to conceive a mood (the fate of books of this kind is always more or less a matter of mood) in which a judge not by any means incompetent might come to a different conclusion. The book is American, but it is entirely free from neo-American mariyaudage. It is brief, goes directly to the point, indulges in hardly any elaborate analysis of character, and, except for the quaint and rather far-fetched conceit which gives it its title and its conclusion, it might almost be called matter of fact. The scene is laid in one of those curious American villages where society finds in the drug-store clerk and the gunsmith's assistant its Amadis and its Galaor, where the chief intellectual dissipation is a prayer-meeting, and where, notwithstanding, a certain level not altogether low of manners and education is kept up. The belle of the village is Madeline Brand, a coquette with a heart capable of passion—a combination which Mr. Bellamy is right in representing as a very dangerous one. The drug-store clerks and the gunsmiths' assistants sigh in vain, or only with the result of passing gleams of favour, until at length one of them, Harry Burr, is luckier. Madeline half engages herself to him, without however having really given him her heart. Her a more dangerous counterjumper appears on the scene with city manners and a handsome face. Harry is at once discarded and in despair leaves the place. When he returns he hears to his horror that there has been a scandal and that Madeline has disappeared. He hunts for her in Boston, at last finds her, and, reckless of what has happened, once more begs her to marry him. At first incredulous, she at last consents without much knowing what she is doing. But his devotion slowly awakes in her real love for him, and at the same time determines her not to bind him for life to a wife with a dishonoured and rankling memory. The book has begun with a suicide—an episodic one, which it is not necessary to discuss; the reader may be left to discover whether or no it ends with one. But the ending is preluded by a quaint and rather violent conceit of the author's brought in in a fashion which also may be left for the book to explain. Dr. Heidenhoff, of whom the reader may be surprised not to have heard anything all this time, is a physician with a nostrum for taking away the memory of particular deeds by electricity, a process which he maintains not merely to be beneficent to the individual, but of the greatest importance to society. We own that, to our thinking, this part of the book might be cut down, if not cut away, with great advantage. But the story in itself is skilfully and almost powerfully told; the revulsion of Madeline's feelings in the last scenes is drawn with truth and effect, and the total impression of the book is one of unquestionable though rather morbid pathos. The scene in which Madeline and Harry meet again, and she takes his offers for a refined variety of insulting revenge, is worth a wastepaper basketful of the fiddle-faddling triviality with which some industrious and not altogether undeserving writers have recently identified the term American novel, and which some silly Englishmen and Englishwomen seem to take as a new revelation, instead of a skilful pastiche of the style of a hundred and fifty years ago. Mr. Bellamy's characters are not so clever as some of their contemporaries in fiction; but they are made of flesh and blood, not of leather and prunella.

II.

AFTER considering all the iconoclasm with which we concluded our last article, it will be well to glance at those old theories of construction which are confirmed, or fresh ones that are suggested, by the new measurements. By applying those principles of "inductive metrology" which he has himself elsewhere explained, Mr. Petrie finds that two measures were used by the Pyramid-builders—one of 20·62 British inches, with a probable error of ·01, which he calls a cubit, and the other ·727, with a probable error of ·002, which he calls a digit; but it seems at first sight a strange fact that the cubit is not a simple multiple of the digit. Mr. Petrie, however, points out that "a square cubit is the double of a square of 20 digits, so that halves of areas can be easily stated," or "a square cubit has a diagonal of 40 digits." This relation was suggested by the fact that one of the two great principles of construction found to satisfy the new measurements is that the squares of many of the lines of the Pyramid bear simple numerical relations to each other; the other is that many of the lines bear a π proportion to each other. For instance, the height of the Pyramid is the radius of a circle whose circumference equals the perimeter of the base; and it is worth noting here that a side of the base is 440 of Mr. Petrie's new cubits in length. The width of the King's Chamber is the radius of a circle of which the circumference is equal to the perimeter of a side, and the height is determined by the fact that the length of the chamber is twice the breadth. The height of the end, therefore, is equal to $\pi - 2$ times its width. And this relation determines the form of the section of all the passages, the gallery, and ramps—the passages being $\frac{1}{10}$th, the gallery $\frac{2}{10}$ths, and the ramps $\frac{1}{10}$th the size of the end in each direction. We have seen that the coffer is so roughly made that no theory of its construction can be regarded as very probable. Still, the most probable seems to be that its dimensions are all respectively $\frac{1}{10}$th of those of the chamber.

In the relations between the dimensions of the King's Chamber, given alone, the height is taken to be the height of the walls; but it is well known that the floor is raised above the bottom of the walls. And, taking the height from the floor of the King's Chamber, we find a relation similar to that which holds in all the other chambers, and which Mr. Petrie states as follows:—"The squares of the dimensions of the King's Chamber, the Queen's Chamber, the Antechamber, and the Subterranean Chamber are all even numbers of square cubits, and nearly all multiples of 10. From this it necessarily follows that the squares of all the diagonals of the sides of these chambers, and their cubic diagonals, are likewise multiples of 10 square cubits; and the King's and Queen's Chambers are so arranged that the cubic diagonals are in even hundreds of square cubits, or multiples of 10 cubits squared." The levels at which the chambers were placed seem to have been determined as follows:—"The King's Chamber was placed at the level where the vertical section of the Pyramid was halved, where the area of the horizontal section was half that of the base, where the diagonal from corner to corner was equal to the length of the base, and where the middle of the face was equal to half the diagonal of the base. The Queen's Chamber was placed at half this height above the base, and exactly in the middle of the Pyramid from N. to S., and the apex of the "construction chambers is at about the same height above the floor of the King's Chamber as that is above the floor of the Queen's Chamber." Thicker courses were, "perhaps intentionally," introduced in the masonry where the area of the course was a multiple of $\frac{1}{10}$ the base area. The only other relations of any certainty are that the lengths "of the entrance passage, the ascending passage, the antechamber passages, and perhaps the Queen's Chamber passage, are all in round numbers of cubits," while the horizontal length of the "gallery" is equal to the vertical height of its end above the base; and, lastly, "the outer length, at an extreme maximum," of the coffer "may have been $\frac{1}{100}$ of the length of the Pyramid base; and, as the inner length of the second Pyramid coffer has the same relation to its Pyramid, this is rendered the more likely."

These are the theories which are rendered most probable by Mr. Petrie's new measurements. But one naturally asks for a theory, in the wider sense of the word, to account for the mystery of the Great Pyramid. What was it built for? It seems tolerably certain that it was intended for a tomb; but it must have been something more; its builders would hardly have constructed it so exactly for a mere whim. What object, then, had they in taking so much care? and in particular what is the meaning of the grand gallery? These questions Mr. Petrie does not even notice, except to completely overthrow the "accretion theory," yet we cannot leave the subject without asking what explanation is possible.

It is unfortunate that both the books to which we referred at the beginning of our last article, and each of which advocates a "theory," were written before Mr. Petrie had published his vast collection of facts. This is specially true of Mr. Ballard's work; for the author has evidently taken much trouble in calculating details, from data which now turn out to be mistaken. All his new ratios of the dimensions of the Great Pyramid, and, in particular, the relation he points out between them and the ratios of the pentangle, though ingenious, are mere geometrical accidents; the π proportion explaining the facts more nearly than any other theory of construction. His theory of the construction of the second Pyramid is vitiated by his taking a value for its slope which is as much as 24′ outside the probable error of Mr. Petrie's measurement of it.

His main theory of the purpose of the Pyramids occurred to Mr. Ballard twenty-three years ago. As he was then passing through Egypt by train, and "noticed their clear-cut lines against the sky, and their constantly changing relative position," he said to himself "Here be the theodolites of the Egyptians." The boundaries of the cultivated lands in the Nile valley must have continually been destroyed, or shifted, by the annual overflowings of the river, and the Pyramids, according to this theory, were the great surveying instruments by which they could be readjusted. Direction lines could be determined by the relative positions of the Pyramids as seen from a distance, and the necessity of not confusing their outlines is supposed to be the reason why the third Pyramid was cased with red granite. Mr. Ballard then shows how these direction lines might be very accurately determined with the help of a small model of the group, and be connected with the other groups of Pyramids in the Nile valley, thus forming a vast system of triangulation for the whole country. Each of the obelisks may have marked a point in the direction lines, and the slopes of its sides may have been equal to the apparent slope of the nearest edge of one of the Pyramids as seen from it.

The simplicity and convenience of this use of the Pyramids depends, however, upon certain plain ratios supposed to hold good for the Gizeh group, and from which "a system of trigonometry ensues in which base, perpendicular, and hypotheneuse of every triangle is a whole measure without fractions." Unfortunately this system cannot be accepted, for these plain ratios are inconsistent with Mr. Petrie's new measurements; and with them of course is also overthrown the cubit of 20·2 inches, which Mr. Ballard deduces from them.

But, though the simplicity and neatness of Mr. Ballard's theory cannot be maintained, we must not forget Mr. Petrie's kindly warning that, in giving the old theories a "decent burial," "we should take care that in our haste none of the wounded ones are buried alive"; and it seems to us quite possible that, amongst their other objects, the Pyramids of Gizeh may have been used for the purpose Mr. Ballard supposes.

A theory much more strikingly in agreement with the facts is that suggested in the little book by Mr. Proctor. Proclus has recorded the tradition "that the Pyramids of Egypt terminated above in a platform, from which the priests made their celestial observations." Working out this suggestion, Mr. Proctor supposes that each Pyramid was an astrological observatory, from which the priests "ruled the stars" in favour of its builder. He gives reasons for a probable Chaldæan influence in the origin of the Pyramids, and shows how this theory would agree with Chaldæan ideas of astrology; and, in particular, why each king needed a separate Pyramid. The entrance passage would be used to orient the Pyramid, and hence would be pointed at some bright star at its lower culmination. A vertical shaft from the lower end of the passage to the surface would allow a plumb-line to be placed due south of another at its entrance. As layer after layer of masonry was added the passage would be continued through the layers in order to orient each of them separately. Ultimately, however, the passage would reach the surfaces of the Pyramid, and layers above that could not be oriented. To avoid this difficulty, the ascending passage opens out of the entrance passage at the same angle of altitude, and in the same azimuth; the masonry is built with special exactness at the junction of the two passages, in order to admit of the lower part of the entrance passage being plugged, and water being poured in, for the purpose of orienting the higher layers of masonry by reflection. The ascending passage began at such a point that its floor might reach the level where the vertical section of the Pyramid is halved at a point in the E. and W. plane passing through the Pyramid's axis; and so the vertical face of the step at the head of the grand gallery lies exactly in the E. and W. mid plane of the Pyramid. A purpose is then found for the grand gallery; it is a great transit instrument. Mr. Proctor shows how its form exactly suits this theory; the ramp holes were to hold benches, and probably also eye-pieces for the observers; and the strange groove running along each side of the gallery might be used to carry a screen. The top of the gallery would be purposely excentric in order to allow observers to see from the corners across the centre of the platform. After the King's death his coffin would be placed on the platform, and the King's Chamber built round it, with the passages too small to allow of its exit, and the rest of the Pyramid would be finished.

This theory agrees well with all previously known facts, and it is worth while to inquire how far it agrees with the new facts brought to light by Mr. Petrie. In the first place, no trace of a vertical shaft can be found near the lower end of the entrance passage, though all the so-called "trial passages" in the rock outside are furnished with vertical shafts in exactly the way one would expect; it is possible, however, that such a vertical shaft may have existed, and have been plugged when its use was past. The bright star which may have shone down the entrance passage is a Draconis at either of the dates 3400 or 2200 B.C. Mr. Petrie seems to assume that we are limited to the later date, and rightly asserts that this date is inconsistent with the historical chronology; but his only objection to the older date is that its adoption "omits half the theory (that part relating to the Pleiades)," but Mr. Proctor has shown that the Pleiades were "even more favourably observable from the great meridional gallery" at the older date; and further, that at the later date no bright star could ever have been seen through the ascending passage; while, at the earlier, a Centauri would once a day shine down the whole length of the ascending passage, so that Mr. Petrie's objection on this point seems to fall to the ground.

On the other hand Mr. Petrie shows that the excellence of the building very markedly deteriorates above the level of the King's Chamber floor. The top is not square; the "chambers of construction" are very roughly and badly built; and the rough and inaccurate building of the antechamber and King's Chamber walls suggests, even to Mr. Petrie, who advances no theory on the subject, that "the supervision was less strict as the work went on, owing to more hurry and less care, or owing to the death of the man who had really directed the superfine accuracy of the earlier work." A similar superiority in the work of the lower to that of the upper part is observable in the south Pyramid at Dahshur. All this agrees with Proctor's theory, the inaccuracies all being found above the level of the observing platform, where scientific accuracy ceased to be of any importance.

Of Mr. Petrie's researches into the mechanical methods of the Pyramid-builders we have had no space to speak. It appears that the masons planned the whole of the casing, and probably also the case masonry of each course, before a stone was put on. The whole of the stone was brought from the cliffs of Luzza and Masara, on the east bank of the Nile. The harder stones were cut with bronze tools, jewelled probably with "tough, uncrystallized corundum." Saws, which "must have been probably about nine feet long," tube drills, and even lathes, seem certainly to have been used. The stones were probably raised by rocking, which agrees with the mysterious description of "a machine made of short pieces of wood." The overflowing of the Nile would allow of an enormous levy of forced labour during the three months in which all agricultural work had to be suspended; and Mr. Petrie discovered a vast system of barracks to the west of the second Pyramid which would accommodate four thousand workmen. The skill of the workmen in cementing joints was marvellous. The casing stones were dressed plane, with "an amount of accuracy equal to most opticians' straight edges." The masons "could fill with cement a vertical joint about 5 × 7 feet in area, and only averaging $\frac{1}{50}$th inch thick," and that between stones so large that the joint could not be thinned by rubbing; and "this was the usual work over 13 acres of surface, with tens of thousands of casing stones, none less than a ton in weight." The accuracy of the dressed surfaces was tested by true planes smeared with ochre.

But the most wonderful performance of these great primæval builders is their squaring of the base of the Great Pyramid. It seems impossible that they could have measured the angles without telescopes. Hence we must believe that they corrected their angular measurements by calculating the square root of 2 with extreme accuracy, and then measuring a diagonal. But the rock is found to be higher in the "well" in the middle of the Pyramid than at the edges of the base; it would, therefore, be interesting to ascertain, if it were possible, whether a diagonal trench was levelled across the base. So great is their angular accuracy that the error of nearly 4′ in the orientation seems to be strong evidence that a change must have taken place in the position of the earth's axis.

None of the other Pyramids or the temples at Gizeh show the same accuracy as the Great Pyramid, and hence their measurements taken and carefully recorded by Mr. Petrie are not of the same interest or importance.

OLD MEXICO.*

THERE is certainly a revival of interest in Mexico. After the failure of the French attempt to plant a monarchy there the country relapsed into its customary state of chronic anarchy, and little was heard of it for the next ten years. The thin end of the wedge had, however, been driven in by the completion of the railway connecting the capital with the sea at Vera Cruz, and slowly but surely has something of civilization and order crept up the iron road. Not that any high standard has been attained as yet, but it is not too much to say that the old state of isolation has passed away never to return, and that mere contact with the rest of the world cannot fail to influence for good the whole future of the country. Our information respecting the social condition and general aspect of Mexico has hitherto been chiefly drawn from books of no very recent date, written by those whose duties compelled them to reside there in some official or commercial capacity; but the growing facilities for travel are already beginning to draw thither the omnivorous tourist, and we may expect an increased crop of books on a country at once so little known and possessed of so many attractions.

Mr. Bishop's volume on "Old Mexico and her Lost Provinces" bears the imprint of an English publishing firm, but one does not need to read further than the first sentence before the spelling shows us that it is written by an American. Portions of it have already, in point of fact, appeared in the New York Nation and in Harper's Monthly. It is well illustrated with numerous woodcuts, and written in an agreeable, if a somewhat desultory style. Mr. Bishop went by sea from New York, by way of Cuba, to Vera Cruz. This in itself is a journey of eleven days, longer in time than he would have occupied in going to Europe, in spite of its being the country contiguous with his own. "It was instead a case of going to a land remote far beyond its distance in miles; shrouded in an atmosphere of mystery and danger; little travelled or sought for; the very antipodes of our own, though adjoining it; venerable with age, though a part of the new world; and said to have been suddenly awakened from slumber by the first touches of a phenomenal new development." Fifteen years ago there were certainly more Englishmen than Americans in Mexico. English capital and Cornish miners were developing her mines; what little foreign trade existed was chiefly in the hands of English houses; London bondholders had lent money to successive Governments, and the Vera Cruz Railway was in course of construction by an English Company. Since their war with Mexico in 1848 the United States had got all they wanted from her, and had quite enough to do in developing their recent acquisitions to prevent them from turning their attention to their Southern neighbour. Subsequently, the Civil War having swept the American carrying trade from the seas, but little intercourse was maintained between the two countries. The demand for railways in every direction which has recently grown up in Mexico has lately attracted numbers of American engineers thither, and now tourists are following in their wake. Mr. Bishop found the system of railway construction very different to what it is in the States. In the latter, railways have been enabled to spread over the sparsely populated districts of the West by means of a system of grants from Government of extensive tracts of land on either side of the line, sometimes as much as every other square mile; by subsequent sale of these lands to emigrants the Companies have recouped themselves for their outlay, and at the same time provided a source of local traffic. In Mexico there existed no great vacant public domain, so the Government at first attached to each concession a subsidy of from 10,000 dollars to 15,000 dollars a mile. This was soon found to be too heavy a burden for the Exchequer, so recent charters have had no subsidy given with them, but certain privileges have been accorded instead to atone for its absence; material and supplies for the road are admitted duty free for twenty years, and a higher scale of charges is permitted. Neither the concession, property, nor shares can be alienated to any foreign Government.

While expressing a certain enthusiasm and hopefulness as to the prospects of the numerous railways now projected in Mexico, Mr. Bishop does not fail to utter a word of warning as to their being overdone. The United States, he points out, built railroads in advance of settlement, depending upon immigration to support them. Mexico has scarcely any immigration, and presents few inducements to it at present. All that her railways have to depend on therefore is the local carrying trade and the development of her own natural resources. Mr. Bishop does not consider that a parallel situation is to be found in the United States, but rather in countries such as Russia and India, which have a large peasant population to be developed, instead of a new population to be created. Mr. Bishop was struck with the extent to which the business of Mexico is already in the hands of foreigners, and he is no doubt right in attributing this chiefly to the revolutionary condition of the country, which subjected the natives who had acquired any ostensible wealth to constant exactions from the contending parties—exactions from which foreigners were partly exempt. Till recently the only form of wealth was the possession of land, as is the case in all undeveloped countries. The higher branches of trade and manufactures are generally introduced in such circumstances by foreigners who have practised them in a better organized community. We might find an example nearer home. Are not the names of Lombard Street and the Jewry evidence of something similar in England? The growth of a middle class is always a late phase in the evolution of a community. Without counting the two short-lived empires of Iturbide and Maximilian, there have been fifty-four Presidents in fifty-six years. It was not till 1848 that, for the first time, the Presidency was transferred without violence and under the law. Still, Mr. Bishop, in reviewing what has been accomplished under Porfirio Diaz and Gonzalez, the late and present holders of the office, is of opinion that their administrations, though not without their faults, are a vast improvement upon those of their predecessors, and do not, at any rate, constitute a declining ratio. Hitherto there has been absolutely no remedy for oppression but in rebellion. At the present moment there seems to be a weariness of fighting, and people have come to the conclusion that a bad Government is preferable to a good revolution. Not only will the railways prove to be a power on the side of order by enabling the Government to mass its forces at points of danger, but also they furnish useful and profitable employment to many who formerly had no occupation save plunder under the banners of some insurgent chief. Great administrative abuses, however, still exist—though Mexico is not singular in this—corruption is rife, and while the Government and all holders of office have opportunities for galling oppression, the people have no practicable redress in the ballot. It is nominally open to them, but few care to vote. Such opposition as there is, and all contests for office, turn on personal matters, and not on principles.

The accounts given by the author of different excursions which he took in the vicinity of the capital are exceedingly graphic. He made it his business to study the people in quiet, out-of-the-way places; he is consequently able to paint the people at home, and to supply those small touches of local colour which most travellers omit as too insignificant to record. The lakes, or rather lagoons, which lie at a short distance from the capital, and are connected with it by canals, afford an easy mode of communication. Happily for the lovers of the picturesque, steamboats have not yet been introduced; large flat-bottomed boats are poled along by three or four Indians on each side, who walk down towards the stern as far as the cabin, pushing from their shoulders, and then return up the middle to the bows to begin again, each man as he returns holding his pole horizontally at arm's length over his head so as to clear the heads of those who are still pushing. In this manner Mr. Bishop made the tour of Lakes Xochimilco and Chalco, and afterwards crossed Lake Texcoco to the old capital of that name. There he spent some days in the quiet interior life of the country, and occupied himself in witnessing the destruction of an old Aztec pyramid, which the owner was pulling down in order to get building material. These pyramids are composed of sun-dried bricks piled up at a very low angle, and are generally so weatherworn outside as scarcely to be distinguishable at first sight from natural knolls. Mr. Bishop was fortunate enough to be present at the finding of an important fragment of a bas-relief, seven feet by five, of which he gives a sketch; it represented part of the figure of a warrior, and contained a small calendar circle somewhat similar to the famous one let into the wall of the Cathedral at Mexico. Of antiquities, as such, Mr. Bishop professes himself to be no great admirer, but he has a keen eye for the beauties of the old Spanish street architecture—the flat roofs so well adapted to the climate, with the long spouts to carry the rain-water clear of the side walks; "the welcome portales, shady in sunshine and dry in the wet"; the scroll-work and carving and gay patterns in blue and yellow tiles on the fronts of many houses; the rich and quaint rococo ornamentation of the churches both inside and out—all these call forth repeated expressions of admiration. Mr. Bishop remarks that very little has been added to what the Spanish domination left; the modern movement since 1821 having little to be placed to its credit in the way of new buildings. There is an interesting chapter on "Mines and Mining Traits," chiefly gathered from a visit to those at Pachuca and Real del Monte; the various processes for "beneficiating" the ore are described, and a résumé is given of the mining laws. An account of the author's ascent of Popocatepetl, some 3,000 feet higher than Mont Blanc, and a chapter full of information on Mexican agriculture, derived from a most agreeable week's sojourn at a hacienda, bring to a close the portion of the book devoted to Old Mexico. The isolation of the central table-land is such that even at the present day there exists no complete wheel track from the capital to the Pacific; the journey to Acapulco consumes ten days on horseback, besides the day occupied in going by diligence to Cuernavaca, where the bridle-path begins. In spite of warnings as to the impracticability of the road during the rainy season, Mr. Bishop accomplished it successfully in the company of an intelligent Mexican colonel, and took the steamer for San Francisco.

The second portion of the work relates to the Lost Provinces—namely, California, Nevada, and the vast regions west of the Mississippi, out of which some half-dozen States and Territories have been carved since their incorporation into the Northern Union. So vast are these regions that, on the accession of the Emperor Iturbide, Mexico was able to boast of being, with the exception of Russia and China, the most extensive empire in the world. San Francisco is well described and illustrated. Often as it has been described of late, its growth has been so rapid that every traveller can find something new to say of the City of the Golden Gate. It was, however, Southern California that Mr. Bishop had marked out as his field of travel—i.e., that portion of the State which lies south of San Francisco. This favoured region, upwards of five hundred miles in length, has only recently been opened up by the Southern Pacific Railroad, which traverses the centre of the State in a direction nearly parallel with the coast, down to Fort Yuma, close to the Mexican boundary near the head of the Gulf of California, and thence strikes eastward through Arizona to join the railway system of the Southern States. Except during the rainy season the ground is mournfully bare and brown; during seven months of the year not a blade of grass is to be seen, though you have but to run water on it by irrigation to make the land do whatever you please. The wine-growing industry is being rapidly developed, chiefly by foreigners from the South of Europe, Italians, Portuguese, and Hungarians; in some of the vineyards scarcely a word of English is spoken. Americans, not having yet acquired the habit of looking on wine as a necessity of every-day consumption, do not take naturally to its production. Chinamen are servants in the mining camps, the ranches, and the houses of the better class; they supply labourers for the railroad, the factory, and the field. Mr. Bishop remarks that every settlement of the Pacific slope has its Chinese quarter, just as mediæval towns had their Ghetto for the Jews; denoting then as now social ostracism on the one hand, and indomitable clannishness on the other. As you go South cattle-raising becomes the leading industry, and cotton-growing has been tried with fair success. The lack of fuel prevents the development of manufactures. At the Tehachapi Pass, the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range, between which the railroad runs, effect a junction, and the line descends by a wonderful piece of engineering into Southern California proper. "Here the country is older, the Spanish names are more musical; orange and lemon are not grown for ornament, but as a principal crop; and the climate is of that genial mildness which is most to the taste of seekers for health." So marked is the difference below this mountain barrier that there is a call for the construction of a distinct new State, to be named South California, with its capital at Los Angeles. The Mexican element here forms something like one-third of the population, though it is but seldom that a Spanish name rises into prominence in the public affairs of the State of which they were once owners. The Mongolian is the labourer, the Mexican the small shopkeeper, but the overlordship belongs to the Anglo-Saxon, who, down to the limit of the tropics, on the Pacific as on the Atlantic coast of the New World, has, by his superior energy, secured to himself the harvest originally planted by other hands.

COURTHOPE'S ADDISON.*

BESIDES the Procrustean limits of the "Men of Letters" series, its authors sometimes labour under this disadvantage—that they succeed to other writers whose portraits, rightly or wrongly, have taken fast hold of the popular intelligence. Not a few readers of to-day, for instance, date their impressions of Steele, of Addison, of Swift, of Sterne, from those famous lectures which Thackeray delivered, now some thirty years since, at Willis's Rooms. His method, we must imagine, was not the method of the biographer, but of the novelist. Perhaps the highest kind of life-making combines both ways: but in Thackeray's case the novelist was certainly predominant. If one may guess at the manner of his work, it must be assumed that he saturated his mind with the literature and surroundings of those of whom he was to speak, then flung his materials aside and let his recollections ferment in his "study of imagination." These memories would therefore stand in lieu of those "scraps and heel-taps" of observation from which he created Fred Bayham and Captain Costigan. The personages of the lectures, in short, were evolved much in the same manner as the personages of Esmond, which he was writing at the time, and in which some of them appear. The Steele of the lectures is the same Steele who in the book compares my Lady Castlewood to Niobe and Sigismunda; the Addison is the same Addison to whom, in his garret in the Haymarket, Queen Anne's young captain explains the Battle of Blenheim. The result, as we know, was not wholly unassailable. Tried by the foot-rule and compasses of fact, it was easy to detect minor discrepancies in the details; and even, as some admirers of Swift and Sterne did not scruple to declare, in the portraits themselves. But to most people they were more truthful than the truth. They possessed one incalculable advantage, they were realizations, more full of life than if they lived, by a great and unrivalled painter of character. They laughed and wept, they fell and rose again, they impressed their individualities upon us; they became the standards by which, in virtue of their warm blood and vital power, we should test all later likenesses. And it is the misfortune of their modern biographers, approaching their theme however conscientiously — testing, searching, correcting, comparing, however minutely and laboriously—that we involuntarily contrast them with the author of Esmond and Barry Lyndon.

* Addison. By W. J. Courthope. London: Macmillan & Co.

For this reason the reader's first impression of Mr. Courthope's Addison will probably be one of disappointment. If he takes up the book with the expectation of finding a vivid character-piece, or of having his existing impressions deepened and confirmed, he will not find or experience what he anticipates. Mr. Courthope has not conceived his functions after this fashion. What he has attempted is rather to record all of Addison's life-history that seems to be authentic, to disprove and discard what is unworthy of credit, to place him accurately in the conditions that influenced his career, and to estimate the nature and influence of his gifts. This is the scientific method. It has its defects to the general reader, who likes colour, and contrast, and exaggeration, and is wont to find it cold and judicial; but it has also its usefulness. It can be trusted, which, au siècle où nous sommes, is no small thing; and especially it can be trusted when the writer is not a partisan. As the editor of Pope, Mr. Courthope has the strongest temptations to partisanship. But, although his sketch of Addison is perhaps over-liberal in its references to Pope, there is not the least sign of any undue leaning to the mens curva in corpore curvo; and his commendation of Addison's collaborator, Steele, whose "large heart" (he excellently says) "seems to rush out in sympathy with any tale of sorrow or exhibition of magnanimity" is generous and discriminating. He is even willing to allow that "there is scarcely a department of essay-writing developed in the Spectator which does not trace its origin to Steele." Steele's admirers would of course claim for him much more than this. They would claim for him at least equal rank with Addison as "chief architect of Public Opinion in the eighteenth century." But a biographer of Addison may be pardoned if he declines to go quite so far. For ourselves, we regard Steele as the originating, and Addison as the elaborating, intellect in a joint enterprise. Neither would have been quite successful without the other; and, as a matter of fact, they always were less successful when acting independently.

As might be expected, Mr. Courthope has devoted one of his chapters to the famous portrait of "Atticus." That he adds very much to the story it would be difficult to say; but he tells it carefully, and with as much lucidity as the inextricable mystifications of Pope's correspondence enable him to do. The exact truth will probably never be known. But the general result of Mr. Courthope's examination is entirely against Pope, and briefly stated comes to this—that Pope wrote the lines when smarting under what he supposed to be Addison's unfair advocacy of Tickell's Iliad, and that he invented a perfect network of falsehood and prevarication to justify their publication after Addison's death. This view derives fresh confirmation from Mr. Courthope's patient and quite destructive examination of Pope's story, alleged to be derived from young Lord Warwick, that Gildon had been prompted by Addison to attack Pope, a story which, for the future, may be wholly disregarded. But it is characteristic of the biographer's general impartiality that he is quite willing to concede a certain disposition on Addison's part to and he admits that it is the admixture of a certain modicum of skilfully heightened truth with absolute falsehood which gives their deadly malignity to Pope's unrivalled lines.

There are other points in which, declining to rely upon picturesque statement from doubtful quarters, Mr. Courthope clears Addison's character. He shows that his traditional incompatibility with Lady Warwick rests in reality upon nothing better than one of Pope's innuendoes; and that, mere tittle-tattle set aside, there is evidence that their relations were wholly satisfactory. As regards the intemperance sometimes alleged against Addison, he points out that Bishop Berkeley described him as "a very sober man." Again, with respect to Johnson's statement that he was unequal to the duties of his office of Secretary of State, Mr. Courthope makes it clear that this originated in the report of his enemies, and that his sudden retirement is sufficiently accounted for by his failing health. For these and other minor rectifications our best thanks are due to Mr. Courthope, and not least for his happy application to his hero of Hamlet's words:—

> Thou hast been
> As one, in suffering all, that suffers nothing;
> A man that fortune's buffets and rewards
> Has ta'en with equal thanks; and blessed are those > Whose blood and judgment are so well co-mingled
> That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger
> To sound what stop she please.

We have passed over much in this little book which deserves an ampler notice, and especially some of its purely critical pages. Enough, however, has been said to indicate its general characteristics. As we have implied, it can make no pretence to being a finished study of character. Nor, for lack of material, can it claim to be an exhaustive biography. But it may be fairly described as a trustworthy, straightforward, and enlightened sketch of one of the two greatest of the periodical essayists.

ALARIC WATTS.*

ALARIC ALEXANDER WATTS—or, as it pleased the wicked but not unfriendly wit of Lockhart to call him, Alaric Attila Watts—was not a poet of the first order, nor indeed entitled in any way to be classed as a man of great mark, but he is well entitled to receive the biographical notice which is now offered of him by his son. He wrote verses, some of which obtained the praise of good judges in his own time, and occupied a place of importance among the journalists and editors of the period to which he belonged. He was concerned in the creation and conduct of many newspapers and periodicals, and his career was one of usefulness, as well as of honour and credit to himself. He was best known perhaps in connection with the "Annuals," one of the worthiest of which was started and continued by him. These now almost forgotten publications were of no small service in their time. They carried pretty bits of art and dainty little morsels of literature into many houses into which neither art nor literature of any kind would otherwise have found their way; and if the art was not of the highest, nor the literature of the very best, their function at the time must not be scorned on that account. Pictures by good artists, and engraved by the best hands, were reproduced and made known in them; while the earliest received crumbs from the tables of Scott and Campbell, and in the latest might be read contributions from Tennyson and Ruskin. Mr. Watts may naturally be inclined to overrate their influence, but it would be impossible to deny to them a considerable share in promoting a taste for art during the years in which they flourished. If they did nothing else, they may at least be credited with having awakened a desire for better things, and in justice to them we are not altogether prepared to say that this desire has been properly satisfied by the cheaper and still more popular publications devoted to the encouragement of art in the present day.

The introductory chapter by the biographer, entitled "The Age of Sentiment," might well have been spared. It was not wanted as a preface to his father's life, and its views will not be universally accepted. It professes to lay out a poetical epoch, beginning with Bowles in 1791, and culminating with the present Poet Laureate (whom may the Muses long preserve), about which there is much room for discussion, without, however, refusing to recognize for Bowles the place he so well merits in any mention of the poetry and poetical history of his times.

Of good middle-class descent, and born in 1797, Alaric A. Watts received as a boy such indifferent education and treatment as the ordinary schools of the day could afford. At an early age, and with a very commendable desire for independence, he obtained employment as an usher in a school, and presently became private tutor in the family of the fashionable dentist Ruspini, whose name survives on the labels of various preparations for the teeth still to be found in chemists' shops. He lived, and lived handsomely, in Pall Mall, opposite to Carlton House, then occupied by the Prince Regent, and the young tutor here enjoyed the opportunity of mixing with a good deal of amusing and interesting company. He made acquaintance with Peter Pindar, Mrs. Inchbald, Colton, the eccentric author of Lacon, with Lady Hamilton, and Lord Byron, and various other notabilities of the day. A short period of service as a clerk in a public office was succeeded by another term of employment as an assistant in a school. This was at Rancorn in Cheshire, then little more than a country village, and contributions from the young man's pen now began to make their appearance in the poet's corner of various provincial newspapers. A more important step in his literary career was made when a poem of his was printed in 1818 in the Edinburgh Magazine, which was soon to become Blackwood, and under that name to survive all its contemporaries, and also to outlive, in perpetual youth, a vast number of younger competitors. At the early age of twenty-two Alaric Watts for a short time assisted in the editorship of the New Monthly Magazine, and from this time the nature of his future career was decided. He now made the acquaintance of Maturin, and had already attained such a position that he was asked by him to superintend the production of his tragedy of Fredolpho at Covent Garden, the account of which is given from the autobiographical narrative which frequently furnishes the best materials for his son's work. The unfortunate play was supported by Miss O'Neill, C. Kemble, Young, and Macready, who details its history and condemnation in his Reminiscences, and mentions also the part taken by Watts in bringing it out.

Some lines by J. W. Wiffen, subsequently the translator of Tasso, which attracted the notice of Alaric Watts while engaged on the New Monthly, were destined to exercise the most important influence on his welfare and happiness, for they led him to make the acquaintance of their author, and he was the brother of his future wife. All that is told of this lady makes her appear as a person of remarkable and delightful qualities. The letter in which she rebukes the dangerous haste with which her impetuous lover sought her hand after an acquaintance of only four days is a model of womanly tact and tenderness, while a charming little postscript is added to prevent the destruction of his hopes. She belonged to a family of Quakers, and after an engagement of some duration, she incurred the penalty of excommunication from that exclusive body on uniting herself to a husband who did not belong to the Society of Friends. She must have been personally as attractive as she was in other respects. "What shoulders that child has," said of her Georgina, Duchess of Bedford, their great neighbour at Woburn; and, later on, Sir Thomas Lawrence said, "I have seen a lady with the most beautiful hands!"

For three years Alaric Watts wrote for the Literary Gazette, the first weekly periodical of its kind, at that time in full power and prosperity, and the only one exercising the functions which have since been performed by the Athenæum and so many other publications more or less resembling it. In this Alaric Watts gained some note by his illustrations of Lord Byron's plagiarisms, some of which are now reprinted. They are ingenious after the manner of such things, and show much acquaintance with general literature.

* Alaric Watts: a Narrative of his Life. By his Son, Alaric Alfred Watts. 2 vols. London: Bentley & Son. 1884.

A connexion with the art publishing firm (as they would now be called) of Hurst, Robinson, & Co., the successors of Boydell, and now represented by Graves & Son, in Pall Mall, led to much immediate advantage, but in the end proved disastrous. Of Mr. Robinson, a Yorkshireman, it is amusing to find that he was the veritable philosopher who attracted the admiration of Coleridge at a dinner-party by his silent and respectful attention to all he said, but who forfeited his good opinion by breaking silence to greet the appearance of some apple dumplings with "Thom's the jockies for me!"

The young couple married in 1821, and in the following year was published a volume with the title of Poetical Sketches. Lamb and Coleridge admired it, and it met with fair success. But poetry seldom pays bakers' and butchers' bills; and more remunerative employment was found in editing a Tory paper, the Intelligencer, at Leeds; and this was followed by a removal to Lancashire, to edit and assist in starting the Manchester Courier in that town. We now approach the days of the "Annuals," of which the first was "The Forget-Me-Not," published by Ackermann in 1823. Next year came "Friendship's Offering"; and then also appeared "The Literary Souvenir," edited by Alaric A. Watts, of which more than six thousand copies were sold within twelve months, and which continued an existence of many years. "The Keepsake," in 1856, was the last of the Annuals.

A chapter on "The Blues" is amusing enough, and one is made acquainted with Miss Benger, Miss Jane Porter, and Miss Spence. The story of the hungry pressman who ate up all the slender provision made for the evening refreshment of an expected literary party is exceedingly droll. To this succeeds a more serious chapter, in which is told the bankruptcy of Hurst, Robinson, & Co., consequent on the great commercial crash of 1825; and for some time to come the pecuniary circumstances of Alaric Watts were the reverse of comfortable. The account of Wordsworth given by Mrs. Alaric Watts is a capital one. Never was he better appreciated. She was surprised at being told, after having quoted some lines from Coleridge's Christabel, that it was an indelicate poem, and records the impression that Wordsworth's sympathies were rather with his predecessors than his contemporaries in poetry. When Mrs. Watts named Milton's Lycidas as the finest elegiac in the language, he said, "You are not far wrong. . . . Lycidas and my Laodamia are twin immortals."

The connexion of Alaric Watts with the Standard commenced in 1827, and the first of a series of visits to Paris, a year or two afterwards, extended his field of operations for the acquisition of materials for the art of the Literary Souvenir. This contained in its issue for 1829 an engraved portrait of Sir Walter Scott, of which Lockhart wrote at the time to the editor that it was by far the best that had yet appeared. It is wonderful that Mr. Watts could not be content to leave this alone, and that he must needs quote from the Life of Scott Lockhart's mention of the same thing as "an indifferent print for one of the 'Annuals'"; or that he should not have omitted both opinions. Alaric Watts's warfare with Fraser's Magazine seems to have begun with personal attacks on himself, to which he was so imprudent as to retaliate in a poem, most inappropriately published in the Literary Souvenir for 1832. This provoked a thoroughly reckless and unjustifiable libel in the magazine, for which an action was brought, and Watts recovered the very moderate sum of 150*l.* as damages. The late Chief Justice Erle, then at the Bar, was counsel for Fraser, and had really nothing to say for his client but to quote from the United Service Gazette, then edited by Alaric Watts, some very intemperate language which he had allowed himself to print in order to vilify the magazine and the writers in it. He had a hot temper, and certainly had been scandalously provoked, but it was unfortunate for him that he had yielded to the temptation of returning blow for blow. To him, however, the occasion was one for congratulation on the large amount of sympathy and regard called forth by it from so many men whose friendship was of the greatest worth. Wordsworth, Southey, Edwin Landseer, Wilkie, Professor Wilson, Bowles, Macready, and others sent letters the reading of which must have gone to the heart of the man who received them. Such flagrant personalities in the press are now all but unknown, and this episode in the life of Alaric Watts need be remembered only for the sake of rejoicing in the contrast which exists in this respect between the present age and that of fifty years ago.

The "Lyrics of the Heart" appeared in 1850, and it is now twenty years since the death of Alaric Watts took place, his later life having been passed in comparative quiet and repose. The record now given of him is no less than he deserved, and contains much readable matter and interesting anecdote; but why does Mr. Watts use such words as "exuberate," "impatronage," "scurril," and "intercoracities"?

A HISTORY OF LONDON—SUPPLEMENT.*

THE readers of Mr. Loftie's admirable History of London will be gratified by receiving their "Supplement" of appendices. They consist of four—the first upon the Grosvenor, Berkeley, and Maddox estates; the second upon the early lists of aldermen and wards; the third upon the history of London trade; and the fourth upon the old buildings which still exist in the City. We are really grateful to Mr. Loftie for his little treatise on the "Trade of London," which is not only valuable for the information given, but for the hints and suggestions which it offers to those who wish to follow up the subject. How the trade of London grew up after that of the Low Countries was destroyed; how the latter was revived to be destroyed again during the Spanish troubles; how the French possessions of England helped to make London rich; how the Steelyard merchants tried to get the English carrying trade into their own hands; how monopolies and vexatious Customs regulations hindered trade; how the silk-weavers settled in Spitalfields; and how the trade of London gradually spread out in every direction—Mr. Loftie tells too briefly, in a dozen pages. One ventures to hope that he may some day expand his chapter into a volume.

As regards the ancient buildings which still remain in the City, the Norman Period is represented by nothing more than the crypt of St. Mary-le-Bow. The east end and apse of St. Bartholomew's in Smithfield, which is also Norman, is outside the City. Parts of Guildhall belong to the thirteenth century; part of the chapel of St. Peter in the Tower, St. Helen's, and St. Ethelburga belong to the fourteenth century. Crosby Place is of the fifteenth; St. Giles, Cripplegate, St. Andrew Undershaft, and St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, are of the sixteenth; St. Catherine Cree and All Hallows, Barking, belong to the seventeenth. To the same period belongs that delightful haven of rest called Sion College.

We must not leave the "Supplement" without recording that, in the "Citie of London in 1710" and the map showing the registration districts, Mr. Loftie has made a most useful addition to the wealth of illustrations which he had already lavished upon the two preceding volumes of this work.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHT IN OUR HOMES.*

THE author of this little book, in his preface, explains that it has grown out of lectures which he has delivered in most of the principal towns of England during the past twelve months; in most places it still retains the lecture form. Though the first excitement about electric lighting may perhaps have died out in the public mind, yet the near approach of a public supply of electricity for lighting purposes by different Companies who have obtained provisional orders under the Electric Lighting Act must make the subject of domestic electric lighting one of considerable public interest. We can safely say that hardly any book has yet appeared better suited than that under consideration to give the general reader a good idea of the mechanism and advantages of domestic electric lighting. In his preface the author makes a sort of apology for using certain analogies which he fears may be slightly shocking to the purely scientific mind; but on reading the book one of the most salient points is found to be the excellent way in which a sound scientific mode of thought is combined with a popular mode of expression. Although Mr. Hammond boldly in his title-page acknowledges his connexion with a particular Company, there is no trace throughout the book of any undue attempt to make it a mere trade advertisement. Mr. Hammond goes over in a bright and readable way all the old ground as to the advantages of incandescent electrical lighting in ordinary dwelling-houses, and supports the well-known arguments in favour of this mode of lighting by a large number of facts and statistics. He points out how an ordinary gas-light consumes more oxygen than five human beings, and calls attention to the fact that, if any one went into an ordinary room and found it lighted by six gas-lights, he would feel uncomfortable probably, but would not complain; but if he went into the same room when no gas was burning, and found thirty people sitting in it, he would cry out at the overcrowding and the closeness of the atmosphere. He also points out what is well known, that gas light is not content merely with robbing the atmosphere of its oxygen and throwing off water and carbonic acid, but also throws off corrosive fumes, and states that he found that at Leeds recently a very large number of books in the library had to be rebound because their bindings had been entirely destroyed by the fumes from the gas. It is hardly necessary at the present day to state that incandescent electrical lighting consumes no oxygen and gives no fumes or gases.

Mr. Hammond not only points out this, and shows how in many large shops and warehouses many gallons of water are produced and thrown into the air nightly by the present system of gas lighting, but he carefully goes into the whole question of cost, both of small, private, independent installations of electric incandescent lighting and of larger installations suitable for hotels and theatres, and the question of cost is also considered from the point of view of public Companies supplying large areas. His contention is, and he supports it by a considerable quantity of well thought out evidence, that it is worth while in all large establishments to start electric lighting at once, using a gas-engine and dynamo on the premises. Mr. Hammond, we think, fairly proves his case that, even whilst obliged to make use of the private plant, there would be certainly no loss on the annual expenses for any large elaborately decorated building by adopting this plan; and that when a public electric lighting Company brings its mains past the building all that will have to be sacrificed will be the gas-engine and dynamo, for which probably a fair price can at all times be realized. The question of cost in private installations is illustrated by statistics taken from the lighting system at his own house, and the book is illustrated with several photographs of the principal rooms in that house. Mr. Hammond has obviously given considerable attention to the question of how best to arrange the lights so as to get the maximum lighting power with the greatest beauty of effect, and his plan of placing the incandescent lamp in the centre of a metal shield fixed against the wall appears both to be a good one as far as getting light effect goes, and, further, to lend itself to artistic treatment; but we do not find that Mr. Hammond has quite realized the great advantage of obtaining large illuminating power from a small number of lamps which incandescent electric lighting affords. He seems in many of his arrangements to group many lamps together in one lantern or chandelier. Now there is little doubt that the best lighting effect from the fewest lamps is to be obtained by distributing the lights as uniformly as possible over the area to be lighted, and the plan of simply hanging the lamps by their conducting-wires from the ceiling will probably not only give the best light but also the most pleasing artistic effect. Mr. Hammond, we are glad to find, differs from most authorities on the question of the compulsory purchase clauses of the Electric Lighting Act. He holds that these clauses by no means form a bar to the supply of electrical energy for lighting purposes at a reasonable price, and the realization of a fair profit by the supplying Company. His arguments and the figures by which they are supported will require close examination, not only from the point of view of the consumer who only lights his premises, but also from that of the consumer who desires to use electrical energy for motive power.

It would be almost impossible here to analyse and discuss all the points touched upon in this small volume. We must content ourselves by saying that on the whole the information given is perfectly scientific and trustworthy, and that the whole book is so pleasingly and brightly written that any one, however little acquainted with the technicalities of science, will find that it will afford him a most pleasing hour or two's reading.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

THE second volume of the Reports of the Tenth Census of the United States (1) is devoted to manufacturing statistics. A few of its results, if not belonging exactly to the domain of literature proper, have a political, social, and economical significance which may render them interesting to our readers. The total value of manufactured products, including alike lumber and iron, cereals and textile fabrics, throughout the United States, has increased from about 1,000 millions of dollars in 1850, and less than 1,900 millions in 1860, to 4,200 millions in 1870, and 5,300 millions in 1880, the year of the last Census. In thirty years the number of hands employed had nearly trebled, having risen from 955,000 to 2,718,000. The increase of wages paid was just fourfold, rising from 236 millions in 1850 to 941 millions in 1880. The cost of materials in the latter year was 3,380 millions, giving apparently a gross profit of about 1,000 millions on a capital of 2,775 millions, or about 36 per cent. Of the total products, 4,700 millions and upwards belong to the North and North-East, 465 millions to the South, and only 144 millions to the West. Of the Northern total, Massachusetts claims 630, New York 1,080, Pennsylvania 744, Ohio 348, and Illinois 415 millions. Of the Southern States Kentucky stands first with 75 millions, Tennessee, the next in rank, having but 37; California, the only important member of the Western group, manufactures products worth 116 millions of dollars. Of the principal manufactures, leather, including boots and shoes, counts for 380 millions; flour for upwards of 500; iron, steel, and machinery for about the same; lumber for 270; meat, not including the sales of retail butchers, for 300; sugar and molasses for 156 millions; tobacco for 117. Of textile fabrics, manufactured woollen goods amount to 267, cotton to 210, and clothing to 240 millions. It is obvious that American statisticians count as manufactured products many articles which would hardly be included by English economists among the manufactures of Great Britain, and that in more than one case, as for example in that of clothing and textile fabrics, the same goods are reckoned in a sense twice over, a very large part of the woollen and cotton cloth woven in American mills forming the raw material of American-made clothing. The total value of malt and distilled liquors is reckoned only at 142 million dollars, a surprisingly small amount, but evidently not including the heavy Excise duty. The cost to the consumer is probably twice as great. Another interesting public document is the Report of the Comptroller of the Currency (2), a Report which covers nearly the whole financial business, public and private, of the country, giving the resources and liabilities of national banks, their capital, profits, circulation, deposits, and loans, as well as the amount of notes and specie held against the circulation. The total number of banks of all sorts in the United States is 7,450, with a capital of 717 millions, and deposits amounting to no less than 2,900 millions of dollars. Of these the so-called national banks are 2,308, with a capital of 484 and deposits of 1,120 millions. The money in circulation is estimated at 1,523 millions, of which about 700 millions consist of legal tender and national bank-notes in not very unequal amounts. The total of gold in circulation is estimated at 582, that of silver coin at something more than 242 millions. But the amount of bank-notes in circulation has decreased during the year by nearly 11 millions; while the coin has increased by no less than 68 millions, divided in very nearly equal proportion between the two metals. The amount of standard silver dollars coined under the law passed at the instance of the bimetallists some few years ago is nearly 157 million dollars, of which 116 millions remain in the Treasury. But against the latter the banks and individual citizens hold certificates redeemable in silver for more than 85 millions; while only 40 millions of silver dollars are actually in circulation. The interest-bearing debt on the 1st of November, 1883, amounted to 1,273½ [1,293½ ?] millions, of which 738 bore interest at 4, 250 at 4½, and 305½ at 3 per cent. The amount held by the banks as security for circulation was no less than 349 millions. The Director of the Geological Survey has put forth a very interesting volume on the mineral resources of the United States (3)—stores of coal and iron, to say nothing of copper and the precious metals, of almost incalculable amount and inestimable value. The total gold production of the United States during the last year is calculated at 32 millions of dollars.

Dr. Ely holds two economical professorships in somewhat distant quarters. It is easy, and not very unusual, for a distinguished scholar to lecture one day in University College, London, and the next in Cambridge. The duties of an Associate Professor of Political Economy in the Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore and in the Cornell University at Ithaca, N.Y., must, if the sessions of the two faculties are contemporaneous, involve a good deal of rapid and somewhat fatiguing railway travelling. The Professor has nevertheless found time to publish a little treatise whose bulk by no means adequately represents the amount of information it contains, still less the labour by which it has been acquired. His account of French and German Socialism (4) is necessarily a mere abstract, but an abstract which appears to give a fair, if not a minute or detailed, view of the principal tenets of each of the leading teachers enumerated, from Babœuf, Cabet, and Saint-Simon to Louis Blanc and Karl Marx. The writer's temper is thoroughly candid, and his treatment of the wild and sometimes almost crazy theories of French and German dreamers appears even more than forbearing. Too much space, perhaps, is given in so small a volume to the extravagances of the leading French Socialists, and too little to the more practical and consistent views of their German rivals and coadjutors. The work, in truth, is in the main a review of the course of French Socialism and Communism, as taught by men who drew their inspiration from the madness of the Revolution, combining the most extravagant ideas of the philosophers and philanthropists who paved the way for the Reign of Terror with the reckless determination and sometimes the ruthless ferocity of their meaner successors. The notice given to the countrymen and collaborators of Karl Marx is given, as it were, by the way, as a sort of appendix or sequel to the more thorough and connected sketch of the views of Fourier, Proudhon, and Lassalle, though even that sketch is of necessity little more than an outline. The author's remarks on the feudal system, with its closer connexion of classes, its formal recognition of mutual duties, its firmer social organization, are useful if by no means novel. Familiar to every English student of history or political economy, they will, we suspect, startle not a few of Dr. Ely's American readers as an unheard-of and amazing paradox.

Mr. Hubbard's account of his travels in the autumn of 1881 among the lakes and forests of Northern Maine (5) has all the merits and interest that such a work can have; the interest attaching to graphic descriptions of scenery, to a lively narrative of such trivial adventures and disasters, pleasures and hardships, as English sportsmen yearly experience in the wilder parts of Norway or of the Scottish Highlands, with the advantage, at least for English readers, of a certain degree of novelty. It is by no means the first or the fullest description we have seen of that which may be called the Highland region of New England; a vast, almost unpeopled territory covered with primitive forests, mapped out indeed by surveyors, but as yet unsettled, in great part unappropriated; visited only by sportsmen or lumberers, uninvaded by Railway Companies or even by road-makers; full of game in spite of the inroads made upon their haunts by woodsmen in quest of food, or adventurers like the author killing merely for sport; a playground as yet open to all, almost as accessible to the citizens of Boston, New York, or Philadelphia as Sutherland or Inverness to Londoners, wanting alike in the wildness and the variety of Highland scenery, but boasting lakes and rivers surpassing those of Scotland almost as much in size and number as in freedom from "improvement" and intrusion. The birch-canoe, carried now and then across a watershed or along the banks of an impracticable stream, is launched on rivers or on chains of lakes, along whose shores the adventurer may paddle for days and weeks together, landing only to encamp at night, or to chase the deer and smaller game that abound in the woods, and of course are most easily tracked in the neighbourhood of the waters. The valleys of the Allagash and the Penobscot, though they present no points from which, as from a Scottish or Cumbrian mountain-top, the eye may range over a wide expanse of wild and varied scenery, afford chains of lakes, large and small, abounding in attractions alike to the sportsman and the lover of nature, and offering a retirement such as is hardly now to be found in the most sequestered regions of Northern or Eastern Europe; lakes so numerous and so remote from civilization that some of them are hardly named, and one or two appear to be but roughly and approximately laid down upon the map. The excellence of the type, the choice and execution of the illustrations, are worthy of a narrative always readable and generally interesting; the more agreeable that the writer is quite as much naturalist as sportsman, sympathizes even with the victims of his gun or rod, and takes yet more pleasure in studying than in destroying the harmless inhabitants of these quiet woods and waters. He has observed the dams of the beaver, the note of the loon, the tricks of the playful and thievish squirrel, and even the haunts and habits of chub so tame that, after being fed from time to time with the débris of the camp, they would swarm around a hand dipped into the lake, waiting for the expected meal; so undisturbed and fearless that after a single day's acquaintance they would crowd round the hand lowered palm-upward among them, and snap and pull at the soaked bread held between thumb and finger; so daring that when lifted by handfuls out of the water, though scattered for a moment, they would come back and jostle one another in quest of the food held out to them.

A widow writing her husband's biography at the request of his friends has an irresistible and almost unlimited claim on the consideration and forbearance of the harshest or weariest critic. There was nothing in the career of the Reverend Charles Lowe (6), a useful and estimable, but by no means an especially distinguished, Unitarian minister in Massachusetts, that called for a biography extending to six hundred pages. It is impossible to read the extracts from his letters and diaries without learning to like the man, to understand how dear he had become to his friends, his colleagues, and his parishioners, and how naturally they desired to retain some memorial of a useful, honourable, and happy, if quiet and uneventful, life. It is equally easy to perceive why every incident of such a career, every remembrance of the joys and sorrows shared together, has for his biographer a charm and a sacredness that render her incapable of estimating aright its value and interest to others. Every one of the innumerable recollections crowding on her memory as she wrote was to her, at least, as well worth preservation and record as the most characteristic traits of a great soldier or distinguished statesman. But for that very reason some friendly critic should have been permitted to revise the manuscript, to judge what letters were too exclusively domestic, what passages too sacredly personal, what parochial and domestic trifles too insignificant to be given to the world.

Mr. Wilstach's translation of Virgil (7) has merits beyond question. It bears marks on every page of industry and scholarship; but the scholarship is not of that high order which alone could make a new version of the most familiar, save perhaps Horace, of the Latin poets necessary or desirable. Not only is the versification itself defective, but the language is artificial, prosaic, and ill-chosen. It would be difficult, perhaps, to translate Virgil in that style of archaic simplicity which would best represent the simple majesty of Homer. The Æneid especially is, after all, but an imitation, and a comparatively feeble imitation; and no one probably would dream of attempting to render it in any of those antique ballad-metres which have often been recommended as the fittest equivalent in which the English tongue could render the magnificent hexameters of the Iliad. But blank verse, in proportion as to a certain class of versifiers it is the easiest to write, is of all verse the least essentially poetic; that which most demands that the thought, tone, spirit, and language should give the charm that is not inherent in the form. In the hands of a writer like Mr. Wilstach it is apt to become a stiffer, harsher, clumsier kind of prose. Such lines as

> By heavenly thrones put forth, urged on by wrath
> Of Juno cruel, which no slumber soothed
> And which no lapse of memory made less harsh, have no pretension to be poetry, and can hardly be called verse. And these are decidedly the least harsh and clumsy of a dozen passages we might select at random from almost any page, whether of the Æneid or the Georgics.

> Make gifts and venerate low the gentle nymphs,
> For difficult foes the Naiads are not, is neither poetry nor verse, neither prose nor English. The writer who on the same page gives us "ultraly" for "ultro" might surely have translated "faciles" by "facile"; but the meaning of course is "placable," not, as the note has it, "affable."

Dr. Brinton's monograph on Aboriginal American Authors (8) is one of those chapters in the history of literature for which the writers receive less gratitude, perhaps, and less reward in the way of popularity, or even of distinction, than they deserve, but whose value critics and scholars are the more bound to recognize and acknowledge. The memoir is founded on a paper read before the International Congress of Americanists which sat in Copenhagen in August last; an assemblage of those scholars who have undertaken the study of the primitive languages of the New World, a study full of archæological interest and promising a contribution of almost unrivalled value to philological science. The native tongues of America are unhappily almost extinct. None of them had an extensive literature; many, perhaps most, had produced no books whatever; some had not even a written alphabet. But in some cases at least, like the Aztec, the Maya and Peruvian tongues, they were the languages of great and civilized nations, of powerful and well-organized empires; the ruins of whose monuments and cities, even after the ruthless havoc of the Spanish conquest, after ages of desolation and neglect, still bear witness that their creators can hardly have been inferior, whether in material progress and resources or in political civilization, to the subjects of the princes who built the walls of Babylon and the Pyramids and temples of Egypt. Unhappily Spanish barbarism destroyed the literary much more completely than the material monuments of the Mexican and Peruvian Empires. Deliberately and of malice prepense, actuated by a bigotry exactly analogous to, but much less excusable, than that of Omar, they burnt whole libraries; collected as far as was in their power the entire body of manuscripts possessed by the conquered peoples, recording their history, their laws, their agriculture, their science, their civil, astronomical and religious calendars, and committed them ruthlessly to the flames. Their persistent attempt thus to annihilate the traditions of Heathenism was too successful; nine-tenths of the Maya, Nahua, and Peruvian literature, the native records of Central and South American civilization, have perished beyond possibility of recovery. There are, however, a few ancient manuscripts still preserved; a few works, moreover, written in the native, as well as a somewhat larger number in the Spanish, tongue by native pupils of the conquerors - Indians who had adopted Spanish names and Spanish manners, but had not wholly lost—nay, sometimes cherished all the more fondly because secretly—their love for the ideas, their pride in the greatness of their ancestry. Here and there, moreover, descendants of the more savage and ignorant tribes, who had neither literature nor alphabet of their own, have preserved through the machinery of the conquering civilization the tongue or the traditions of their forefathers. There are histories of the Wyandots, of the Six Nations, of the Algonquins, and of the Cherokees, written either in their own or in the English language, by men of Huron, Tuscarora, and Cherokee lineage. Descendants of Peruvian and Mexican princes have studied and recorded the antiquities of their race, though for the most part in the tongue which has superseded their own. On the other hand, we find a manuscript collection of Esquimaux tales preserved in the tongue of Greenland, with an English translation and illustrations by native artists. There is, again, a printed pamphlet relating in dialogue the journey of an Esquimaux to Europe, and his return, and another, profusely illustrated, describing the traditions, manners, weapons, and habits of the primæval people of Baffin's Bay. There is, again, a brief history of the Delawares or Mohicans, written in their own idiom; a book of rites of the Iroquois, also in their native dialect. A translation of a tribal history of the Muskokrees or Creeks, written in red and black characters on the skin of a young buffalo, was sent to London and lost in the first half of the last century; but a translation made by some Moravian missionary has been preserved, and is, it seems, known to Dr. Brinton. The Cherokees have a so-called alphabet, syllabic in character, in which they have printed in their own tongue a few insignificant papers. Boturini collected more than forty fragmentary manuscripts in the Nahua language, one of which, a history of the kingdoms of Culhuacan and Mexico, has been actually printed and published; and there are in Spanish libraries hieroglyphics and other Mexican and Nahua works not easily understood, perhaps, but possessing in some cases a considerable historical interest, in all an almost inestimable philological value. Unfortunately not a few of the latter were written long after the conquest, when the native tongue had been deeply corrupted by the introduction of Spanish words and forms. Altogether there exist beyond doubt materials from which a patient and persevering research might extract a clear and sufficient knowledge of the principal native languages of America, a general outline of the history of its greatest empires, and a much fuller knowledge of their laws, religion, arts, and ceremonies than we yet possess. The third volume of Dr. Brinton's Library of Aboriginal American Literature (9) is unfortunately a disappointing work.

The introductory chapters afford a large amount of curious information regarding the less civilized tribes of Central America, their traditions, manners, and language, and still more their religious and social ceremonies, their rude arts, songs, music, and dances. But the work to which this introduction is prefixed has little historical or philological value. It is written, not in the Nahua or Nahuatl, but in what Dr. Brinton calls the Nahuatl-Spanish dialect of Nicaragua, a dialect mainly Spanish in form and syntax, and containing apparently many more Spanish than Nahuatl words. It is a comedy, but a comedy whose scene is laid after the conquest under the Spanish Government, and in that state of society which resulted from the blending of Spanish and native blood, and, to some extent, of Spanish and native thought and feeling.

As a translation of a very interesting treatise very little known in this country, Dr. F. Horn's History of Scandinavian Literature (10) will no doubt commend itself to many of our readers.

Mr. Hunt's Poetry of other Lands (11) is a collection of translations in English verse from Greek, Latin, French, German, Spanish, Italian, Dutch, with a specimen here and there from Servian, Polish, and even Japanese poetry, arranged unhappily not in chronological or ethnical order, indeed in no intelligible order whatsoever.

Miss Harland's Cottage Kitchen (12) will be welcome to many English housekeepers, to whom it will introduce in a cheap and available form many of the simplest and most popular receipts of American cookery. The American cuisine, as most of our readers know, in so far as it is national, can hardly be called an improvement on our own. The pie which forms so important and universal a dish is simply abominable; whether made of pumpkin or apple, peaches or blackberries, it is equally unwholesome, oversweetened, and, for the most part, tasteless. But in variety of cakes and in the various forms of vegetable cookery we have certainly something to learn from our Transatlantic kinswomen; more, possibly, from the negro cooks of the South.

Where did Life begin? (13) is the title of an ingenious little monograph suggesting that, since the earth must have cooled faster at the Poles than at the Equator, life must have begun in and spread from the Arctic regions. The doctrine is supported by a variety of arguments, deduced partly from misconceived facts of physical geography, partly from imperfectly apprehended or misapprehended views put forth by such writers as Darwin and Wallace—especially the latter—regarding the distribution of animal and vegetable forms over the Old and New World.

Swinton's School Readers (14) deserve a mention, perhaps, but no more. The first and second, intended for young children, might be found acceptable in infant schools and nurseries; the later volumes of the series might better be replaced by any connected works of history or travel, or even of fiction, suited to a child's intelligence.

The Cleverdale Mystery (15) is a coarse and bad imitation of works that have attracted deserved attention, even more in England than in their native country; a clumsy, ill-constructed, ill-written story of political and personal dishonesty and corruption, with all the improbability and little or none of the vigour of caricature. A Hero's Last Days (16) contains some effective touches illustrating the feelings and views of worn-out veterans of the Confederate war and Southern planters of the last generation; but treats for the most part of religious and social, rather than political questions, and throws no new light upon any. The author's Sequence of Songs (17), again, derives its purpose and motive from the same source, but lacks the spirit and fire which could alone interest a new generation in the memorials of a great but half-forgotten conflict.

A Day in Athens with Socrates (18) contains translations of several passages from the Protagoras and the Republic of Plato, so far well translated as to give in tolerable English a fair idea of the meaning, if hardly of the force and spirit, of the original.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WHEN the reverend and eloquent Dominican who is the author of Les Allemands (1) tells us that he "refoulait sans hésiter les répulsions instinctives de son patriotisme," we know pretty well that he is likely to indemnify himself for the sacrifice. Père Didon resisted the repugnances of his patriotism to the extent of getting matriculated at Berlin; but he has made amends to them by publishing an eloquent patriotic sermon in three hundred pages. There is no need here to examine the correctness of his picture of the German Universities; it is, indeed, not a very novel one, and descends little into detail, the main point which seems to have struck him being the camaraderie of the students. His book is in effect an energetic, if not a vigorous, appeal to France to go and do likewise, or rather, as he puts it, to go and do better. The advice would be excellent if it were given in a somewhat less contentious spirit. To Père Didon the German University is one of the main causes which have given Germany the Continental primacy; and, as he is desperately anxious that France should recover that primacy, he would like France to imitate the German University. Again, it is difficult to repress a smile at the reproachful contrast which he draws between the secularization of French education and the ubiquity of theological studies and religious instruction in Germany. The latter country is not generally supposed to be a home of orthodoxy or of religious fervour. There is, however, an inspiriting earnestness about Père Didon and a kind of sanguine belief in his own ideals, even if they are nothing higher than the "primauté de la France," which is both refreshing and respectable. Perhaps he will give us a visit in our turn to see what morals he can get out of us for French improvement. If so, he will probably discover that his idea of Oxford and Cambridge as furnishing hardly any recruits to the professions is only one of those agreeable notions—very suitable for deductive purposes, but having no visible relation to the facts of the universe—in which Frenchmen so greatly delight.

M. Deschanel (2) has continued the task which he began in a volume on Corneille and Molière by publishing two volume of lectures on Racine. The apparently paradoxical title—Le romantisme des classiques—is fairly borne out by the contents, though it is of course merely an occasion for giving somewhat greater piquancy to a hackneyed subject and for indicating passages in which Racine is animated by something more and better than a merely "correct" spirit, besides showing in general what the tendency of his work is. The book is a better one than the Corneille volume, and will take a very respectable rank among Racinian literature. The author has the great advantage of being a reasonable worshipper, and it is not a disadvantage that, if he errs at all, he errs rather on the side of worship than of reason. For he does not for a moment pretend to the absurd position of those who say that no foreigner can understand Racine, that he is something so esoteric and sublime that only Frenchmen can appreciate him properly, and who, saying this, do not perceive that they are paying Racine about the worst compliment possible.

A careful and exhaustive book of travel on the country which M. Leger handles in his book on the Balkan peninsula (3) would be a really valuable thing, but we do not at present know that it exists. M. Leger's work is only a contribution towards it, but the author knows the literature of his subject well, and is no new traveller in Slavic lands. The occasion was a summer trip from Laybach to Constantinople in 1882. M. Leger appears to be somewhat on the Russian side in the Russo-Austrian quarrel for the peninsula, though he seems to hope for a united Bulgaria rather than for the success of either.

M. Perrier's "Zoological Philosophy before Darwin" (4), which appears in the Bibliothèque scientifique internationale, deserves honourable mention. In one volume of less than three hundred pages (even ample and closely printed ones) such a subject can of course only be summarized. But M. Perrier has executed his summary with knowledge and judgment.

The Bibliothèque utile of the same publisher has been increased by a brief sketch of palæontology, written by M. Zaborowski (5), who is a practised hand at this kind of compilation.

M. Jouaust has published, and M. Georges d'Heylli has edited, a very pretty reprint of Le glorieux (6), the masterpiece of a dramatist who was not only a dramatist, but a soldier, a diplomatist, a man of fortune, a great landed proprietor, and governor of a city. All these are good things when a man is alive; but perhaps when he is dead it is better that he should have written such good plays as La fausse Agnès, Le philosophe marié, and Le glorieux.

Collections of popular books of science are common everywhere nowadays, but the peculiarity of those which M. Rothschild publishes, and of which two are before us (7), is that they are got up like keepsakes or birthday-books, with gay bindings, red edges, fine paper, and abundant illustrations. It is difficult to believe that this can have any bad effect on their matter, and it certainly improves their form.

M. Figuier's Année scientifique (8) is one of the books whose appearance it is only necessary to mention. The volume for last year appears in good time.

M. Henri de Parville's Causeries scientifiques (9), of which four annual volumes have just simultaneously made their appearances, are of the same class as M. Figuier's. Their articles, however, are written rather more in essay form, and the subdivisions are less numerous. They are thus less suited for reference, and more for continuous reading.

TO MASONS and PAVIORS.—The Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London will meet in the Guildhall of the said City, on Tuesday, the 4th of March, 1884, at half-past Twelve o'clock precisely, to receive Tenders for the execution of all such Works of Stone Paving in the carriageways and in the footways severally of the said City, as may from time to time be required during the term of three years commencing at Lady-day now next ensuing, upon the terms contained in a Specification which may be seen and copied at this Office.
Forms of Tender may also be had.
For the purpose of these Works the City is divided into four districts, for each of which Tenders are to be sent in for Masons' Work in the footways and for Paviors' Work in the carriageways of such districts respectively.
Persons tendering are required to give the names and addresses of at least two substantial householders as their sureties, to enter into a bond with the contractor for the due performance of the contract.
The Commissioners do not pledge themselves to accept the lowest tender, or any, unless deemed satisfactory, and all tenders must be delivered in before Twelve o'clock on the said day of March.
The parties sending in proposals must attend personally before the Commissioners, or by a duly authorized agent, at half-past Twelve o'clock on the said day.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE, 50 Regent Street, London, W.
City Branch—14 Cornhill, E.C. Founded 1806.
REPORT of the DIRECTORS, presented at the 78th ANNUAL MEETING at the Office, on Wednesday, January 30, 1884.

The Directors have to report that the transactions of the Provident Life Office during the year 1883 have been highly satisfactory.
Proposals for new Assurances amounting to £870,000 were received. Policies for £575,520 were issued and taken up, producing new annual Premiums amounting to £19,770, as against £19,911 for the previous year. These Assurances and new annual Premiums respectively represent the actual net amounts. No re-assurances were effected during the year.
The Proposals, declined and not completed, amounted to £93,500.
The Claims for the year were £162,253, being £29,916 more than the corresponding sum for '82.
The annual Income is now £310,371, being an increase of £7,098.
During the year the sum of £19,620 was paid for the surrender of Policies. The values paid upon Bonus Policies ranged from 33 per cent. (the minimum surrender value to as much as 93 per cent of the Premiums received.
The total Funds of the Office on December 31 last were £2,323,241, being an increase of £24,107, a result very satisfactory considering the special extra payments required to be made on account of the recent division of Profits. The average interest realized was £4 5s. 6d. per cent., as against £4 4s. during 1882.
The large measure of public support received by the Provident Life Office—as shown in the still increasing amount of new business, is gratifying evidence that persons desirous of effecting Assurances are wisely alive to the advantages given by an Office which unites all the convenience to be gained from a successful existence of seventy-eight years, and which is ready to adapt its practice to the requirements of the present day.

THE VALLEY OF SOREK:

NEW NOVEL.

By GERTRUDE M. GEORGE.

"Henry Westgate, the hero .....is drawn with skill and power. His lapses from the right path.....are portrayed in a forcible and natural manner. Graham is also a clever, if unpleasing, character study. ...The author.....possesses no inconsiderable talent."—Morning Post.

"The characters are clearly defined, the situations are strong, and the interest evoked by them is considerable. The women, in particular, are admirably drawn."—Athenæum.

"Miss George possesses in no slight degree the power of investing her characters with life. .....Considerable insight into human nature is shown.....The story is well and powerfully written."—Globe.

"In style there is much to approve."—Academy.

"An original—indeed, perhaps it is not too much to say a unique—story.....powerful, eloquent, and only too true."—Society.

"The story of Westgate's infatuation for the impetuous, beautiful, and pleasure-loving Hebe is well told.....In fact.....Miss George can write very well."—Morning Advertiser.

"Her power in depicting the fluctuations of character between good and evil influences, 'betwixt Ormuzd and Ahriman' (to follow her Orientalism), is by no means small.... ...The work is praiseworthy and promising, and if the author should advance as happily as she has begun, her name may yet be famous."—Daily Telegraph.

THIRD AND CHEAPER EDITION, 1 vol. 6s.

THE BRANDRETHS. By the Right Hon.

A. J. B. BERESFORD HOPE, M.P., Author of "Strictly Tied Up."

From the ATHENÆUM.

"'The Brandreths' is a pleasant book to read. It is an unusual treat to the reader to find himself in the company of a man of the world who is also a man of knowledge and culture, and who possesses the power of writing with ease and with point. Mr. Hope's pictures of society and his analysis of character are all excellent. The political sketches and allusions are made with a good deal of humour."

From the SPECTATOR.

"'The Brandreths' has all the charm of its predecessor. The great attraction of the novel is the easy, conversational, knowledgeable tone of it; the sketching from the life, and yet not so close to the life as to be malicious, men, women, persons, and events, to all of which intelligent readers can fit a name. The political and social sketches will naturally excite the chief interest among readers who will be attracted by the author's name and experience."

From the ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"'The Brandreths' is a clever and entertaining book. It contains much clever and picturesque writing. There is considerable skill, also, in the delineation of character, and the dialogue is natural and easy, pointed and witty. Mr. Beresford Hope draws largely from his experience of political and social life; and as a society novel his book has all the superiority to ordinary fictions of this class which may be derived from familiarity with the scenes and the people described."

From the STANDARD.

"There are many sayings in this work—many wise, many witty, many tender, many noble sayings—that we should wish to cite to our readers; but doubtless their pleasure will be greater in finding them out for themselves. It is a well planned and ably written story. The book is full of clever epigrams."

"It is the graphic portraiture of one whose life forms a connecting link with three generations of famous sporting men, and a high authority has well declared the book to be 'absolutely necessary to any retrospect of sporting life in England in the nineteenth century.' The rich vein of hunting lore stored in its four hundred pages well entitles it to this high description, and will, doubtless, cause it to rank as a 'classic' in the literature of the English gentleman. But it will also be valued for the genius with which Mr. Davies has fulfilled his task. From 'find' to 'finish' he has pursued it with no half-scent."—Bristol Mercury.

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,480, Vol. 57. March 8, 1884. [Registered for Transmission abroad.] Price 6d.

THE FIRST STAGE OF THE FRANCHISE BILL.

THE Representation of the People Bill (which, in the absence of any scheme of redistribution, is not a Representation of the People Bill at all) has been read a first time by the House of Commons, and in another sense by the country; and its partisans are sanguine, or affect to be sanguine, of its success. The abundance of protestation on this head is indeed a little suspicious; and it is significant that defenders of this Radical measure hint that the term "service franchise" had better be changed, inasmuch as some persons in high position may benefit by it and will be disgusted at the term. The new and preposterous revival of the PRIME MINISTER'S Midlothian doctrine of Centrifugal Representation would have been incredible of any one but Mr. GLADSTONE. But it is not of these peculiarities, or of the aspect of the redistribution question, that it is proposed to speak in this place. Redistribution is indeed the point on which the fortunes of the Bill must turn; but for this very reason it requires separate treatment. Neither is it at present necessary to discuss the Bill clause by clause or line by line; there will be plenty of time for that. The important thing for the present, and in the interval between the debates on the subject, is to show how utterly false is the contention of some supporters of the Government that there is nothing to be said against the Bill in itself, and that opposition must necessarily take the form of a flank march. And besides this, it is important to show that the grain of truth which underlies this false contention points to what is in itself one of the strongest arguments against the Bill—to the fact that extension of the franchise has degraded political life as it is, and that further extension must degrade it more. There is no more erroneous assumption, if it be an assumption in good faith; there is no more impudent pretence, if it be an assertion made without belief, than that "there is no serious "opposition to the Bill itself in any quarter." It would be truer to say that there is no serious support of the Bill in any quarter except from one point of view—the view, namely, that it will afford the means of keeping one party in the State out of office for a long, if not an indefinite, period.

The proposition that the preamble of the Bill (if preambles were still in fashion) must be granted, that its principle is inexpugnable, must depend on several other propositions. These are—that because one man has the franchise, another in similar circumstances has a right to it; that the existing franchise does not afford a proper representation of the nation; that the candidates for electoral privileges are earnestly demanding them; that practical inconvenience arises from the difference of borough and county franchise; that the result of recent extensions has been so excellent that a further dose of the same medicine cannot but benefit the patient; that the present Parliament was distinctly charged to carry out such a measure; that the qualifications and deserts of the new voters to be are such as to make it a scandal that they should not be able to vote. Every one of these propositions may be traversed, with a certainty of upsetting it in the judgment of an impartial judge. The abstract argument which heads the list is not of a kind which has ever been admitted in England, and it would not in itself command the votes of a hundred men in the House of Commons. That the present Parliament is not the best of all possible Parliaments may be contended with considerable reason, but hardly by those who constantly assert that it is; while, on the other hand, those who find fault with it certainly do not so find fault because it represents too restricted a constituency. As for popular agitation, the desperate efforts of the Caucuses have produced nothing but cut-and-dried resolutions from the already enfranchised voters; while, except in one or two large boroughs of modern date, which would in any case come in sooner or later for enfranchisement, an utter apathy prevails among the freemen of the future. No practical inconvenience of any kind has been pointed out by the most enthusiastic reformer. So far from the Parliaments elected since 1867 being superior to the Parliaments before that date, two out of the three are held by one party in the State, and the third by the other party, to have been exceptionally maleficent Parliaments; while reasonable men of both parties agree that the business faculty of the engine as a whole, its manners, its debating ability, its independence, have been steadily deteriorating, and have required (according to Liberals) or served as a pretext for (according to Conservatives) measures previously undreamt of and unneeded. It is categorically false that the present Parliament was elected to enlarge the franchise; it is false even that enlargement of the franchise was in 1880 put at all prominently before the constituencies. Lastly, it is notorious and not denied that the larger number of the proposed new voters are, politically speaking, in the last stage of ignorance and incapacity. The very partisans of the Bill imply this by their favourite argument that the best way to make a man capable of exercising the franchise is to give it him. On every point, then, the assumption or assertion that the Bill cannot be opposed in front is false and unfounded.

But if it be the case that there is in any quarter a reluctance to oppose the Bill directly (and it is not necessary either to assert or deny that it is the case), no inference favourable to the proposed measure can be drawn from this, but the reverse. For most certainly there is no lack of arguments against the Bill—the arguments sketched above will take something more than the present strength of Radical debating power to answer them seriously. It is not less certain, it is indeed admitted by the adherents of the measure, that there is plenty of genuine dislike to it abroad, plenty of desire to oppose it in any and every way possible. If, then (to stick to the hypothetical), despite the abundance of argument against the Bill and despite the abundance of ill-will to it, there is any reluctance to oppose it directly, it is necessary to look for some special reason for this. It is not necessary to look very far. Indeed Mr. GOSCHEN indicated the cause in a speech which would have been wholly admirable if it had not been sicklied over in parts with the very half-heartedness and irresolution which he exposed and deplored. If Conservatives meet Mr. GLADSTONE'S new and overwhelming addition to the electorate with evasive and temporizing tactics; if Liberals who are known to have the heartiest dislike to the scheme proclaim their adhesion to it, and reject the refuge of a Cave, where, if a man is outcast and discontented, he may at least be independent and free; if, in short, there appears to be a great ox on the tongue of Parliament—what does this mean? It means simply that the enlargement of the constituencies has already impaired the independence, weakened the backbone, stifled the parrhesia of the House of Commons; and it means that a further repetition of the same error cannot but be followed by an aggravation of the same consequence. There may, indeed, be some reason for thinking that members on both sides have allowed themselves to be unnecessarily frightened; that even yet, and even in the largest constituencies, there is scarcely a genuine fancy for the creeping things of the Caucus—the submissive delegates who take Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S orders from Mr. SCHNADHORST'S lips. But undoubtedly there are more of this vermin in the present House of Commons than there ever has been before, and there is more tendency on the part of members who are not actually crawling creatures to give up the erect posture. There is, therefore, every reason to resist the Bill, and there is no valid reason for considering resistance hopeless. The present electors generally care nothing about it: and, though they might possibly be spurred up to care by a new Midlothian campaign, such a campaign of necessity implies a dissolution. The unceasing mismanagement of the Government in foreign affairs has been saved from its natural consequences by the fortune of England, and from its artificial consequences by the devotion of the Liberal majority, many times already. But Nemesis is a good stayer; and even a few bye-elections like that of Brighton, though they could not transfer the numerical majority, would so shatter it that Mr. GLADSTONE could no longer dare to expose it to the tremendous strains of such a division as that of Tuesday fortnight. In short, there is fair reason for trusting that delay will be a means sufficient to effect the desired and desirable end. No reasonable person objects to the gradual redistribution of seats as the change and growth of population requires, to the gradual increase of the electorate as new classes of men rise to a position in which it is suitable that they should share in the Government of the country. A Reform Bill of fair pretensions might be drawn up by transferring twenty seats from Ireland to the English and Scotch counties, by grouping some of the smaller boroughs and allotting the seats thus set free to the unrepresented or insufficiently represented towns, by enlarging the area of the districts which have household suffrage, and so forth. But the present scheme aims at nothing like this. It aims, either from a doctrinaire love of uniformity, or from mere restless desire of change, or from a dishonest intention to manipulate the springs of political power, at nearly doubling the electorate by the addition of vast numbers, most of whom do not want the franchise, a majority of whom are unfit for it, and a considerable minority of whom are certain to use it in the interest of the enemies of England.

REDISTRIBUTION.

MR. GLADSTONE will not succeed in evading the question of a redistribution of seats by his arbitrary postponement of legislation. He has indeed himself furnished ample materials for an inevitable controversy. In his long experience of indirect and tortuous policy he has not surpassed in ingenuity the partial disclosure of his future intentions which was contained in the latter portion of his speech. Expressing, as he said, only his own personal opinions, he reserved to himself the right of seeming, if necessary, to be overruled by his own Cabinet, and he left his colleagues at liberty, if he should himself no longer hold office, to repudiate professions which were intended to serve the immediate purpose of pledges, and at the same time to involve no responsibility. The most extraordinary part of the statement was the undisguised overture to the enemies of the Constitution which has since been accepted by Mr. PARNELL and his adherents in the spirit in which it was proposed. Mr. FORSTER has shown that, in a representative scheme founded on population, Ireland would lose twenty members; and attention has since been called to the rapid increase of the population of Great Britain, while in Ireland numbers are stationary or declining. An adjustment made with reference to any other test of fitness would be much less favourable to Irish pretensions; yet, in accordance with the precedent of Kilmainham, Mr. GLADSTONE proposes to buy Mr. PARNELL'S support by a large concession to be made at the expense of England. The representation of Ireland is not to be reduced; and in consideration of the iniquitous compact, the HEALYS, the SEXTONS, and the BIGGARS will support the Bill for the extension of the franchise. They have assuredly no reason to be dissatisfied with their bargain, as the Franchise Bill will itself increase their electoral power by 200 per cent. As the Greek saying runs, wrong is prolific of wrong, and injustice multiplies itself. The bribe to Ireland is to cost nothing to Scotland or to Wales, evidently because both parts of the kingdom return majorities for Mr. GLADS[illegible]. As an excuse for favouring Scotland, he has reproduced [illegible] amazing theory, first propounded in Midlothian, that districts remote from the capital are entitled to a larger proportionate representation. It is impossible to refute, and even to examine, a merely chimerical proposition. Mr. GLADSTONE adds that the Southern and Western parts of England are to be mulcted for the benefit of the North, probably because they are the most Conservative parts of the kingdom. The suggestion of an increase in the whole number of members will probably be withdrawn when it is found to be generally unpalatable.

A probable result, and perhaps an object of the separation of the two measures which are to constitute one great electoral revolution, seems to have been hitherto overlooked. The Radical section of the Cabinet cannot fail to anticipate the difficulty of obtaining the sanction of the present Parliament to a sweeping project of redistribution. It may consequently be deemed expedient to provide a more suitable instrument for the promotion of democratic change. The addition of two millions of labourers, operatives, and artisans to the constituency will bring, as the modern phrase is, within the range of practical politics the whole or a principal part of the scheme of distribution which has been often explained by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. MORLEY. If a complete project had been brought forward by the Government, the advantages and the evils of redistribution would have been balanced against arguments bearing on the franchise. Mr. GLADSTONE prefers to make a large addition to the strength of his party before he engages in a struggle of which under present conditions the issue might be doubtful. It is true that he held out to the House the prospect of dealing with redistribution in the next Session of the present Parliament; but he must be fully aware of the probable occurrence of events which he thought it unnecessary to anticipate in his speech. When the Franchise Bill has been carried, any hesitation on the part of the House of Commons in accepting the Ministerial scheme of redistribution will be at once punished by dissolution. It is even possible that, if the Government hesitated to appeal to the country, the Radicals would plausibly dispute the right of a self-condemned Legislature to undertake an organic change in the Constitution. In either case the process of redistribution would fall under the control of a House elected under the new system, and the members elected exclusively by the class which depends on weekly wages might not improbably resolve on the formation of equal electoral districts. Mr. GLADSTONE professes not to object to such a measure on principle, but he foresees that it might at present complicate his corrupt bargain with the disaffected Irish members.

When the Franchise Bill is once passed, Mr. PARNELL and his allies will be fully able to take care of themselves. They will undoubtedly coalesce with any faction which attempts to reserve the question of redistribution for a Parliament elected by the new constituency. One general election will enable them to dictate the form and the extent of redistribution. With ninety or a hundred disciplined followers at his back, Mr. PARNELL may compel any Government to redeem Mr. GLADSTONE'S unscrupulous promises to himself, and at the same time to disregard the hesitating pledges which he offers to the House of Commons. Having secured to Ireland more than its share of representation, the Nationalist faction will be able to trade with English parties which may be tempted to purchase its support. Four hundred thousand occupiers of mud cabins will be represented by demagogues who will not even profess to regard the welfare of the Empire. As they will have no direct interest in the distribution of electoral power in Great Britain, they will make terms with the most unjust and most profuse of competing political stewards. The general result will perhaps be the same if the Nationalists at once cast in their lot with the revolutionary faction. In that case the advocates of proportional representation, or of other checks on democratic despotism, will find themselves powerless against the Irish contingent. It is true that devices for the protection of minorities are not in any case likely to succeed; but Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Mr. COURTNEY, Mr. FAWCETT, and those who hold similar opinions would not wish to be summarily supported by a packed Irish vote. It is important that politicians who still retain a trace of independence or a conscientious scruple should understand the impossibility of defending themselves when once the Franchise Bill has become law. It is with the enlarged constituency, and its representatives in England, Scotland, and Ireland, that they will have to deal.

It is not merely for the purpose of exposing the sinister designs of the Ministry that it is desirable to consider the inseparable connexion between extension of the franchise and redistribution of seats. The action of the House of Lords may not improbably be determined by the question whether an appeal is to be made to the old or to the new constituency. The existing Parliament must deal, at least in the first instance, with the Franchise Bill; and the party managers already proclaim their purpose of organizing outside agitation in its support. If their efforts succeed, resort to a dissolution will only have postponed the acquiescence of the House of Lords in the popular verdict. According to modern constitutional practice, the decision of the House of Commons, deliberately ratified by the electors, is recognized as conclusive. An entirely different question arises when one half of an indivisible measure is for party purposes detached from the other. It is for many reasons probable that any scheme of redistribution which can be devised will be unpalatable to constituencies threatened with swamping or disfranchisement, and to those parts of the kingdom which will see that Irish disaffection is rewarded by an undeserved boon. It may in the course of the impending debates be made clear to all reasonable politicians that Mr. GLADSTONE and his confederates intended that the most vital portion of their scheme shall be referred, not to the constituency which raised them to power, but to an electorate composed of five millions of voters instead of three millions, and including the lowest class of Irish peasants. Many Liberals, who are for various reasons prepared against their will to accept household suffrage, will draw back when they find that the existing constituency may probably not be consulted on the not less important question of arranging electoral districts. They have now received warning that Mr. GLADSTONE will, for the sake of a party bargain, deviate from the equal application of rules framed by himself. It is certain that the Irish Nationalists, with a potent voice in the adjustment of conflicting claims, will regard neither the public interest nor justice. In demanding that both the Franchise Bill and the principle, if not the details, of redistribution shall be submitted to the constituency, the House of Lords will be countenanced by a respectable section of the Liberal party, and its conduct will be unanimously approved by all moderate politicians, though some of them may shrink from the open avowal of their convictions. Mr. GLADSTONE correctly appreciated the real opinion of the country when he warned his supporters that a complete measure which might be contained in a Bill would never become an Act. His inference that it was better for his followers to take what they could get may have been well suited to the purposes of a faction, but it was scarcely calculated to persuade a dispassionate Legislature. In assuming that the Distribution Bill would be introduced in the next Session, he showed himself a skilful rhetorician; but the whole course of the debate on the first reading proved that even the delay of a year is condemned by the judgment of independent Liberal members.

THE SECOND BATTLE OF TEB.

IF the second battle of Teb be regarded exclusively as a military event, it is, putting aside the sympathy which must be felt with the families of the brave men who fell, almost entirely satisfactory. Of all the battles which the English army has fought for the last twenty years, it was, with the partial exception of Ahmed Kheyl, the best contested. The uncivilized adversaries of the English troops had, besides numerical advantage and a dauntless bravery, an armament by no means despicable, even according to civilized notions, and sufficient science to assume a fairly correct military defensive. On the side of the victors the tactics were good and the movements executed with precision and vigour. All soldiers will think, and most soldiers will certainly say, that a small detachment of Horse Artillery could have executed the task assigned to the cavalry with far less loss of precious life and with even greater strategical effect. But it is hardly to be regretted that Englishmen had an opportunity of showing that they were the masters of their opponents at a hand-to-hand fight. The story of the battle (putting aside the folly of the Standard Correspondent, who apparently took Miss RHODA BROUGHTON for his model of style, and affected to describe a battle in the present tense) has been well told, and is thoroughly creditable to its heroes on both sides. Fortunately Providence came to the aid of Lord WOLSELEY, and by enabling a sufficient number of time-expired men and regiments retour des Indes to be employed, repaired the impossibility of "salting" the troops after the fashion adopted in the last Egyptian campaign. Thus the lovers of short service have an opportunity of praising young troops, and the lovers of England are able to rejoice in a battle where long service supplied the indispensable element of stability. The proportion of killed and wounded officers was—as always now—very heavy, but this has its advantages as well as its drawbacks. The conduct of the English troops after the battle contrasts in the most desirable manner with the brutal massacres after victory which Russians and Frenchmen have recently indulged in under somewhat similar circumstances. In short, General GRAHAM and his troops, young and old, army, navy, marines, and volunteers (for the services of General BAKER and Colonel BURNABY will not soon be forgotten by Englishmen, and the marines, as usual, suffered most disproportionate losses), deserve the very best thanks and congratulations of their countrymen. A good fight well fought, well won, and well lost is in this unsatisfactory world one of the most satisfactory things to actors and spectators of healthy body and mind, and the second battle of Teb was a very good fight indeed.

At this point, unluckily, the critic must stop, if he is to continue laudatory. The second battle of Teb was a good battle, but the policy which brought it about appears worse and worse by the very results of the battle itself. Speaking exactly, about six thousand Arab and Egyptian men, women, and children—probably more—together with some scores of Europeans, have now lost their lives, for no other reason in the world than because Mr. GLADSTONE refused to abandon his shilly-shally policy in the beginning of January instead of in the middle of February. It is now nearly certain that the Arabs would not have fought against Englishmen if Englishmen had been brought into the field when Mr. GLADSTONE was urged and prayed to bring them; it is absolutely certain that, if they had fought, a single conflict would have spared the butcheries of Teb No. 1 and of Sinkat. It is obvious and confessed that the last action was simply a consequence of the previous refusal to act, and the nominal "relief" of Tokkar is simply a gross abuse of language. You cannot relieve a place already captured, and Tokkar had been captured long before the Leap-year battle. But this is not all. The success of last week, with its additional libation of Arab and English blood, appears to have only hardened Mr. GLADSTONE'S heart. He relapses into shilly-shally under cover of General GRAHAM'S feat. What this means every one except Mr. GLADSTONE knows. It means that the blood of Teb will have been shed in vain, and that General GRAHAM'S work will have to be done once more, twice more, or any number of times more that the patience of England allows. Moreover the PRIME MINISTER still refuses, confident in his unblushing majority, to say definitely what the Government means to do in Egypt. He points to his vote of confidence, and says that the House has approved the policy of the Government. In the debate which Colonel STANLEY has very properly brought on, though it was impossible for him to conclude with a definite motion, Mr. GLADSTONE excelled himself in obstinate adherence to meaningless formulas, in refusing to acknowledge facts, and in asserting that a policy which no one has yet been able to define is definite. On this point a fair challenge is possible. Let any unofficial member of the Liberal party possessed of intelligence, say Mr. JOHN MORLEY or Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. FORSTER or Mr. HENEAGE, rise and say what he has understood the policy of the Government to be. If he succeeds in giving any full and intelligible account of it, without promptings and without repudiations from the Treasury bench, Mr. GLADSTONE'S vaunt shall be admitted as sufficient. But the utterances of his colleagues and his followers on every occasion show clearly that it was not sufficient. "Pretence of freedom from responsibility" and "the fiction of an Egyptian power which does not exist," are not the words of a Tory partisan; they are the words of Mr. PETER RYLANDS, and, though it would have been well if Mr. PETER RYLANDS'S votes and his words agreed better together, there is at least no fault to find with the words. The responsibility which did not exist at Sinkat, but which sprang into existence in some incomprehensible manner at Tokkar, is characteristic of the whole action of the Government.

But, if the intentions of the Ministry as to the Eastern Soudan are unintelligible, they are lucid and definite compared to its intentions as to the Central and Western. For some ten days past, though in constant and easy communication with General GORDON, Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues have refused to give any information whatever as to General GORDON'S proceedings. Not only will they say nothing about the slavery proclamation, which is now almost ancient history, but they will say nothing about the singular declaration that he has "sent for English soldiers." Mr. GLADSTONE knows nothing of LUPTON BEY, though LUPTON BEY is a Vice-Governor of the Soudan, and a special envoy of HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY is Governor-General thereof (after it has been given up, and a Governor-General is thus an absurdity). As to facts, perfect silence is observed officially. Unofficially, the telegrams from Khartoum may be said to leave Ælia Lælia Crispis a long way behind as exercises for exegetic ingenuity. One day it is said that the tribes laugh at General GORDON'S proclamations, that his influence beyond Khartoum is nil, that his emissaries cannot get up the river, and so forth. Within a few hours it is said that the MAHDI is in ecstasies at being appointed Sultan of Kordofan, that he is going to settle down to quiet Sultanry, with a hundred wives at least, and that he has sent his orders in all directions to cease fighting. And this valuable intelligence is made more valuable by the information that "the road from Souakim to Berber is open"—which, as a matter of fact, it is not, and which the writer could not have known if it were. Then all this is supplemented with a suggestion that the great slave-hunter and filibuster ZOBEIR (certainly and without any irony a very capable person) shall be appointed Governor by the Power which has formally abdicated government, and with the information that General GORDON expects a servile war in the country within a twelvemonth. This is the pax Britannica which Mr. GLADSTONE'S policy is to bring on the Soudan! And it must be remembered that this cheerful pot pourri of contradictory evil tidings (the news of the MAHDI is as evil as any other; for so surely as he behaves in the manner here described, will some other Mahdi take his bishopric) does not come from the first-comer. All news arriving from Khartoum is semi-official, if it be only the indiscretion of semi-officialism. It is apparently held by some people that the intention of these singular despatches is to force Mr. GLADSTONE'S hand, and obviate the absurd policy of withdrawal from the Northern gate of Equatorial Africa. It may be so; and the supposition at least supplies an explanation of what is otherwise inexplicable. But so long as the Government, continuing to express the utmost confidence in General GORDON, refuses to take any notice of what General GORDON is doing, so long as a majority in Parliament supports them in the policy of alternate slaughter and scuttle, and so long as the country tolerates a majority which behaves in such a fashion, it is to be feared that a series of interesting enigmas in the telegraphic columns of the Times will not produce much effect. The Brighton election, following on the greatly-increased majority against West Somerset, was a lesson no doubt; but the lesson must be repeated and emphasized, if the waste of money, of life, and of political chances, almost more precious than either, is not to go on.

WHEELS WITHIN WHEELS.

IT is natural that political tendencies which may be originally unconnected should sometimes tend to combine. The result of convergence is in such cases to give an artificial impulse to movements which may be useless or mischievous. An instance of the process may be found in two or three recent experiments and projects. The repeated attempts of special interests to obtain representation in the Cabinet have at first sight no connexion either with schemes of legislative disintegration or with the devolution of the functions of the House of Commons to large Standing Committees; yet all these proposals have lately become mixed up, especially in a late speech of Mr. GLADSTONE'S. The substitution of Committees of eighty members for Select Committees of ten or twelve seemed to have no political object; nor was there any reason why the scheme should be favoured or opposed by either party. It is generally agreed that the experience of last year left the expediency of the measure in doubt. The Committee on Trade dealt successfully with the Bankruptcy Bill and the Patents Bill, while the Committee on Law, notwithstanding the able conduct of the inquiry by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, proved to be entirely abortive. It is probable that a further trial may throw additional light on the capacity and utility of large Committees. Many members think that issues which create wide differences of opinion must be reserved to Committees of the whole House; but that the details of a measure generally approved may be advantageously discussed by a representative body of delegates.

All parties are ready to concur in the appointment of one or more Standing Committees for the present Session, though there may perhaps be a difference of opinion as to the selection of the measures to be referred. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S Merchant Shipping Bill has produced so much angry feeling that the discussion of the clauses in a large Committee might perhaps cause inconvenience. In this case an attempt will be made to restrict the inquiry to a Select Committee, on the plausible ground that it may be necessary to examine witnesses. A more important consideration is the probability that, even if the Bill is reported with amendments, the shipowners will insist on reviving the discussion in the House. Large Committees have many disadvantages in comparison with smaller bodies; and their only compensating merit is the authority which they may be supposed to possess. The Bills which were last year approved by the Committee on Trade passed through their subsequent stages without discussion. Wherever a similar result may be reasonably anticipated, the new system will have justified itself. Mr. GLADSTONE is responsible for a certain prejudice which has been raised against Standing Committees by his frequent and gratuitous eulogies of the doctrine of devolution. It is not unnatural that a Minister who has more than once tampered with the privileges of the House of Commons should be perhaps unjustly suspected of meditating further encroachments. In a late debate or conversation he intimated an intention to apply his favourite machinery to political or party purposes for which it is not adapted.

The transformation of a body charged with the duty of adjusting clauses into a subordinate local Legislature would be a more startling innovation than a mere increase in the numbers of Committee-men. Mr. PARNELL lately tempted Mr. GLADSTONE into a confession that such a perversion of the practice of devolution is not altogether foreign to his thoughts. The Home Rulers were certainly not sanguine enough to suppose that their audacious demand would be conceded by the House; but Mr. PARNELL has often succeeded in extracting from Mr. GLADSTONE virtual admissions that his most extravagant proposals include an element of justice. It would be idle to oppose the formal establishment of Home Rule if Mr. PARNELL'S scheme had been thought reasonable or practicable. A Grand Committee of Irish members, charged with the examination and control of Irish measures, would easily assume the character of an independent Parliament. It was apparently for the purpose of defiance, under colour of flagrant injustice, that Mr. PARNELL proposed to exclude the members for the University of Dublin. It happens that at the present moment Mr. GIBSON and Mr. PLUNKET are the most distinguished of all Irish members; and even if it were necessary for the University at a future time to content itself with less able representatives, it would be certain to return respectable and loyal politicians. It is true that in a Committee dominated by Mr. PARNELL'S followers the members for the University would find themselves out of place. The motion was, of course, not meant to be carried; but Mr. PARNELL succeeded in extorting a kind of vague concession from Mr. GLADSTONE. He seemed not disinclined to impart at some future time a local character to the Grand Committees. His Government has already given injudicious encouragement to provincial aspirations for a kind of legislative independence. The Welsh Sunday Closing Bill has, according to the statements of those who are acquainted with the facts, not accomplished the object of diminishing intemperance; but it will serve as a precedent for the retrograde policy of treating Wales as a separate province, though it had always been an object of prudent legislators to complete the assimilation of the Principality with the rest of the United Kingdom. The praiseworthy and successful efforts of zealous Welsh patriots to establish local colleges may not improbably be found to narrow the education of local students. In no other part of Great Britain are prejudices more obstinate or ignorance of the world more universal. It would have been equally inexpensive, and probably more beneficial, for Welsh students to frequent English Universities or collegiate institutions; but on these points a difference of opinion may naturally exist, and those who have made sacrifices for the expected advancement of their countrymen or neighbours deserve credit for their labours. Separate legislation for outlying parts of the kingdom is far more objectionable. The present Government has done its utmost to extend the process, though it has happily not yet succeeded. In the last Session Sunday Closing Bills for Cornwall and some other counties were supported on behalf of the Government by the HOME SECRETARY. A Scotch, a Welsh, or an Irish Grand Committee would perpetuate the application of a thoroughly vicious principle.

It is strange that it should be thought proper to give Ireland the privileges of a separate province or dependency, while the Ministers shrink in horror from a suggestion that the wholesale enfranchisement of a disaffected multitude is the indispensable consequence of the doctrine of equal and uniform legislation. It is possible that Mr. GLADSTONE'S ambiguous hints may have been expressions of a merely passing thought; but the oddest of his fancies sometimes survive the occasion which has given them birth. A few of his admirers and of his critics remembered the outrageous Midlothian paradox about the adjustment of Parliamentary representation to the distance, or perhaps the square of the distance, of an electoral district from London. No human being expected the repetition of the fantastic theory in his late speech on the Franchise Bill. It is impossible to feel confident that he may not hereafter embody in legislation his famous denunciation of grandfathers, or the project of local Grand Committees. It happens that plans of provincial legislation coincide in time not only with the new mode of Parliamentary procedure, but with an intermittent and yet obstinate agitation for the creation of new executive departments. It seems almost certain that a few Scotch projectors will succeed in obtaining the appointment of a Cabinet Minister to discharge some of the duties which have hitherto appertained to the Lord Advocate, or during the earlier part of the present administration to an Under-Secretary of State. When the question was discussed during the last Session, the Scotch members differed widely from one another as to the details of the measure, though few of them were disposed to object to the creation of an office which must be held exclusively by Scotchmen. A Scotch Grand Committee would provide the new Minister with a little Parliament of his own. It is true that the Scotch members have, with the connivance or approval of the House, generally settled by arrangement among themselves non-contentious local business. A formal reference of the same matters to a separate authority would alter the operation of the present system, and it would give an undue advantage to one political party. Mr. GLADSTONE himself has on more than one occasion plainly indicated his just disinclination to multiply Cabinet offices. A year ago he adroitly baffled the absurd demand for a Minister of Agriculture by giving a new title to the President of the Council and to the Chancellor of the Duchy. He seems likely to be more pliable in the matter of the Scotch Minister; but he has not yet consented to convert the President of the Board of Trade into a Minister of Commerce. Division by provinces is still less admissible than the creation of new departments.

THE TWO ARISTOCRACIES.

TWO funny and rather inconclusive articles in the National Review describe two aristocracies. The first article, by Mr. ALFRED AUSTIN, tells us all about the "Aristocracy of Letters." The persons who compose this illustrious society are those who, in the past or present, resemble or have resembled Mr. ALFRED AUSTIN. MILTON, SHAKESPEARE, and, we presume, blind THAMYRIS and blind MÆONIDES, are members of this community. "We are all "going to Heaven, and VANDYCK is of the company," said the dying GAINSBOROUGH. "We are all in the Aristocracy "of Letters, and MILTON is of the company," says, or seems to say, the living Mr. AUSTIN. Here are the very words of this distinguished writer:—"It follows that in proposing to "supersede a Republic or rather Rabble of Letters—in "which rabble are to be found not a few lords and ladies, "and even some princes—by an Aristocracy of Letters, one "is merely proposing that there should be an open and "perfectly accessible upper house of literature to which "any writer will belong whose watchword is Honour, and "who uses his pen with unwavering respect both for it and "himself. I think the suggestion thus set forth will not "seem either reactionary or repugnant to those writers, to "those of my own kith and kin, whose ear I want to gain." Mr. AUSTIN later defines "his own kith and kin" as "men "of letters" at large, but here he seems to take a higher tone. Before a man can enter the Aristocracy of Letters, as it appears to us, he should not only respect himself, and that "pen" of which PENDENNIS spoke so much, but he should also possess literary genius. He should not only be morally of Mr. AUSTIN'S "own kith and kin" (though that is a great advantage), but he should also be able to write, and should have something to say. The tiniest of minor poets or playwrights, the most stupid and ignorant of journalists, may (though perhaps it is not probable) have "Honour" for his watchword. But this admirable moral quality will scarcely place him where MILTON and where DRYDEN are. It is easy to agree with Mr. AUSTIN when he objects to the familiarity of much modern work, to the button-holing style in which the writer is always prosing about himself. When the Aristocracy of Letters protests against "excessive familiarity or vulgarity of style," we are all on the side of the Aristocracy of Letters. But that noble body must be discriminating as well as haughty, or what becomes of MONTAIGNE? Mr AUSTIN himself (modern authors will regret to hear) "finds most English books of to-day hard "to read, because of their style." We know not what books Mr. AUSTIN has read. Of course Mr. AUSTIN finds HOMER and CICERO, SOPHOCLES and VIRGIL, easy to read. If he does, why does not this aristocrat fall back upon them? Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD somewhere advises us to study as little contemporary literature as possible. Though the style of the author of Friendship's Garland sometimes verges on familiarity (as in the description of "the cock of Lord "ELCHO'S hat"), surely the author of The Strayed Reveller belongs to the Aristocracy of modern Letters. Very well, Mr. AUSTIN can confine his studies to the writings of his own kith and kin. Mr. ARNOLD'S, Mr. BROWNING'S, Lord TENNYSON'S works are surely good enough for him. The question arises whether these members of the Aristocracy of Letters, these men of genius and of honour, devote much time to perusing the works of their intellectual cousin, Mr. AUSTIN. An enthusiastic singer once addressed Mr. SWINBURNE as "brother, my brother, my strong "sweet brother." Perhaps Mr. AUSTIN will appeal to Mr. ARNOLD as "my sweet light brother." We take it for granted that Mr. AUSTIN is not too haughty to recognize Lord TENNYSON, Mr. BROWNING, Mr. ARNOLD, and Mr. RUSKIN as members of the Aristocracy of Letters. There are, fortunately, in our realm very many others who have not bent the knee to BAAL, and who certainly respect both their pens and themselves and their readers, though perhaps they may not claim kin with those typical aristocrats, MILTON and the late Lord LYTTON. The conclusion of Mr. AUSTIN'S remarks (which do not lead to any very practical proposal) is that "a writer may fail utterly, aye, and fail even to the "end, and yet belong to the Aristocracy of Letters.' This must be a great comfort to writers who fail, but most of them prefer success, without troubling themselves much about aristocracy. Besides a writer who fails is infinitely more likely to belong to the proletariat of letters, a highly respectable body but wholly destitute of genius, without which the twy-peaked hill can never be won. But let us all by all means write, as Mr. AUSTIN bids us, "in a dis-"interested temper and a dignified style," especially in a disinterested temper. Let us avoid the besetting sin of literary men, of all artists, the love of disparaging our betters, the TENNYSONS and BROWNINGS, the Immortals in whose age it is a privilege for us poor scribblers to draw breath.

The Aristocracy of Letters is a somewhat shadowy and, as we think, somewhat scanty community. We have already hinted that genius, no less than honour and excellent intentions, are necessary to him who would belong to the upper house of literature. Now literary genius is so rare that perhaps it has been given to only seven or eight living Englishmen. But the Aristocracy of birth and wealth is a big palpable body, whose ways Lady JOHN MANNERS describes in the National Review. "You eat too much, "you drink too much, you smoke too much," said a severe Don to his pupil. We may add, in Lady JOHN MANNERS'S own words, that, in addition to all these excesses, the Aristocracy of wealth and birth is "chippy" too much, is "jumpy" too much, is "rushed" too much. To quote another moralist and acute observer, this Aristocracy "frivols too

"There we sat the whole day, feasting on unspeakable "abundance of meat and sweet wine." So says HOMER, whenever he has a chance: it is thus that he describes the manners of the Achæan aristocracy. All aristocracies are barbarians, says the sage of Chobham. All barbarians eat and drink as long as they possibly can, says the anthropologist. Lady JOHN MANNERS finds that the Aristocracy of wealth and birth keeps up the barbarian habit, and feeds in the fearless old fashion. Half a century ago "the meal was of long duration and heavy in character; "frequently the potations succeeding it lasted for a con-"siderable time." They did, indeed. "TULLYWHACKET'S "looking gey glum," said a guest to his host when potations had lasted for a considerable time. "He may weel "look glum; he has been wi' his Maker thae twa hours," the host replied. Lady JOHN MANNERS doubtless knows that, however often people eat and drink now, they ate and drank far more, and longer at a stretch, in the past. Rich people, with good constitutions and very little brains—nay, people with plenty of brains, like Prince BISMARCK—always will eat and drink a great deal in Northern climates. Consider how they fed two hundred years ago. "The Compleat Cook, expertly "Prescribing the most ready wayes, whether Italian, "Spanish, or French, for dressing of Flesh and Fish, order-"ing of Sauces, or making of Pastry" (London, 1668), lies before us. This work tells us what our ancestors devoured. Here you learn how "To make the best Sausages that ever "were eat," "To make a Pumpion Py," "To make a Pud-"ding of a Calves Chaldron," "To fricate Champigneons," "To dresse a Pig"—a whole pig—"the French manner," "To bake Red Deer"—whole red deer, apparently—you parboil it, and lard it very thick. Finally, our fathers "make a fat Lamb of Pig." Lady JOHN MANNERS will admit that our forefathers ate a good deal, and what they did eat was pretty solid. The present aristocracy of wealth and birth, however, do what their fathers did not; they consume huge hot luncheons when they are engaged in shooting. This mixture of gormandizing and sport is disgusting and unsportsmanlike.

As to "jumpiness," "chippiness," and "being rushed," as to extravagance in dress, and so forth, they have always existed, they always will exist, they have always been preached at, they always will be preached at, in the days of NOAH, in Egypt, Assyria, Rome, France, England, in every wealthy, luxurious society. Lady JOHN MANNERS's sermon is more amusing than most; but the austere OUIDA has long preached, from the same text, in the wilderness. Both censors of our customs and cookery will admit that we have advanced in refinement since the age of CHARLES II. Our cookery-books no longer contain, like A Queen's Delight (1668), "a receipt for making Damnable Hum." Some censors will say that the recipe has been exalted from the kitchen to the study, and that the profane dainty is too constantly served up in our literature.

THE SHIPPING BILL.

THE meeting of shipowners at the City Terminus Hotel gave expression to the growing dissatisfaction felt with Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S new Shipping Bill. The speakers had nothing much to add to what has been already said; but their position as the chiefs of a great industry, and the fact that many of them were members of Parliament, gave additional weight to the general complaints of the shipbuilding trade. It does not sensibly diminish the importance of their protest that their avowed object was not entitled to much sympathy. There are much more effective ways of opposing the Bill than agitating for its reference to a Select Committee. The shipowners may pardonably shrink from directly opposing a measure which is calculated to secure a good deal of popular support. Not a few of them share the reluctance of Lord RAVENSWORTH, who, in a letter to the Chairman, confessed that he had preferred to keep in the background. His motive is likely to influence a good many people in these days, when a good sentimental end is held to justify the most doubtful means. Lord RAVENSWORTH frankly said, "I do not wish to place "myself in a position of direct antagonism to this "Shipping Bill, because the object sought is one we all "seek—namely, the saving of life and property at sea by all "reasonable means." The shipowners, who are threatened with legislation which is likely to do considerable damage to their property, have strong motives for not allowing their feelings to damp their opposition; but they doubtless feel preference for a line of action which leaves them as little open as possible to invidious charges. On these grounds, probably, they have decided not to say openly that Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S Bill is a bad Bill, but only that Parliament is not sufficiently well informed as to the facts to be entitled to legislate on the matter at all. We think that their choice of a line of defence is unfortunate for more reasons than one. It is not the case that the necessary knowledge is wanting. The condition of the shipping trade has been inquired into officially and unofficially in the most elaborate manner for years past. A mass of information on the subject has been collected and is to be easily got at. If Parliament is not by this time competent to deal with the matter, it is certainly not for want of being able to get at the facts. Moreover, an attempt to refer the Bill to a Select Committee is eminently likely to excite that popular disapproval which the shipowners wish to avoid. It is impossible to deny that a Select Committee is supposed, and not wholly unjustly, to be a species of shelf, on which measures, if they are laid there at all, are very likely to remain for ever. The attempt of the shipowners to secure one may plausibly be represented by the agitators who stand and wait for the sign from the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE as the underhand manœuvre of men who cannot decently make an open fight. There are signs that the day of the agitator is passing away; but the shipowners will be well advised to run no unnecessary risks. The Bill contains doubtful matter enough to warrant an open opposition, and its adversaries will find that the most courageous is also the wisest way of fighting it.

There was little direct criticism of the Bill in the speeches delivered in the City. The shipowners present confined themselves for the most part to expressing the natural indignation of honest men who are subject to a sweeping charge of dishonesty of the basest kind. They naturally paid very little attention to the disclaimers of the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has repeatedly declared that the great majority of shipowners are honourable men, and that his sole object is to frame a measure which they would certainly approve for the punishment of the small minority of offenders. These fine words, however, have been followed by a Bill which will condemn everybody engaged in the shipping trade to carry on his business under a supervision rather stricter than any which is exercised over a ticket-of-leave man. The probable sufferers by this stringent measure prefer to look to his deeds rather than his words. One of the speakers called attention to the thirty-third clause, which provides that the members of a joint-stock Company registered as owner of a ship will be liable for damages, for further calls (after the whole of their capital has been paid up) in two cases. They may be called on to indemnify the crew of their own vessel if a disaster has been caused by one of their own officers, and to do as much for the crew of another ship which has suffered by the bungling of their captain. The liability will extend to loss of goods as well as personal injury. There is nothing in the Bill, whatever may be Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S private intentions, to show that the owners would not be held responsible for an error of judgment on the part of a captain, or even the mistake of a quartermaster, who put the helm the wrong way, and so caused a collision. It is manifest that if this became law, a shipowner who had chosen his master with the greatest care would still run the continual risk of being called on for immense sums, which might in a conceivable case amount to nearly a quarter of a million. As the Correspondent of an evening paper justly insists, such a state of things would be a direct encouragement to bad seamanship, and, therefore, intensify the terrible risk proposed to be added by the Bill to the many already inseparable from the shipping trade. Even if the principle of the Employers' Liability Act is extended to merchant shipping, it will be absolutely necessary to define the responsibility of the owner with a precision which is nowhere attempted in the Bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has perhaps good reason to be surprised at the reception given to his Bill. He must have calculated on a steady opposition from the shipowners; but he can scarcely have foreseen its extent, and still less can he have been prepared for the trifling amount of popular support his Bill seems likely to obtain. Even the sailors seem wholly indifferent to it. The pilots, who feel themselves threatened by the abolition of compulsory pilotage, have already inflicted a deputation on Mr. CHAMBERLAIN to complain, and he must be aware that they are the representatives of an important part of the seafaring class. Among the minor questions raised by the Bill, that of compulsory pilotage is not the least interesting. The shipowners will probably ask to be told how the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE proposes to deal with the liability of a British shipowner whose vessel has been lost abroad, with a foreign pilot whose services are imposed on the captain by the regulations of the port. But, if an agitation for the Bill does not spring up of itself, it can be made. The popular impression in the constituencies to which Mr. JOHN MORLEY referred in the meeting in Cannon Street as a reason for supporting the Bill, altogether independently of its merits, may be worked on. Accordingly, we hear that Mr. PLIMSOLL, who has done the Cabinet yeoman's service already, is to be summoned from abroad to help in the present difficulty. Then, too, there is the never-failing resource of Birmingham. The Trades Council of that enlightened city has already forwarded Mr. CHAMBERLAIN the usual resolution which it keeps at the disposal of its member, calling on him in the name of the people to go his own road fearlessly. In his answer the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE takes his revenge for the compulsory civilities of Newcastle. He works the familiar commonplaces about the "powerful and most formidable phalanx" of shipowners, and the scattered and oppressed British seamen. It is more than probable, however, that this attempt to lash up the sentimentalists of the country may prove a failure. As Mr. CHAMBERLAIN must know by this time, an ungrateful nation is getting heartily sick of the guidance of Birmingham. Mr. PLIMSOLL is no longer the tower of strength he was. Worst of all, the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE has had already to confess that he had been wrong. He has been compelled to make concessions in the matter of insurances, and they are not concessions of detail. They prove clearly enough that the framer of the Bill had mistaken the conditions of the question he was dealing with. Even if the sailors grow clamorous, it is doubtful whether much of an agitation could be got up in the present tired and confused state of the constituencies. There are too many things to attend to. And it is not probable that the sailors will trouble themselves much about the new Shipping Bill. Their idea of a Bill is too naïf for practical purposes. What they want is a good severe law compelling their employers to give them twice their present wages. For such small matters as the regulation of insurance and indemnities for injuries, which they could only get by a law-suit and a good deal of trouble, they are mainly indifferent.

THE IRISH IN AMERICA.

IT is said to be the intention of the Cabinet to submit a friendly, but firm, remonstrance to the American Government on the subject of the plots formed against this country by Irish emigrants in the United States. We have had too much experience of the present Cabinet to have much faith in the firmness of its action even when the lives and property of British subjects are at stake; and, if the representations which may be made by the British Minister at Washington prove successful, the result will assuredly be due not to the energy and decision of HER MAJESTY'S present advisers, in which the American people is far too shrewd to have any belief at all, but to the fact that all respectable Americans are disgusted that their country should be made the home of murderous conspiracies against a friendly and kindred nation. We are now so familiar with the methods to which the disloyal Irishman naturally has recourse that our sense of their extreme baseness and turpitude is apt to get blunted. Crimes of which no civilized people is guilty when in a state of open war with another; crimes which, if committed in a state of war, would justify and require wholesale reprisals, are now planned and contrived against this country in the territory of a friendly State. Had the recent dynamite plot proved successful, a number of men, women, and children would have been killed and wounded, most of whom would have been as responsible for what occurs in Ireland as for what occurs in Kamtschatka, and some of whom might even have been ardent sympathizers with Mr. PARNELL. It is fortunate that the executors of the plot proved to be as clumsy as they are wicked, and that the mischief actually done has fallen far short of their intention. The subject, nevertheless, is one that cannot be treated lightly by reasonable men on either side of the Atlantic. Future plots contrived against us in the United States may prove more successful than those which have hitherto failed; and an outbreak of popular indignation may take place which would do more than impair those friendly relations between the two countries which have happily grown up of late years.

The Americans, like ourselves, are a long-suffering people; and, like ourselves, they have suffered many things from the Irish. There is no other country in the world in which the Irishman is less admired; for there is no country in the world, except Ireland itself, which has had so much experience of him. Unfortunately, he is a factor in American politics which those who dislike him most cannot afford to leave out of account. In all parts of the United States the Irish vote is too valuable to be lightly thrown away; and this is especially the case in the large cities in which the Irish immigrants congregate, in which the Irish conventions are held, and the newspapers of which especially represent the Irish cause. There is a limit, nevertheless, to what the average American politician will connive at in order to please his Irish supporters. It must also be borne in mind that the new form of warfare to which the disloyal Irish have had recourse is one almost as dangerous to Americans as to Englishmen. Dynamite is indiscriminate in its action, and is a material which needs also to be treated with caution; and in the hands of bunglers, such as those who were at work at the railway-stations, it may chance to explode at the wrong time and in the wrong place. Suppose—and it is no improbable supposition—that a portmanteau full of dynamite, belonging to an Irishman about to quit America for Europe, were to go off at the Fifth Avenue Hotel; or suppose that he got his dynamite on board one of the great steamers, filled with Americans on their way across the Atlantic, and that it exploded there—we may be sure that the whole subject would at once present itself to the American mind in quite a different light from that in which it now appears. But, even without such practical lessons, the people of the United States, we believe, will recognize that the proceedings of the Irish in America are not offences of a political character, but simply crimes against humanity.

It is said, indeed, that much of the dynamite used by the Continental anarchists is also imported from America; and in this case England is not the only country which will have ground for remonstrating with the American Government. Neither the action of the latter, nor indeed the real sentiments of the people, can justly be inferred from the tone of certain American papers. It is an understood thing in American politics that as little as possible shall be said which might estrange the Irish vote, and the rule is observed by politicians of all parties. When it comes, however, to a choice between displeasing the worst class of Irishmen in America, or refusing to perform a plain act of international duty, we cannot imagine that the Government of the United States will hesitate for a moment. It is easy, indeed, to overrate the influence of the Irish in America. They are influential enough to be flattered, but by no means influential enough to determine the policy of the United States, which in foreign affairs invariably represents the general feeling of the country. There is no question that this feeling is in the main friendly to England, and there is no question that, whatever theoretical opinions many Americans may hold on the subject of Home Rule, the means which have been employed to attain it are viewed with as much abhorrence by Americans as by Englishmen. It may well be doubted whether, by refusing or delaying to discharge its international duties, the American Government would not lose far more popular support than it would gain. The mass of the American people have certainly no wish to be engaged, in an unrighteous cause, in a dispute with any European country, and least of all with England. The crimes prepared on American soil, though political hatred may lie at the root of them, are clearly not political in their character. It may indeed be argued that the assassination of an individual in whom a political system is incorporated differs in kind from an ordinary murder; though for ourselves we fail to see why the murderer of a Russian Emperor, an American President, or an Irish Secretary should not be dealt with precisely as any other assassin. Nevertheless, a sophistical plea may be brought forward in favour of such a distinction. But the plea is simply ridiculous when put forward, as it recently has been by a New York newspaper, on behalf of the authors of the recent outrages. They are, to the best of their ability, carrying on from American soil organized war, not against the English Government or its officers, but against the English people. It is a war, too, in which no feature of treachery, cowardice, or atrocity is wanting. Its avowed object is simply to terrorize, if it can, the English public; and it is just as much, and just as little, "political" in its character as the burning of defenceless cities or the massacre of women and children would be in a state of declared warfare between civilized States.

We should do the people of the United States injustice by supposing that they have not the intelligence themselves to make these obvious reflections. Nor, if our own Government presents its case with propriety, is there any reason to think that its representations will be met in an unfriendly spirit. It must be remembered also that, although race, religion, and history have much to do with the present estrangement of England from Ireland, not a little of it is due to the communistic or anarchical craze which is now more or less epidemic in all the civilized countries of the world. Thus in Ireland the feeling of Celts against Saxons, of Catholics against Protestants, and of those once ruled against those who were once their rulers is reinforced by the antipathy, old as human nature, but of late stirred and trained into fresh activity, of those who have no property against those who have. Of all the blunders which can be laid to the charge of the Government, whether in home or in foreign affairs, the greatest is this—that it has set an example, under humanitarian pleas, of interference with the hitherto admitted rights of property, and has thus for the first time raised communism into a serious power in English politics. The Irish legislation of the present Government has prepared the way, among considerable classes in this country, for the acceptance of theories such as those which Mr. GEORGE has made current. It is not sufficiently recognized that, together with causes special to Ireland, one source of Irish discontent is the same which stirs to similar acts of brutal violence the artisan of Paris or Vienna and the peasant of Croatia or the Romagna. It is not as the enemies of any one Government in particular, but of all government whatsoever, that the American people will come to recognize and to treat not a few of their Irish fellow-citizens.

THE SALE OF POISONS.

PUBLIC attention has been attracted so much of late to Ministerial messes, to African massacres, and Fenian explosions, that there seems to have been very little to spare for a crime probably unequalled in England since the days of PALMER at Rugeley. A series of the most atrocious murders has been detected at Liverpool, where, for a paltry gain, two women have poisoned their nearest and dearest relatives. They were found out after a long career of probable but unascertained crime. One of them, it is reported, confessed as much. There must, we feel sure, be numberless undetected cases as long as the sale of poisons is permitted as at present. The Liverpool poisoners might have gone on with their operations for years to come if it had not been that long impunity produced carelessness, and carelessness clumsiness. So far as the law would have interfered they need never have experienced any difficulty in obtaining their supply of drugs. That they have been found out, convicted, and executed is a small matter. They can be hanged but once, and the investigation and trial went into but one case. But the whole affair reminds one of the danger incurred by the public owing to the present laws regulating the sale of poisons. The question of insurance is a serious one, but we need not enter upon it here. The question of the sale of poisons is a much more serious one, and just now the law is practically in abeyance as regards it.

We are therefore glad to hear that Government has taken up the subject. A Bill is before them, and will shortly be brought into the House of Commons. The Act of 1868 is a dead letter, yet it is the only protection we have at present. The older and more respectable chemists, with their full pharmaceutical licences, are being superseded by stores, grocers, and all kinds of unauthorized dealers. The old-fashioned chemist could and did know or guess what was in these compounds; he could and did exercise his judgment in selling them, so that no harm done by them could be brought home to him. But the association which manages a Co-operative Store, or the uneducated dealer in drugs, or the grocer's assistant who can now sell them, are altogether in the dark, and may provide a sick man with the very drug required to "complete the case." There is much, in fact, to be said against the entire system of stamping the so-called patent medicines. The Royal arms on the cover give them a kind of Government sanction, which undoubtedly imposes on the uninformed. That the same paternal and benevolent body which insists on vaccination, pure milk, and sanitary arrangements in general, gives its official stamp to many dangerous narcotics and to virulent poisons supposed to counteract gout, cancer, and other diseases is enough with many people to recommend them as innocuous. Professor ATTFIELD wisely suggests, and not an hour should be lost in adopting the suggestion, that the stamp should be abolished, and that the loss of revenue thus occasioned should be made up in a greatly increased charge for licences to sell patent medicines. As a fact, there is no real patent. If the inventor of a nostrum was obliged to register the drugs he uses and the process, as in ordinary patents, the case would be very different. Some old medicines were thus entered on the Patent-books years ago. But the modern quack medicine is a secret. We cannot expect every one who sells a bottle with a Government stamp on it to go to the expense of having the stuff analysed. Patent medicines may remain as they are—proprietary; but they should not have the sanction implied—in the minds of the general public, at least—in bearing a Government label. A patent medicine containing poison should be labelled poison, and it should be labelled, not by the retailer, but by the original maker, so that in case of harm ensuing from the use of it the retailer may have his remedy against the maker. There is no inherent difficulty in such an enactment. The retailer of watered milk, if he is fined, can recover against the producer under the Sanitary Acts; and it would be easy to make a similar arrangement in the case of dangerous medicines.

There is another point to which attention should be directed. At present the wholesale houses have no restriction placed on the sale of any poison which they can sell to the retailer or to a medical man. The case of Dr. LAMSON will be remembered. He applied to a chemist for aconitine. It was refused; and he then went to a wholesale house in the City and obtained what was sufficient for his purpose. True it was only one grain; but that would be enough to poison half a dozen adults. This was, therefore, strictly speaking, a wholesale transaction, and as such was very severely commented upon by the learned judge who tried the case at the Old Bailey. The greatest difficulty, however, will be found in dealing with what are sometimes described as statutory poisons. These are a very frequent cause of accidents. A metal-worker sends out for a few pence worth of vitriol. It is probably brought him in a cup. It is set on the table among the children. The utmost danger is incurred. The action of vitriol is so pronounced that even a child is not likely to swallow much; but a poisonous dose of carbolic acid may be taken without any immediate inconvenience, and the number of fatal accidents from this cause alone is sadly on the increase. When a chemist sells it, he labels it; but the drysalter has it among his oils and varnishes, and sells it without a word of warning to the buyer as to its dangerous qualities. In cases like these, since we cannot prohibit the sale of drugs necessary in the arts, we should insist on their being at least labelled "Poisonous" as a warning. It is not possible for the law to prevent lawless people from committing crime, but it is very possible to mitigate the chances of accident. If a man must have arsenic to commit suicide or murder, he will get it, like Mrs. FLANAGAN, from fly-papers, or perhaps from wall-papers. We can only deter him by the example shown at Liverpool on Monday. But the state of the law is to blame when a child swallows a mouthful of vitriol, or when sugar of lead is put into a pudding. We may go further, and refer to the enormous infant mortality caused by the administration of various kinds of soothing syrups. One well-known medicine of this kind is credited with a round dozen of deaths annually. Scarcely less shocking is the mortality from over-doses of narcotic poisons among adults, and it is reported to be largely on the increase. These are things which should not be allowed to happen, yet they do happen constantly and are reported daily in the papers. It is much to be hoped that the Bill when it comes before the House may be found to contain full provisions on these points, as well as on the licensing question and the other incidental matters of minor importance. The State is directly to blame when a preventable accident occurs, and it is indirectly to blame when the poisoner finds the drug he wants ready to his hand.

THE CONGO TREATY.

THE signing of the treaty with Portugal published a few days ago is not the least remarkable fact performed by the present Ministry in the course of its wonderful diplomatic career. When the state of things on the Lower Congo was brought before the House of Commons by Mr. JACOB BRIGHT, the Ministry promised—that is to say, Mr. GLADSTONE promised—that Parliament should be consulted before any definite settlement was made. It would appear, however, that the PRIME MINISTER was only speaking for himself on this as on various subsequent occasions. The promise is to be kept to the ear but not to the hope of Mr. JACOB BRIGHT. Parliament is to be so far consulted that the treaty will be laid before it, but for acceptance, not for approval. The document has been already signed, and is therefore binding on the country; and the House of Commons will have to choose between accepting it or passing what will practically be a vote of want of confidence in the Ministry. The manœuvre is smart—so smart that the Cabinet may discover to their surprise that even their obedient majority can grow restive at being put between the Devil and the deep sea for the seventh or eighth time. Looked at in itself, the treaty is good enough. The limits of Portuguese sovereignty are confined within bounds which may be described as modest when compared to Portuguese claims. The rights of British traders are secured as well as pen and ink can do it. They are to have the same rights and to pay the same dues as the subjects of Portugal. Protestant missionaries are to be at liberty to try to convert the natives, uncontrolled by Roman Catholic authority. Burial-grounds are to be set apart for the decent burial of such as do not die in the fold of the Church. All these and other personal rights are amply provided for—in words. Some guarantee is given that the native chiefs will be defended from arbitrary eviction. By a clause which limits the cherished sovereign rights of Portugal in a remarkable way, an English officer is to accompany every expedition undertaken by the Portuguese against the blacks, apparently as a species of superintendent charged with the duty of seeing that the treaty is duly carried out. International courtesy requires that the control should be mutual, and accordingly it is stipulated that a Portuguese officer shall accompany any English gunboat which has to make an expedition in the waters of the Congo. Finally, the slave trade is to be rigidly forbidden.

If nobody but the two high contracting parties were concerned in the matter, and both were equally to be trusted, the treaty might be acceptable enough. Since we do not intend to establish a protectorate on the Lower Congo ourselves, it is just as well that some settled authority should be set up as a defence against the intrusion of adventurers. A better keeper of the peace than Portugal could easily be imagined; but it is there, and if it is not very wise or high-minded, it has the quality—most useful from our point of view—of being weak. The Portuguese will talk most magnificently about their sovereign rights and national dignity; but in the long run they can be made to do as they are told. As a matter of fact, however, the high contracting parties are far from having the field to themselves. The Ministry may be excused for shirking plain speaking in the matter, but everybody knows very well that Portugal is being used in this case as a scarecrow to frighten away the French. We had always refused to recognize the rights of our little ally until M. DE BRAZZA appeared on the Congo, and began founding colonies with small tricolor flags and fraudulent ground leases. Now our official eyes have been miraculously opened to the justice of the Portuguese claims. That may be a very convenient course for us to take, but it remains to be seen whether the French Government will agree to it. From the point of view of Paris it looks very much as if we had generously given what we never possessed. The logical French mind will doubtless put the matter somewhat as follows. Either the Lower Congo belongs to England or it does not. If it does, why is Portugal called in? If it does not, then this treaty binds only the English and the Portuguese. It does not follow—indeed it is highly improbable—that France will offer any practical opposition; but it has an undoubted right to refuse to join in the arrangement. Like ourselves, till the other day, the French have always refused to acknowledge the rights of Portugal; and if they continue to do so, which is at least possible, the Congo will not be much nearer settlement than before. Of course, in the last resort we can always support our policy by offering any opponent the alternative of war. As, however, it was in our power from the first to have our own way on the Congo, it is not very obvious that we have gained anything by hampering ourselves with the alliance of Portugal. It is, no doubt, well that a stop should be put to enterprises like those of M. DE BRAZZA, and that there should be some authority entitled to maintain order on a trade route of growing importance. It is our interest, and therefore our duty, to provide for both; but only a Ministry which has a species of passion for the use of dummies would think that anything is to be gained by setting up such a feeble keeper of the peace as Portugal. The treaty, perhaps, strengthens the locus standi of England on the Congo; but it only does this at the price of engaging England in heavy and partly vicarious responsibilities. Now vicarious responsibilities are among the most fruitful sources of trouble.

The displeasure of France, though it has been pretty loudly expressed, will probably evaporate in words, at least for the present. When the House of Commons comes to discuss the Ministerial arrangement, it will have plenty to do in inquiring how far we can rely on the loyal co-operation of the Portuguese. Our experience of the validity of treaties contracted with Spain and Portugal is not calculated to inspire members who feel inclined to look behind the polite phrases of diplomacy with much confidence. It is not to be recommended that we should treat a Power with which we are negotiating with discourtesy; but a well-grounded want of confidence is an excellent reason for not making any treaty at all. It would most assuredly be justified in the case of Portugal. We have only to remember how the treaties for the suppression of the slave trade were carried out by the Peninsular Powers, and we have very recently had some striking examples of Portuguese good faith. If the Portuguese interpret the treaty to our disadvantage, if in spite of their promises their priests interfere with the missionaries, if their Custom-house officials refuse to hold the balance even between English traders and their own countrymen, and that is their habitual practice at home in the face of the most solemn guarantees, the English Government will have to deal with a host of disagreeable international questions. It is a commonplace that the Portuguese consider their colonies as preserves to be rigidly guarded for themselves, and it is a dream to suppose that their rooted convictions will be upset by this brand-new treaty. They will, if they are to be judged by their past conduct, consider their concession as the price promised for the recognition of their ancient rights, and only to be paid under pressure. Even, however, if Portugal must be trusted to behave with loyalty, there is a part of the Bill which the House of Commons ought to condemn severely. It is provided that English traders shall be on the same footing as the subjects of Portugal. The provision looks equitable, but those who know how petty and vexatious the Custom house and trade regulations of Spain and Portugal are will understand at once that this apparent security for the freedom of commerce will really impose severe restrictions on our merchants in the Congo valley. It is to be hoped that these and other considerations will be well threshed out in the House of Commons before it approves the action of the Government in setting up a Khedive on the Congo to match the burdensome dummy which we are continually trying to prop up on the Nile.

THE PARKS RAILWAY.

IT does not need much knowledge of London geography to detect the fallacies in the case set up for the "Park "Railway and Parliament Street Improvement Bill." The first glance at a map showing the course the proposed line is to take reveals at least two. In the first place Parliament is adjured to pass the Bill in order to benefit the working classes. They are forced, it is said, by the difficulty of finding house room to live further and further from their work, and the only way in which they can be enabled to do this is by giving them railways to take them to and fro. It is edifying to note how much more this argument weighs with a railway when it is still in the hands of promoters than after it has become a working concern. Railway Companies for the most part keep their anxiety to provide workmen's trains under very strict control; indeed it is chiefly by the bribe of a remission of the Railway duty that they have been induced to do what they have done in this direction. But a Company which has still to face a Select Committee sets no bounds to its enthusiasm for artisan humanity. The directors' one ambition is to carry the working-man; the tickets they dream of have "Parly" marked on their foreheads; their modest profits are to be drawn from third-class trains plying in the early morning and the late afternoon. The Metropolitan Company is no exception to the rule. In the present inchoate stage of the railway across the Parks the directors are only sustained in their labours by the thought of the good they are going to do. Apparently, however, they have a very low opinion of the intelligence of Parliament. They have no fear that a Select Committee will know enough of the subject to ask how the new railway proposes to do good in this particular way. Before any railway can give a man much help in getting from his home to his work, his work must be at one end of the line and his home at the other. Before the Parks Railway can give this help a man's work must be in Westminster and his home in Paddington. Unfortunately for the Company's argument, neither district answers to the description we are asked to accept of it. Westminster is too settled to provide employment on a very large scale. Paddington, though it abuts on districts in which an increasing number of working-men live, is not itself such a district. New railways may very likely be wanted to bring workmen nearer to their work; but a railway across the Parks is not one of them. North, west, and south of the Inner Circle Railway there are vast tracts of houses, nearly every inhabitant of which lives by the labour of his hands. Railways which connected these districts with the Inner Circle would be of positive value, because, if there is work to be done at Westminster, it would bring the men to do it from the places where they really live. On this head, therefore, the promoters of the Parks Railway Bill are clearly mistaken. Their philanthropy, admirable as it may be in itself, is philanthropy on a wrong scent. Parliament will be doing them a kindness if it prevents them from trying to benefit a specific variety of their fellow-creatures in a region where that specific variety is not to be found in anything like remunerative numbers.

The second plea put forward for this railway is the relief of London traffic. In a sense, of course, every new means of locomotion takes off the strain in some degree from the means which already exist. But, as between one scheme and another, the Parks Railway is curiously ill adapted to do anything of the kind. A break of station in a city is like a break of gauge in a railway system. It is a continual block. The Metropolitan Railway Company propose to create a break of station of a very remarkable and unexpected kind. Their Westminster terminus will be within a few yards of the Westminster Bridge station of the District Railway, but it will not be under the same roof. Passengers arriving at the Parliament Street station and wishing to go further east will have to come to the surface and cross Parliament Street in order to find the District train. There is something strangely perverse in this refusal to unite two lines so intimately connected as the Metropolitan and the District are at so many points at the point of all others where a junction would be convenient. Of the crowds which the Company expect to carry between Paddington and Westminster, a considerable percentage will have come from or be going to the District stations nearer the City. Why should every one of these passengers be compelled to add to the crowds already to be found in Parliament Street? Whether the object is to spite the District Company or simply to save expense, no Bill which contains such a provision should be allowed to pass. The first interest of railway travellers is that the number of through journeys which it is possible for them to make should be increased. The next is that, where this is impossible, the trouble of changing carriages should be minimized. Parliament is now asked to sanction a scheme which goes against the interest of travellers in both respects. The crowded state of the District line would of itself prevent through journeys; but there can be no need that the passenger who wants to go from Albert Gate to the Temple should have in the course of his journey to employ a policeman to convoy him across Parliament Street. If ever the Bill goes before a Committee, it is to be hoped that those who sit in judgment on it will bear in mind the remark of the Board of Trade:—"The railway proposed by this Bill will "not join any other railway, but will form a terminal station "at Westminster. This would be in some measure in con-"travention of the spirit of the recommendation of the "Lords' Committee of 1863, and of the Joint Committee of "1864, and would not give to the public those facilities for "transit which would be afforded if a proper continuous "communication with the present underground system "were provided for."

Of course the interference with the Parks which this Bill sanctions is represented as a thing never under any circumstances to be repeated. But there are at least two other lines which are quite certain to be made under Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, if once the principle of letting the navvy into them is conceded. There is to be a station at the Marble Arch and a station at Albert Gate. Now from the Marble Arch to Notting Hill, and from Albert Gate to Kensington, the traffic is very large; and if the Metropolitan Company are so anxious to carry passengers from Westminster, where they can only feed the District system, why should they not carry them from the Marble Arch to Notting Hill Gate, and from Knightsbridge to Kensington High Street, where they will feed their own system? Every argument that holds good for a railway across Hyde Park holds good for a railway by the side of Hyde Park; and the same economy which suggests carrying the one line across the Park instead of along Park Lane will suggest carrying the other two inside the Park railings instead of along the Bayswater and Knightsbridge Roads. We are likely, therefore, to have ample opportunities of finding out how far trees and turf really like that process of "cutting "and covering" to which it is proposed they should be submitted. Now what is the consideration which the public are to receive for running this risk? It is simply this, that the necessary approaches to the Houses of Parliament are to be made in part at the cost of the Metropolitan Railway instead of at the cost of London or of the nation. London, that is to say, is too poor, England is too poor, to bear the expense of widening Parliament Street and making certain improvements in the Government offices; and, in order to raise the money, part of the soil of the Parks is to be sold. Was there ever a more discreditable confession for a great city and a great nation to make? If neither the Metropolitan rates nor the Consolidated Fund can endure the additional burden, let us have a "Park Saturday," with the officials of the Woods and Forests sitting at the street corners and rattling their money-boxes. It might, indeed, be thought a disgraceful exhibition of national poverty, but it would be preferable to selling the right to cut and carve the national estate. There is some chance that the Bill may break down on a technical point. It is not clear that all the necessary consents have been obtained, or that some of those which have been obtained are not in excess of the powers vested in them. But, welcome as a technical defeat would be, a defeat on the merits would be still better; and we think that we have shown sufficient reason why the Bill deserves this latter fate.

ICE-YACHTING IN AMERICA.

ICE-BOATING is the king of American winter sports. To those who have never seen ice-boats the records of their achievements in the way of speed read like the wildest dreams of Jules Verne, and a description of the sport of sailing on one sounds like the ravings of a lunatic. By him who has mounted the windward runner of one of these skeleton craft and felt her suddenly rush forward over the ice, while the swirling blast heeled her over until he was lifted high into the air and felt as if he could by loosening his hold of the shrouds swing far off into the measureless air, the sensations are never to be forgotten. Now the boat, fanned by a moderate breeze forward of her beam, glides peacefully and smoothly along the dark surface of the ice. Now she is put about, and with a strong wind on her quarter, she dashes madly forward. The black ice, with the bubbles of the water underneath clearly visible, and the cracks here and there, becomes a dark, gleaming mass, silvered over with lines of flying white. The iron runners whisper a humming song as they skim over the ice. Now she strikes a windrow and the scales of white ice go flying in every direction. Now the wind is on the beam, and the boat "rears" until her windward runner is at an angle of 45°; and again she rights herself, and the man who stands upon the runner-plank, clinging to the weather-stays, feels as if he had left half of himself up in the air from which he has just descended with such an indescribable motion. Now the sky darkens; clouds sweep up from the horizon; the wind comes tearing down the grey mountain-sides, bearing in its bosom that mad whirl of blinding white called a snow squall. The sharp blast strikes you in the face, and stings; the driving, pitiless snow beats into your eyes; the wind howls and whistles through the wire rigging, striking it into music that has all the wild dissonance of the Æolian harp. The stricken craft starts and shivers through all her timbers, and bounds forward into the midst of all the strife and writhing of snow and wind, and you are swept onward at top speed through the fathomless gloom. The wind roars out of the mainsail, blowing twenty-five miles an hour. Yonder comes the Albany express train, thundering along the river-side fifty miles an hour. The engineer may throw open his throttle-valve, and send his engine to its greatest speed. He can manage seventy miles an hour, and the train rocks and reels and roars over the steel rails. But you are gliding in an enchanted land. As steadily and as easily and as silently as yonder bird you skim along, and even the mighty steam-engine falls behind; for are you not on an ice-boat? And seventy miles an hour becomes a gentle pace beside your wondrous flights at the rate of eighty and even ninety!

Before going further into an account of this marvellous sport, it is natural to inquire what is an ice-boat? Makeshifts have been attempted both in America and elsewhere (we believe) by help of cutter-yachts of small size shod along the keel with steel runners. These, however, are clumsy and inartistic devices. The true ice-boat is a thing by itself. Englishmen have looked with astonishment and distrust upon the American trotting-waggon, with its light body and web-like running gear. What should we say to a yacht whose total weight was 850 pounds? It seems incredible, yet such is the weight of an ice-yacht measuring fifty feet over all. She consists of only a few slender, but strong timbers, sitting close to the ice and looking for all the world like a huge water spider, with a sail on her back. The chief timbers of an ice-yacht are arranged in the form of a letter T. The perpendicular line of the letter represents the centre timber, which runs from the foot of the mast to the stern of the boat. The horizontal line of the letter represents the runner-plank, on each end of which is an iron runner very much like a large skate. Indeed, it is usually called a runner-skate. On the top of the runner-plank is the mast-bench, in which the mast is stepped. From the stern end of the centre timber side rails run diagonally to points about halfway between the mast and the ends of the runner-plank. One or two braces cross the centre timber from one side rail to the other. Mortised into the forward end of the centre timber is the heel of the bowsprit. In order to get an idea of the proportions of an ice-yacht we here give the dimensions of a good-sized boat that sails on the Hudson:—Length of centre timber, 26 feet 9 inches; length of runner-plank, 19 feet 3½ inches; length over all, 50 feet 10 inches; sail area, 538½ square feet; requisite thickness of ice for sailing, 4 inches; cost of building, $450 (about 90*l.*).

We have purposely omitted three of the main parts of the hull of an ice-yacht. These are the runners and the rudder. The runners are fastened between chocks of white oak by an iron bolt, which acts as a pivot, allowing the runner-skates free play up and down like a rocker. This is, of course, very necessary in passing over uneven spots in the ice. A rubber spring is frequently inserted over the skate to ease the jolting. The runner-skate is made of white oak and is shod with iron. The whole contrivance looks much like the profile of a foot with a skate on it. The curve in front is high to admit of easy passage over rough spots. The iron is bevelled, and must be quite sharp. All first-class yachts have two sets of runners, one very sharp for smooth ice and strong winds, the other somewhat duller for rough or soft ice and light winds. The boat is steered by a rudder-skate. This is a runner, like the others, set on the end of a rudder-post and turned by a tiller, as in a water-boat. This skate must be very sharp, in order to take a good hold on the ice. The boat has a small cockpit—or box, as it is called—for the accommodation of the helmsman. This completes the hull, which, it will be seen at once, is a mere skeleton. The timbers are usually of white pine, ash, or spruce, and may be oiled, decorated, or mounted with nickel plate and brass trimmings, according to the owner's taste and means. The rig is usually that of a sloop-jib and mainsail, though the cat-rig, consisting of mainsail alone, is not uncommon. The lateen rig has been tried with success, but the sloop rig maintains its position as the favourite. The standing rigging is generally constructed of the best wire rope, and the running rigging is made as simple as possible. The appearance of one of these boats is much like that of a catamaran. The skeleton-like construction of the hull, the smallness of the deck-room, the low position of the bowsprit, and its utter want of "steve" (or lift), all combine to give the boat this appearance. The jib is very wide and runs far out in front, the hoist of the gaff at the peak is knowing, and the boom projects aft in a significant manner. The whole cut and build of the boat makes her look like just what she is—a racing-machine pure and simple. The expert yachtsman, who had never seen an ice-boat before, would, at the first glance, decide that one of these vessels had light heels.

From what has been said of an ice-boat's speed it may be inferred that accidents are numerous. Such, however, is not the case. At the present time so great is the skill of ice-yachtsmen that a mishap of any kind worse than a frost-bite is rare. The sailing of an ice-yacht is totally different from that of an ordinary water-craft. The best sailor who ever manned a wheel would find himself at a loss on an ice-boat until he had learned her peculiarities. Her sheets are always hauled in and her mainsail trimmed flat aft. If the wind is on the beam and is so strong as to make her slide sideways or "rear up" too much, the boom is sometimes let off a foot or two. The steering of an ice-boat is a novelty to an old sailor. She minds her helm so easily, and the helm itself is so easily turned, that at first one is filled with wonder; yet when one remembers that there is a rudder ploughing through heavy, opposing masses of water, but only a hard, sharp piece of iron gliding over a surface of perfect smoothness, it does not seem so strange after all. The helmsman then needs a cool head. Too sudden a twist of the tiller, while flying over the ice, will spin an ice-boat round almost on her own centre, and will probably result in hurling the crew off into space. Steering among obstacles, such as hummocks or cracks, requires the greatest care. First the boat is headed so as to spill (or lose the wind, and then she is run across the crack at right angles so that both runners will go over it at once. The speed of an ice-boat makes it necessary in cases of emergency to have a way of stopping her quickly. Of course she can be stopped, and generally is, by running her into the wind's eye. She can be stopped suddenly by luffing into the wind and then turning the rudder-skate straight across the stern, when it scrapes the ice and acts as a brake. An ice-boat, going at an ordinary rate of speed, can thus be stopped in twice her own length. This method is a great strain on the boat, and is employed only in cases of great need. An ice-yacht is anchored offshore by heading her into the wind, loosening the jib-sheets, and turning the rudder crosswise. To start an ice-yacht from this position, the jib sheet is hauled in, the stern swung round, and she is pushed ahead until the sails fill. The helmsman is the only person who occupies the box or cockpit. The crew stand on the windward runner, and balance themselves by holding the shrouds. This keeps the windward side down, and relieves the lee runner of some of the strain. Of course when the wind is high she needs more weight in the box to keep the rudder well down on the ice and prevent her from sliding to leeward. Ice-boats sometimes capsize, but the motion is very easy, and the crew are dropped off on the ice very quietly. An ice-boat often runs considerable distance on her lee runner and rudder. She is blown into this position by very heavy wind, and when she elevates her bow in this way, she is said to "rear up." A clever sailor can keep her poised so for some time. Of course she must be eased, she will go over. There are two ways of easing her. If beating to windward, she may be righted by luffing, as an ordinary water-boat would be. If running with the wind, she may be eased by paying off the sheet. Then the windward runner sweeps down and the man who stands on it, as it drops out of the air while he is tearing forward at an enormous speed, learns that there are more things in heaven and earth than were dreamed of in his philosophy. The boat will occasionally run upon thin ice and break it, but this is not a serious matter. The lee runner cuts through the ice, and stops her headway, and she then upsets before her stern off the sound ice. The season for this sport, unhappily for those who love it, is usually very short. Sixteen good days in the course of the winter form an ordinary season. The past winter was exceptionally good, and the ice-boats held high carnival on the Hudson and Shrewsbury rivers all the winter. The yachtsman's costume is by no means picturesque, but it is serviceable. He wears a leather coat or several cardigan jackets under a heavy pea-jacket or sealskin; his trousers are tied round the ankles or else tucked into the legs of woollen hose; he wears linen drawers over woollen ones; and he has a good pair of "arctics" on his feet and a fur cap pulled down over his ears. When snow is flying he has fine wire goggles over his eyes, and a wire covering for his mouth. In spite of all this, the ice-yachtsman sometimes suffers from frost-bites. He always wonders how he got them; for, in the excitement and wild excitement of sailing, he never felt cold for a single moment.

There is one other point in the sailing of an ice-boat; but it must consider it in connexion with her speed. This speed is simply marvellous; and, to those who have never seen an ice-boat dart away and shrink to a speck on the horizon in a few minutes, it is wholly incredible. Yet the facts exist. On February 12, 1879, the Lucille, owned by Captain Winslow, sailed from Poughkeepsie to New Hamburg, a distance of nine miles, in seven minutes and ten seconds. The Snow Flake, which is 50 feet 10 inches long, has made the distance in seven minutes. In 1882 the Haze did the same thing, and at one point in her flight made two miles in one minute. In 1879 the Comet, Phantom, Zephyr, and Magic sailed in company ten miles in 15 minutes, and most of the time so great was the wind that the windward runners of the boats were elevated at an angle of 45°. A gentleman residing at Poughkeepsie wished to speak with his brother who had started in a train for New York. He sped into his ice-boat, soon passed the train, and was on the platform of the station at Newburg when the train dashed up. The very names of the boats suggest swiftness. There are the Hurricane, Arctic, Hail, Restless, Snow Bird, Æolus, Phantom, Avalanche, Jack Frost, Zig-Zag, Whiz, and Icicle among the flyers on the Hudson.

Now how are we to account for this speed? Several facts must be noticed. In the first place, we must take into account the very small friction of the vessel on the ice. Moreover, such heat as is generated by this friction is at once absorbed by the ice. Again, the ice-boat never makes leeway except in very high winds. If put directly before the wind, she will, of course, sail no faster than the wind blows. If it is a breeze of fifteen miles an hour, the boat will sail at that rate. The peculi phenomenon of running out of the wind when sailing free sometimes occurs when the wind is gusty. A sudden blast drives the boat ahead, and then there is a lull, when, for a moment, the boat runs faster than the wind, and consequently her sails flap idly for want of the breeze, which has been left behind. The ice-boat's better course is with the wind on the beam, because thus she constantly has the full force of the breeze exerted on her sails and increasing her speed. Moreover, the ice-boat always tacks in going to leeward as well as to windward. The greatest possible speed can be got out of her when she is sailing with the wind on her quarter. On this course she has a constant forward push on her sails, and, as she goes diagonally along the track of the wind, she is less retarded by the resistance of the air than on any other course. Hence an ice-boat in sailing ten miles to the southward with a northerly wind will take a zig-zag course, running alternately to the south-east and south-west, and will reach her destination very much more quickly than by sailing a direct course. This is probably the only case in which a straight line is not the shortest distance between two points. The greatest speed of ice-boats is not recorded, because it always occurs when no one is expecting it. The boat very seldom sails in a straight line for even a mile. In running the nine miles from Poughkeepsie to New Hamburg an ice-boat, on her tortuous course, sails far more than the actual distance between the two places. When working to windward, which is her worst course, she will make from ten to fifteen miles an hour. When beating to leeward, as it is called, or sailing with the wind abeam, she goes at times at the rate of from eighty to one hundred miles an hour. And the man who has never been in an ice-boat before finds that his sensations are of a nature beyond the power of words to describe.

RADICAL SINCERITY.

IT is stated that the Sheffield Radical Club, "deploring the factious opposition of the Conservatives, receives with enthusiasm the announcement that the Hon. Bernard Coleridge [who is the second Liberal candidate for rejection after the Dissolution in that town] is a sincere Radical." For the present we have little to do directly with the Hon. Bernard Coleridge. From some remarks of Mr. Coleridge, which were reported a short time ago, we think we can, as an ingenious Frenchman once remarked, promise him sensations some of these days when he becomes a little more prominent as a politician. At present he is only a political embryo. But the phrase "sincere Radical" is worth a few comments. Is there such a thing as a sincere Radical? Perhaps; but after last Monday night there was some excuse for thinking that, except Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Labouchere, and somebody else (was it not Mr. Passmore Edwards?) he is not to be looked for in the House of Commons. On that day Sir Wilfrid, as everybody who reads his newspaper knows, made a passionate requisition of the blood of Teb at Mr. Gladstone's hands. We do not agree with Sir Wilfrid Lawson generally; but we, in common with every reasonable man who speaks what he thinks, admit that ad hominem Sir Wilfrid's argument was unanswerable. That, however, is not the point. The point lies in the conclusion of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's speech. The Radicals, said the melancholy member for merry Carlisle, were "Radicals only in name." They had "changed their nature"; they were the "war-at-any-price party"; "the guilt and responsibility of all this work rested more heavily on them than on any one else." Alas! it was no use. Of all the bold Radicals who sit below the gangway, nobody joined the dauntless three.

And yet Sir Wilfrid might have made his complaint even more personal and more cogent. Where was Mr. Bright? Could Mr. Bright have had a nobler text than the battle of Teb? Will not the ghosts of Osman Digna's spearmen dance round him some day or night, and sing their Sabbath notes with feeble voice, asking him why they are to be less honoured than the former enemies of England, on whom he has dropped his tear, why they are to be left tearless, and whether the omission arises from the fact that they were not enemies of England at all? Lord Randolph Churchill says that Mr. Bright "looked in at the door and fled away"; if so, it was wisely done, if not well. Even the gunners at Alexandria got a speech from Mr. Bright, and why not the Arabs? Where, too, was the Reverend Mr. Richard, the joy and pride of the Peace and Liberation Societies, the chosen vessel who pours indignation alike on bishops and bombardiers? He was there—silent. Where was Mr. Bryce, who demonstrated to his own satisfaction in the Egyptian debate that we had absolutely no business in the Soudan at all, and that to have relieved Sinkat would be wicked? Absent or silent. Where was Mr. Waddy, who held the same ingenious language on the same occasion? Silent or absent. Where was the egregious Mr. Thomasson, who explained to his constituents that to kill men in order to prevent their killing other men was wicked, and to whom, therefore, the killing of men respecting whom there is no evidence to show that they were going to kill anybody must seem flagitious to an almost inconceivable degree. Perhaps Mr. Thomasson was explaining this to his constituents, and so could not come to support Sir Wilfrid. We do not say where was Mr. John Morley? For, with all Mr. Morley's ability, no one has ever been able to make out what his exact view of Egyptian affairs is. Nor do we say where was Mr. Jesse Collings? For Mr. Chamberlain is understood to be by no means a man of peace, and the valetaille in such cases always follow the master. But where were Mr. Burt and Mr. Broadhurst, who are supposed to regard military operations entirely from the waste-of-flesh-and-blood point of view, and to sit in Parliament purposely to represent that view? Where was the Parliamentary grex of Mr. Cheeson, the defenders of the universal nigger against everybody, and of everybody against England? Where were those who shrieked and howled over the Zulu War (which was engaged in flatly against the orders of the late Government) and raged over the Afghan War (which was at any rate not waged in a matter wherein the Government waging it had denied all interest and responsibility)? Last year's snows, last year's birds'-nests and chicks, the smoke of last night's candle, the foam-balls on the river, all the pathetic images of the poets and romancical writers, are required here. Sir Wilfrid, even Sir Wilfrid only, is left to bear vocal testimony, and Mr. Labouchere and Mr. Passmore Edwards silently and sadly assent to him, but the others—where are they? The King of Hamath and the King of Arpad and the King of the City of Sepharvaim did not fail more signally to respond to their names than did the ornaments of the Radical party on this occasion.

This is undoubtedly a lamentable state of things. Lord Randolph Churchill, who is good at terse and decisive expositions of the phenomena which present themselves to him, explains it by saying that "the Radical party is a humbug." This phrase, like that other and more famous one of Mr. Bumble's, which perhaps suggested it, may grieve the nice political philosopher by its appearance of too striking and sweeping generalization. Indeed it can only be accepted with some important modifications. It is with pleasure that the man of true generosity can instance Mr. Chamberlain as an exception. Mr. Chamberlain is what is called in the vernacular "down on his luck" just now. He has in the most workmanlike manner, and off his own bat, lost for the Government an important seat by a crushing majority, and his Shipping Bill seems to have brought a hornet's nest about his ears. Let it therefore be cheerfully admitted that Mr. Chamberlain (who surely is no mean part of the Radical party) is not a humbug. His address in another world will not be the hypocrites' quarter of the Inferno. Mr. Chamberlain renouncing allegiance to the Marquess of Hartington, Mr. Chamberlain denouncing the owners of that particular description of property which he does not happen to possess largely, Mr. Chamberlain bringing actions against the Times and the Observer—all these were interesting sights, but none of those acts was the act of a humbug. Still Mr. Chamberlain is not all the Radical party, and perhaps Lord Randolph was thinking rather of the unofficial, independent, below-the-gangway sort of Radical than of the Radical glorified and Windsor-uniformed. With this limitation, it must be mournfully confessed that the events of Monday do somewhat bear out his proposition. It is almost impossible to exhaust the list of aspects under which this Egyptian affair must be horrible and hideous and heart-rending to the Radical, if he is not a humbug. The expense of it ought to make each particular hair of economists like Mr. Rylands and Mr. Dillwyn stand erect. The blood shed ought, as has been said, to make Mr. Bright and Mr. Richard see all things in crimson until they have liberated their souls by protest and a vote or two. Then there is the winking at the slave-trade to horrify the doctrinaire Radical, and the paltering with polygamous and infidel Mahdis to shock the pious and moral Radical, and the shooting down of Soudanese who are confessedly rising against their oppressors to send the Mazzinian Radical into fits, and the dreadful Cromwellian conduct of Mr. Clifford Lloyd towards the Egyptian elected of the people to make the self-government Radical wring his hands. And yet here are the representatives of all these crotchets—men of great moral stature, each of whom has flourished his particular Radical crotchet like a weaver's beam in the face of the world for years, sitting quietly by while Mr. Gladstone tramples all their crotchets at once under foot. Surely the member for Woodstock is excusable if he says in his haste that the Radical party is a humbug.

This, it is true, would be a bad thing, and it would put Mr. Bernard Coleridge in a position scarcely less painful and anomalous than that of the unforgotten Partridge. For, if the Radical party is a humbug, the members of that party must be humbugs; and therefore Mr. Bernard Coleridge's signalement of a sincere Radical answers to nothing in nature, and Mr. Bernard Coleridge himself must be non-existent. This is a hideous and inhuman conclusion, and must be avoided if possible. It may perhaps be best avoided by supposing that each Radical for himself, and the Radical party generally, holds as a first principle, desertion of which would be apostasy, that the Radical party, or the party most favourable to Radicals, must be kept in office at all hazards; secondly, and as pious opinions merely, that war is wrong, that the slave-trade is wrong, that it is wicked to use violence to an aborigine, that the elected of the people are sacrosanct and omnipotent, that prestige is an abomination, &c. These latter pious opinions he uses to get himself into Parliament and into public notice, just as he might use a carriage to get to the hustings. But, if the carriage showed signs of breaking down, he would not hesitate to get out of it and into another; and, if the doctrine is inconvenient at the moment, he does not hesitate to put it into his pocket. Perhaps this does not mend the matter much; and the plain man, with his brutal plainness, will come round to Lord Randolph's opinion after all. In that case Mr. Bernard Coleridge had better drop his sincerity and stick to his Radicalism. After all, it is the easier of the two to stick to; for, as no man knows exactly what Radicalism is, except a general jealousy of a man's betters, it is very difficult to convict him of being false to it. At any rate, we now know that, unless the insignificant minority represented by Sir Wilfrid and his companions is right, and the great silent majority, ranging from Mr. Bright to Mr. Jesse Collings, is wrong, there are several propositions, hitherto thought Radical axioms, which a man may be a good Radical and yet deny. Even the dauntless three are not altogether free from the charge of giving countenance to this; for, unless we deceive ourselves, they all gave Mr. Gladstone their vote the other day when consistency, if not sincerity, certainly seemed to demand, to say the least, abstention. So hard is it for a Radical to keep his way in these troublous times. Indeed, the incident of Monday seems to show that the present Radical party is of one opinion with Lord Granville as to the inexpediency of "the cross bench mind." What is wanted is a good comfortable mind (or substitute therefor) which will let its owner vote straight on every occasion, and give him no trouble when he roars like a bull of Bashan at Lord Beaconsfield for killing Afghans, and sits in perfect silence while Mr. Gladstone kills Arabs. To the happy man who has such a mind (or such a substitute therefor) Radical sincerity means a sincere desire to see and to keep Radicals in power, and in this respect, with all due deference to Lord Randolph Churchill, we are ready to maintain that the Radical party is not a humbug.

MACHIAVELLI.

IT is not unnatural that the appearance of a complete English translation of his works, following close on the completed English version of Villari's Machiavelli and his Times, should lead a writer in the Fortnightly Review to propound his estimate of the great Florentine statesman and diplomatist. The subject has more than once been handled in our own columns, but it is at once so many-sided and so suggestive that there is still room, without traversing old ground, for reviewing some of the salient points of the long-standing controversy as to the true meaning and character of his teaching, especially in the much praised and much inculpated treatise by which he is chiefly known. Mr. Willert is unquestionably correct in pointing out that any judgment on his writings must be at best imperfect which ignores "the conditions under which he wrote, the circumstances which inspired him, and the age which he addressed." At the same time, while these considerations may largely affect our ethical verdict on the man himself, and to a certain extent modify our interpretation of the drift of his writings, it still remains true that he lays down certain broad and comprehensive principles of government, which have an independent value of their own for good or for evil, and must directly control, in one direction or the other, the policy of any ruler who accepts their guidance. It cannot certainly be affirmed in a moral sense that Machiavelli was felix opportunitate ortus. In the collapse or decomposition of the traditional Christian system, which for a thousand years had shaped the destinies of Europe—supposed on one theory of prophetic exegesis to represent the Apocalyptic millennium—the intellectual brilliancy of the Renaissance period, which preceded the outbreak of the Reformation, cannot blind us to the darker side of the picture. The moral life of Europe, and notably of Italy, had sunk in the latter half of the fifteenth and the opening years of the sixteenth century to a degradation which only finds its counterpart in the seething corruption of the later Roman Empire. And that degradation was so far more shocking at once to the intellect and the heart, inasmuch as the question of the old Roman satirist, Quis custodiet custodes? had never been more terribly illustrated. The most conspicuous potentate in Italy, who was moreover still looked up to with reverence as de jure the supreme arbiter of the policy of Christian Europe, professed to speak in the name of a Divine power; he was the successor of Peter, and the Vicar of Christ. Yet Mr. Willert does not go at all beyond the mark in saying—what is more fully exhibited in Mr. Symonds's Renaissance in Italy—that "the Papacy had descended to the lowest depths of infamy. The fiercely avaricious and cruel Paul II. had been succeeded by Sixtus IV., who was steeped in bloodshed and diabolic lust; under Innocent VIII., more contemptible and scarcely less guilty, the imperial city became once more the asylum of murderers and robbers, till finally in Alexander VI. the Christian nations saw a monster who excelled in depravity the most hated names of the Pagan Empire seated on the throne of St. Peter." Machiavelli was three years old when Sixtus IV. was elected (in 1471); and Leo X., with whom in after life he was brought into personal contact, if a more decorous, was hardly a more respectable and not at all a more devout, representative of the supreme pastorate of Christendom. It is not difficult then to account for his aversion to the Catholic hierarchy, and his frequent attacks on the Church and the Papal Curia. Of his "thoroughly irreligious nature" and hostility or indifference to Christianity, which, Mr. Willert says, "had even deeper roots," we may have occasion to speak presently. Meanwhile considerations of this kind, as Mr. Symonds observes, "are exculpations of the man, rather than justifications of his theory." It has indeed been urged with epigrammatic ingenuity that he essayed to teach Pagan virtues to an age which was disposed only to emulate Pagan vices; but the fundamental principle underlying equally, as Hallam and Villari rightly point out, both the Discorsi and the Principe—that the end justifies the means—is not recognized as a virtue in any ethical code, Pagan or Christian, unless we accept as just Pascal's attribution of it to the Jesuits. To cite Hallam's summary of his central doctrine, "Good faith, justice, clemency, religion should be ever in the mouth of the ideal ruler; but he must learn not to fear the discredit of any actions which he finds necessary to preserve his power." There was much no doubt in the circumstances of his age and country to explain this teaching, but after all, as the same great writer insists, "the best palliation of this, and of what else has been justly censured in Machiavelli, is to be derived from his life and times."

A very brief sketch of Machiavelli's life is all we can find room for here. Born in 1469, he was twenty-five years old when Piero de' Medici fled and Charles VIII. entered Florence. With Savonarola's ideal of a theocratic Republic, dominated by Christian, not to say Puritan, influences, he had less than no sympathy, though he was a strong Republican. But after the prophet's death he entered into public life, and from 1498 spent fourteen years in the service of the State, during which period he went on an embassy to Rome, where he witnessed the election of Pius III. and formed his opinion of "those rascally priests," to whose evil example he attributed the ruin of faith and morality in Italy. In 1512 the Medici were restored, and Machiavelli not only at once submitted, but courted office under the restored despotism, though he failed to obtain it. He imputes in the Discorsi the overthrow of the Republican constitution to the narrow scrupulosity of Soderini, as before of Savonarola, in not destroying "the sons of Brutus"—i.e. the whole Medici stock—while he had the opportunity, and violating the Constitution, in what we may call a Cromwellian fashion, in order to preserve it, "not sufficiently considering that the means must be judged by the ends for which they are employed." It was during this period of enforced retirement from public life that he wrote both the Discorsi and the Principe. He has been severely blamed for seeking office under the Medici, but we quite agree with Mr. Willert here that, if his conduct was not exactly magnanimous, it cannot fairly be called reprehensible. Certainly in our own day a man who thought a Republic the best form of government, and had openly avowed his preference, would not be held blameworthy on that account for taking office under a monarchy. Machiavelli may have been, and probably was, convinced by experience that a Republic was at that time impossible in Florence; he certainly held that a united Italy, which he desired to see, was impossible except under a monarchy. And he might therefore without inconsistency think it legitimate, and even the duty of a good citizen, to serve his country to the best of his power under the existing form of government, whatever it might happen to be. He was latterly employed in some small ways by Leo X., till a fresh conspiracy of the Soderini again threw suspicion upon him, and he died in 1527, only a month after the second expulsion of the Medici and restoration of liberty to Florence, which might have opened to him a prospect of return to the public service. This forced inaction was a bitter and chronic disappointment to him. "I wish," he says, "my lords, the Medici, would set me to work, were it only to roll a stone; for if I did not then win their favour, I should only have myself to blame." His opinions however were evidently more influenced by the atmosphere he breathed than by his own personal antecedents. He had imbibed a thoroughly cynical estimate of human nature—the extreme antithesis of Rousseau's paradoxical optimism—and he accordingly lays it down as a first principle of government, that all men are bad, and will only act rightly under compulsion. This also partly explains his conviction that a monarchy, which would rule with a strong hand, offered the sole hope for the salvation of Italy, and its deliverance from the yoke of the foreign oppressor; and here it is obvious to remark that the recent history of both Italy and Germany has gone far to justify his foresight. There is certainly no ground for imagining that he desired in the Principe to lure the Medici into a tyrannical policy which would bring about their downfall. He has remarked, not in the Principe but the Discorsi, that States are seldom formed or reformed except by one man. But while there is no reason for assuming any sinister motive of this kind in the composition of his treatises, on the art rather than the science of government, and while it has become an acknowledged truism that "Machiavellism existed before Machiavelli"—witness such rulers as Gian Galeazzo, Louis XI., Ferdinand the Catholic, and the Venetian Council—it is not the less true that he was the first in modern times to formulate a system of statecraft which, to say the very least, is avowedly unmoral, in presupposing the incurable corruption of mankind at large, in placing force and fraud among the legitimate means of gaining high political ends, and in making success the sole ultimate standard and test of permissible conduct. And the fact that many previous rulers had, more or less consciously, acted on the maxims he has systematized, does not suffice to reconcile us to a political code, which both explains and justifies their conduct. As Mr. Willert justly observes, "though virtuous practice is a better incentive to morality than virtuous precept, vice formulated in maxims is more offensive to the moral sense, and more corrupting than vicious example." We do not altogether agree with him on another point. He admits that no book has been more diligently studied by rulers and statesmen than was the Principe in the sixteenth century, but he does not think it greatly influenced their conduct; "The policy of Catherine de' Medici was not more Machiavellian than that of Louis XI., nor did Philip II. or Alva, Elizabeth or Cecil, surpass Ferdinand the Catholic or Richard III. in unscrupulous pursuit of the objects of their ambition.' Perhaps not, but they showed more skill in their method of pursuing them. It is not unnatural, if it is partly unjust, that the author should have become, in Mr. Symonds's words, "the scapegoat of great political crimes," the more so as he expressly excludes from his chapter "On those who have attained the sovereignty by crimes," such despots as have had the subtlety to cloak their violence, and have thus escaped odium. He even carefully explains that it was his failure in this prudence, not his cruelty, which secured a place in the black list for Oliverotto da Fermo, who gained the lordship of the city by murdering his uncle and benefactor and all the principal citizens at a banquet to which he had invited them. It may even be said that Cæsar Borgia had sat for the picture of his ideal "Prince," and Alexander VI., who "never did anything else but deceive men,' is pointedly extolled as a model of successful hypocrisy. The received view, which finds expression both in Shakspeare and Marlowe, may have been an exaggerated one, but it is not wonderful that for upwards of two centuries the word "Machiavellian" should have retained the sort of evil connotation which Goethe has since taught us to affix to "Mephistophelian."

But it would be a mistake to confine the influence of Machiavelli's teaching to the statesmen of the sixteenth century. Hallam indeed mentions that in the future, as the tide of democracy advances, the value of the Discorsi, as a political manual, will be augmented. Meanwhile the most conspicuous political ruler of the eighteenth century, one of the ablest and most unscrupulous the world has ever seen, composed in early life a book against the Principe, which he had therefore carefully studied. But it will be enough to refer to the recent book on Frederick II. by the Duke of Broglie to show—what the masterful apology of Carlyle very imperfectly conceals—how closely his own policy was modelled upon it. And if we admit the authenticity of the Matinées Royales, which there is really no plausible ground for disputing, and which, even supposing the work to be spurious, does little more than formulate the axioms avowed in his correspondence, now made public, and exemplified in his habitual policy, the resemblance becomes still more striking. Its opening precept reads like a quotation from the Principe: "Take care not to act any longer as a child, and understand once for all that in matters of government one takes all one can, and never restores but when one is obliged." Compare with this the following maxim from the Principe: "A prudent ruler cannot nor ought not to keep faith, when to do so is against his interests, and when the reasons which led him to engage himself no longer exist. It is right to appear to be just, honourable, humane, pious, and loyal, and to be so, but to be always prepared to lay these virtues aside, when they are likely to be hurtful." At the same time "a prudent prince will always find colourable pretexts for breaking his word," and that is just what Frederick always did. Machiavelli again insists strongly on the importance of a reputation for piety, and the same lesson is taught in the Matinées—with the supplement that, "if (in our policy) we always remember that we are Christians, all is lost, and we shall always be duped." There is a curious similarity again between some of the recorded maxims of the first Napoleon and those in the Principe, as e.g. in what he said to Sir H. Keating at St. Helena; "The less kings wish to grant liberty to their subjects the more they must speak to them about it. I do not wish it any more than they do, you may be sure. I know well that nowadays it requires a rod of iron to rule men, but it must be gilded, and we must make them believe, when we strike that they direct the blow themselves. It is necessary always to talk of liberty, equality, justice, and disinterestedness, but never to grant any liberty at all." And Machiavelli had one important point in common with both the Prussian and the French despot. Frederick was certainly an unbeliever; Napoleon, to say the least, sat very loosely to any form of religious belief. And Mr. Willert is probably right in maintaining that Machiavelli's very explicable hatred and contempt for the corrupt Catholicism he saw around him had a deeper root in antipathy to Christianity altogether. Now in our own day there have been men of the highest principle and character, like the late J. S. Mill, who have openly repudiated all theological beliefs, but in the fifteenth or sixteenth century it was hardly possible for a man thus absolutely to break with all the religious traditions of the past, and yet retain what Strauss calls "the moral contents of Christianity." The dogmas and the ethics were so indissolubly identified in the conscience of the Christian world that to abandon one was in fact to abandon both. And accordingly those who were foremost in the revival of Pagan learning, men like Politian, were also foremost in the revival of Pagan vice. But there was a special reason, over and above the Pagan atmosphere of the Renaissance into which he was born, and his experience of the corruptions of the hierarchy and the Court of Rome, why Machiavelli should recoil from Christianity itself. He was by nature a statesman and diplomatist, perhaps also, as Mr. Willert thinks, of an irreligious—anyhow of a non-religious—nature. To him patriotism was the supreme type of virtue, as he conceived of it, and the supreme end of life. And patriotism, as he is never tired of reminding his readers, held this same pre-eminence in the ethical systems of ancient Greece and Rome. But it did not, and could not, hold the same position in the Christian standard of moral excellence, partly because it is framed primarily with a view to the future life, partly because it consecrates and enforces the claims of the individual conscience, which may, and sometimes do, directly conflict with the absolute claim of the State, as was very soon exemplified in the relations of the early Christians to the Roman Empire. But to a mind like Machiavelli's the conflict of the private conscience with the paramount obligation of civil allegiance would appear equally unmeaning and repulsive. He could tolerate no rival near the throne, and would have said, in the words of the Prussian Matinées, "If we are to remember that we are Christians, all is lost." In point of fact he does again and again insist on this fundamental contrast of Pagan and Christian ethics in the Discorsi, where religion is always treated, not as a question of truth, but an engine of statecraft. The interest of the State demands an undivided allegiance, and no moral scruples can be allowed to stop the way. It is true indeed that Machiavelli's works were first published, after his death, at Rome and with a Papal imprimatur. But the Papacy of that day had a keener eye for such counsels as might best subserve its political interests in this world than for the ethical purity which might be held most conducive to spiritual blessings in the next. And it was not long before the Jesuits, in the Catholic reaction which shortly followed, had gauged more accurately than Popes like Clement VII. the relations of Machiavelli's philosophy to the doctrine of the Church, though it is true that, while they bitterly denounced the immoral teaching of his Principe, and got it put upon the Index, they have often been charged with stealing a leaf out of the book.

THE BIRMINGHAM BOGEY.

THE action of the member for Brighton in facing the Caucus boldly has earned him a reputation at which he himself is doubtless ready to smile. Being a sensible man, who has some acquaintance with journalism and with practical politics, he knew perfectly well that there was nothing to be frightened about, and he went straight on his way without heeding the warnings of his friends. Those friends, or rather a few of them, told him in the press and elsewhere not to go forward; the Jabberwock was waiting to gobble up rash wanderers from the party fold: and any wight who got outside the boundary would be seen no more at St. Stephen's. We know the result. The Caucus emitted threatenings; they passed and published resolutions; they were imperative, scornful, playful, insinuating, by turns. And Mr. Marriott got a majority of fifteen hundred. Shrewd people have all along known that the fear of the Birmingham system was totally groundless; but the amazing self-assertion of the wire-pullers, their prompt remonstrances addressed to men who voted unsatisfactorily, their mysterious way of getting "resolutions" printed in newspapers all over the country, scared weak-kneed Liberals. Mr. Chamberlain made out that the "Hundreds" won sixty-seven boroughs at the last election, and he gained for himself much credit and influence by the assertion. But any one who had studied the political life of English towns from the inside knew that Mr. Chamberlain was wrong. The election was won by the aid of the Whigs, who believed in Lord Hartington's speeches, and thought that no violent legislation would be attempted. The Caucuses had quite a minor share in the work, and in cases where they made themselves at all offensive they were rebuffed. For example, in 1868 Greenwich returned two Liberals; in 1880 Greenwich had a very large Caucus in full working order, but the association presumed too much, and two Conservatives were returned.

At this time of day it may be worth while to see what a Caucus is, how it is organized, what kind of folk attend the meetings, and what real influence it has in any borough. The superstition that the community, or a majority of the community, elect the association should be exploded at once. As a rule some half-dozen of idle people, who have nothing particular to do in the evenings, meet together, and by their means a select few Liberals, perhaps a score, gather in a club-room. Then the orator of the party suggests that "an organization on the Birmingham model be formed for this borough." After that the work is charmingly simple. A general meeting of the party is called, and the original promoters at once take the lead and tell the audience what is to be done. To suppose that a great number of persons attend this preliminary meeting would imply little knowledge of "local" politics on the part of any one who held the supposition. When the Liverpool Caucus was formed there was a fairly strong meeting of the original Liberal Association, but we hardly know another case in which the Liberals showed any active interest in the affair. A few busybodies who must always be talking and fussing take the matter into their own hands, and a most imposing "Five Hundred" has before now been formed in a meeting attended by twenty-three parochial nonentities. The chairman suggests that those present should think of good men and true whose names may be placed on the list, and thus it often happens that retiring citizens who dislike the worry of meetings are requested to consider themselves as members of a Caucus before any intimation has reached them of the intention to confer such an honour. Those who are honoured in absence have, of course, the option of refusal: but most of them care so little one way or the other that their names stay on the roll, and they are regarded as aiding the force of a body which is to terrorize the Tories. Subscriptions are collected; the "wards" are marked out; and the glory of composing and posting circulars is within reach of the very inner circle. When nothing of an exciting nature is going on the meetings are scarcely attended at all, and the secretary fulminates in the name of the party. Even when something of local interest comes in question the great lazy public, that hates boredom and loves the evening's leisure, will rarely do anything to swell the gathering, and the energetic "originals" have the place to themselves. It may be said, by the way, that some time ago the Newcastle Caucus was about to inflict very serious punishment on Mr. Cowen. Various centres were named for meetings; but a Correspondent who strolled round from room to room said that "In one place I found a chairman, and no meeting; in another I found a chair, and no chairman. The chair was in possession of the room." When this particular outburst of wrath was levelled at the rebellious Mr. Cowen, no more than one hundred men in all were brought together.

If the truth had only been known during the spring of 1878, it would have been found that the columns of Caucus resolutions published in the London papers were mostly passed by scanty knots of obscure persons, whose real importance was out of all proportion to the noise they made. But many Parliamentary men took the clamour seriously; the people who knew the real state of the case had no chance of speaking out, or were interested in keeping quiet, and the farce went on. We do not say that intelligent Englishmen are not interested in the affairs of the nation; on the contrary, in a quiet way, and among their own private friends, a portion of their every-day talk is always political. But intelligent men detest the pettiness, the vulgarity, the childish squabbles of the "Ward" meetings, and, if they happen out of curiosity to attend once, they do not often care to repeat the experience. To hear Jones, the Extremist, declaring against "the haughty ways of them what lives at the nobs' end of the town"; to hear the follower of Mr. Bradlaugh announce that he and his pears "will have nothin' to do with one of the milk-and-water Whigs, as you want to foist on us," is not really an evening's pastime that a thoughtful man enjoys. A unanimous Caucus would be an impossibility. That very petty vanity which causes the active members to spout their little speeches and pass their little resolutions is fatal to peace. Ward squabbles with ward, artisan squabbles with tradesman, and nearly every meeting becomes, in the nature of things, a place of small recriminations, acrid personalities.

It may be asked, "What, then, is the real political power of a Caucus in an average borough?" The reply is, "None." The Birmingham Association is a really admirable machine, but it is only kept going by sheer force of money, and money alone. In an ordinary town there is little money forthcoming, unless the Liberal candidates can be bled, and this latter operation is, we are bound to say, very zealously attempted. But where there is no millionaire wirepuller, and no open-handed member to find the finance, the Caucus is a ludicrously feeble affair. In proof of this we have the fact that not one politician who has boldly defied the "Hundreds" has yet failed of support from the better men of his party. The reason for this phenomenon has already been indicated. The higher class of Liberals cannot bear the fussy futility of local gatherings; they despise the men who chatter and pose as authorities, and they keep out of the way. If a sound and respectable candidate chooses to say to the Caucus "I will have none of you," he at once draws the sympathy of all those who are most weighty in the constituency, and the Caucus passes resolutions in vain. For months before the Brighton election Mr. Marriott had been invited to explain his conduct, and several severe censures had been forwarded to him. Directly and indirectly he was informed that his seat was lost to him; yet, when the pinch came, the bullying of the Caucus told in his favour, and, although Liberals had every reason for supporting the Ministry at such a crisis, they went over in hundreds with the rebel. The lesson should be taken to heart by timid Liberals: they should learn that the sense of the constituencies can always be made to overbear the manœuvres of wirepullers.

MOUNTAINEERING.

IT is very often said that the Alps are exhausted, and unfortunately there is some truth in this highly figurative expression, which suggests to many people the idea that the wrong participle has been used. Indeed for a considerable time past the Alpine region has been, if not exhausted, in a condition closely resembling exhaustion. Now all seems to be over. Possibly it may yet remain for fortunate explorers to find second routes to the summits of a few peaks, and in some cases it may be doubtful whether the most trying route to the summit has been discovered; but, generally speaking, mountains have been ascended by the right way and by the wrong, or by several ways; have been "colled" (a term of art; the verb signifying to go up one side and down another); and can offer naught now to the most practical surveyor, while each sattel, col, or brèche has been crossed from the north to the south, from the south to the north, or from any other point of the compass to its corresponding opposite. The members of the Alpine Club, unfortunately for their own peace of mind, have not the slightest desire for repose, and are, if possible, more energetic than ever; and the institution to which they belong, so far from languishing (as they that the Alps are getting so terribly well known, is in an exceptionally flourishing condition. From a brief account of the proceedings of the Club given in the number of the Alpine Journal which has recently been published, it would appear that, despite the severe qualification required, the number of members has swelled so much as to suggest the desirability of fixing a limit.

In the same number which contains this remarkable proof of the success of the body which has been so much abused at home and so widely copied abroad, is a very interesting paper, in which the "exhausted" condition of the Alps is referred to, and at the end there is a record of travel which shows what is open to those who have on their hands plenty of time, and are in a position to undertake long and expensive journeys. The article mentioned is by Professor Bonney, F.R.S., whose term of office as President of the Club came to an end with the past year, and who, following the example of his predecessor, made, when official dissolution was nigh, a speech which is now given to the world. Professor Bonney, who is, as need hardly be said, a man of considerable scientific reputation, has ascended many peaks, and written about them passing well, and, as was to be expected, his farewell address is full of interesting matter, and shows how excellent a President the Club has lost. Amongst the subjects which he treats is the approaching destitution which causes so much alarm, and from his remarks it may be gathered that the victory of the ice-axe is now complete, and that the ascent of the Dent du Géant marked the end of the first era of mountain travel. Not unsuccessfully, however, does Professor Bonney attempt to conjure away the apprehensions which have been raised by the too complete success of climbers, and to prove that there may be plenty of enjoyment in the mountains yet. As will be presently shown, he is absolutely supported by fact in this, and though in one sense it may be said that the Alps are played out, there is not the slightest reason for thinking that people are getting tired of them, or are likely to get tired of them.

Before touching on this part of his subject, Professor Bonney refers to the dangers of mountaineering and to the necessity for attention to "the rules of the game" in Alpine climbing, and rather quaintly says that he "would venture to remind the more ardent members of" the "Club that life is a great opportunity not to be thrown away lightly." Professor Bonney proceeds to speak of the large amount of entrancing work which yet remains to be done on this by no means exhausted planet, referring to the attractions of the Caucasus, the virgin peaks in the Andes, and the intact state of the Himalayas and Hindu Koosh, and then goes on to argue, for the comfort of those who cannot journey far, that Alpine expeditions do not lose their charm because novelty is no longer to be hoped for. He speaks with his usual good sense on the subject, and demurs, as others have done before, to Mr. Ruskin's remarkable statement that the true beauty "of the Alps is to be seen only where all may see it; the child, the cripple, the man of grey hairs." With regard to Professor Bonney's excellent remarks respecting the abiding attractions of the Alps, it need only be said that facts plainly show him to be right. Although it is only quite lately that the final subjugation of the Alps has been completed, and that the two or three last fortresses have fallen, the range has practically been exhausted for some time. Years ago it was obvious that there was but little real novelty left, and that the great expeditions had, with comparatively few exceptions, become hackneyed. It certainly seemed then that the work of the Alpine Club was done, and that interest in the Alps would necessarily decline. But, as a matter of fact, it has not declined; on the contrary, it appears to have become greater. The Alpine Club has continued to increase and prosper, and the various clubs on the Continent which were founded in imitation of it have also prospered and number many members. Custom does not seem in any way to deprive the mountains of their charm, as it was naturally anticipated that it would; and as it is clear that "the Playground of Europe" has not in the least ceased to attract, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the sport carried on there is for the present—using that term in a very wide sense—not in the least likely to pall.

Of one form of that sport, indeed, it may safely be predicted that, so far as regards interest and excitement, it will not pall in the time of the present generation; but, unhappily, it can be followed by but very few. We mean mountaineering without guides, which, when undertaken by incompetent men, is as dangerous a folly as can be committed, but which, when undertaken by those who are fit for the work, is undoubtedly a very grand way of playing the game, to use Professor Bonney's expression. For some time past two or three highly-skilled amateurs, under the leadership of Mr. C. L. Pilkington, who is on a par with first-class guides, have been ascending peaks and crossing passes without any "professional aid," and apparently have been in no more danger than those who took with them on the mountains guides of good renown. Others may, and probably others will, follow in their footsteps; but it seems well-nigh certain that only a small number of men can ever be fit for work of this kind. It is not like other athletic work undertaken by Englishmen, which they practise from youth upwards. The amateur begins late—that is to say, late from an athlete's point of view—and has not anything like the same opportunities for acquiring skill that the Swiss has. Strength and power of endurance, and such practice as an amateur can get in the Alps, do not necessarily qualify him to do without guides. There must be that special aptitude which enables some men to acquire in a comparatively short time the skill which others take long to acquire; and, however assiduous and enterprising climbers may be, it is not likely that many amongst them will be able to attack peaks and passes with the just confidence which guides of the better class feel.

That some peaks and passes which formerly would have been thought all but hopeless can now be attached, if not with confidence, at least with a fair hope of success, has been made abundantly evident of late; but then they are, as a young cavalry officer once said of Calcutta, rather a long way from town. The Caucasus, it is true, cannot now be considered as very far off; but the loftier ranges, the Himalayas and the Andes, must be considered as somewhat distant, even when the method, borrowed from the astronomers, of treating space as time is strictly followed. Despite, however, the fact that a long and costly journey has to be made to reach either chain, and that a great deal of inconvenience, not to say suffering, has to be undergone when the chain is reached, some severe work has already been done in both of them by devoted pioneers seeking a land of promise not to be exhausted for several generations. Of Mr. Whymper's remarkable explorations in the Andes it is not necessary to speak, as they have several times been mentioned in our columns, and as a full account of them will, we presume, be published. It is worth noticing, however, as showing how determined and how able Mr. Whymper was, that Dr. Güssfeldt, an energetic traveller who has recently visited the Andes, has not achieved nearly so much as he did. In the Himalayas an astonishing series of ascents were made last year by Mr. W. W. Graham, who had previously gained distinction in the Alps, as he was the first Englishman who reached the summit of the Dent du Géant. Of his Himalayan expeditions there is an account in the Journal which, though brief, is fuller than any that has yet been published. From the short description given of his ascent of Kabru, 24,015 ft. high, it appears that he camped out at the enormous height of 18,500 ft., and that, in the latter part of the ascent, he had to make his way up an ice-slope covered with fresh snow, and to traverse an ice-arête with an absolute precipice of 2,000 ft. on one side. The Editor of the Journal points out that in this ascent the highest point ever before reached by man on the earth's surface was exceeded by 1,700 ft. Besides Kabru Mr. Graham climbed four great peaks, the lowest of which is 19,000 ft. high. These certainly are the most remarkable mountaineering achievements on record, and there is one very curious fact connected with them which may attract the attention of some who take no interest in the exploits of climbers. Neither Mr. Graham nor his guides felt the slightest inconvenience from rarefied air beyond "a very loud and perceptible beating of the heart"—a phenomenon not unknown to Alpine travellers at much more humble altitudes. Mr. Whymper and his guides, it will be remembered, suffered greatly from the thin air on the first ascent of Chimborazo, but afterwards got quite accustomed to it, and were little, if at all, weakened by it. These highly practical experiments tend to show, as so many practical experiments of an extremely different kind tend to show, that the human heart is a much tougher article than it has been innocently thought to be, and that those who considered that men could not walk up to great altitudes were much mistaken. It seems now clear that strong, well-trained men can ascend mountains which formerly would have been deemed impossible or all but impossible on account of the rarity of the air alone. There is, however, still a good deal to be learnt on the subject, and further experiments are desirable; but, unluckily, those who most ardently wish to make them are, for the most part, debarred from doing so. Many athletes who would gladly risk valvular disease cannot spare the time necessary for a journey to the Himalayas or the Andes; and the great expense of mountaineering in either range is a matter which few can afford to overlook. It may seem hard to devotees that mountaineering should approximate to the condition of other sports, and that, to enjoy the cream of it, money should be necessary; but fate has so willed it. Primeurs have to be paid for, and the finest kind of mountain climbing is, for the present, a luxury reserved for the rich.

SIGNOR SALVINI.

THE chorus of adulation with which Signor Salvini was greeted on his arrival in this country eight years ago has been somewhat modified since his reappearance; but the less impressionable critics must still heartily wish that the Italian tragedian were what his ardent admirers declare that he is. For the first night of his season at Covent Garden he chose Othello, and the choice was wise from the popular point of view. The earlier scenes of Signor Salvini's presentation of the Moor are and always have been wonderfully fine.

> I fetch my life and being
> From men of royal siege,

is Othello's proud declaration to his lieutenant, and in his bearing before the Duke and senators, and afterwards where he quells the riot in Cyprus, there is something truly regal about the Othello whose magnificent voice and eloquent gestures of command aid the idea of his proclaimed descent. But the more Signor Salvini impresses here, the more he falls off when he permits extravagant melodrama to supplant pure tragedy. Much has been written of Othello's fierce Oriental nature, but nothing at all has been said to reconcile Shakspeare's Othello with the frantic, hysterical, revengeful savage whom Signor Salvini depicts with such remarkable force. Poetry is the essence of all tragedy. When poetical feeling is lost, what was tragic becomes merely melodramatic; and can it be contended that in the scene of Desdemona's murder, and in the scenes which precede it, tragic dignity is maintained? Shakspeare drew another Moor—supposing that Shakspeare wrote Titus Andronicus—who would have acted more as Signor Salvini makes Othello act had that barbarian's heart been subjugated by love for a Desdemona. The noble mind of the gallant soldier could not be so degraded as the Italian player makes it. There is something appalling, as Shakspeare wrote, in the Moor's inflexible determination to do the dreadful act which he believes to be an act of justice, something infinitely more appalling than this running after his hapless wife, seizing her by the hair, dragging her to the bed, and there crushing out her life. There should be nothing revolting in tragedy, and this is revolting. The moans, sobs, and inarticulate cries by which Signor Salvini gives vent to his fury and distress are as unfitting as his shocking violence and brutality. A critic of high repute has declared that each person must be left to settle as he pleases "whether Shakspeare paints Othello as a fiery and sensual African, superficially modified by long contact with Europeans, or as one with a native chivalry towards woman"; but which, it may be asked, is the nobler view?—

> Once put out thy light,
> Thou cunning'st pattern of excelling nature,
> I know not where in that Promethean heat
> That can thy light relume. When I have pluck'd the rose
> I cannot give it vital growth again,
> It must needs wither: I'll smell it on the tree.
> (Kissing her.)
> Ah! balmy breath, that dost almost persuade > Justice to break her sword!

Surely these words are inconsistent with the furious attack which Othello makes upon Desdemona, giving due weight to the fact that his wrath is again aroused at the mention of Cassio. He had sentenced her to death. Knowing what he thought he knew, his irrevocable determination was taken, and justice, as he believed, was done. Desdemona was not killed, as Signor Salvini seems to show, to gratify a sudden access of revengeful fury. The actor's great means are, as it seems to us, sadly misused after he has once listened to Iago and, with a proneness to suspicion which is foreign to Othello's real nature, has permitted his jealousy to be aroused.

There are always such possibilities in Signor Salvini that his Lear was anxiously looked for, though the actor's lately published essay on his reading of the character is a somewhat disappointing production. It is to a great extent special pleading to prove that the view which it is most convenient for him to take is the right one to be taken. The old King, he declares, was a hale and hearty old man, in spite of his more than fourscore years. Lear, it is true, speaks of his intent to "unburthen'd crawl toward death," and this expression does not comport with the strong vitality which the actor defends and portrays. Arguments derived from the text of Shakspeare would have had more weight than the comments of that "highly trustworthy journal," as Signor Salvini calls it, the Progresso Italo-Americano, on the constitutions of old men who did not drink coffee at ten o'clock in the morning, but who breakfasted early on large slices of beef or lamb—why not of mutton, which is more nutritious in its mature state? It is, of course, impossible that so greatly accomplished an actor could be on the stage for the best part of four hours and not do much to justify his attempt at a character to which he has devoted keen and constant study throughout several years. There are many admirable points in his Lear; but the essentials of the character are missed. The critic already quoted on Signor Salvini's Othello, Mr. George Henry Lewes, noted "the deficiency of pathos in his acting." It is no new charge, therefore, and perhaps it is not surprising that his Lear, in which pathos is a first requisite, should fall short. To English ears, or to the ears of any one who is familiar with English, the Italian adaptation used at Covent Garden must sound lamentably poor, in spite of the music of Signor Salvini's beautiful voice. One can only guess how the actor, could he speak Shakspeare's language, would deliver some of the exquisitely simple lines which are here distorted. No translation could do justice to Shakspeare, but a better than this might be found or made. Nevertheless in this, were Lear within Signor Salvini's range of parts, a very much greater effect might be made than he is able to make. Perhaps no actor could succeed in showing that the stern punishment dealt out to Cordelia was a just reward for her answers, when Lear questions his daughters as to the love they bear him; but when later on Goneril has betrayed herself for the vile thing she is, and the father's curse falls upon her, it should be made plain that he has become helpless, that all other means have passed, and that an outraged father's last dreadful resource is only left him. There is, however, no sense of helplessness about the Lear, and he is therefore never pitiful. One feels yet more forcibly when the crowning stroke has come, and Regan has joined her sister in rejecting their father, that this is still the King, that there is a majesty in his resonant voice, a power of command in his gesture which are not to be resisted by these rebellious and unworthy children. Lear is not driven into the storm, the presage of which is so finely given in the short scene between Cornwall, Gloster, and the cruel sisters at the end of the second act, a scene here omitted. This Lear could assert his rights; and when the torrent and hurricane are beating on him, and he, haughtily braving the fury of the elements, stands on the bleak heath, there is no suggestion in the stalwart vigorous figure of the "poor, infirm, weak, and despised old man." Such tricks as that of running down to the footlights after the imaginary culprit, the elusive fox, whom he has set the Fool to arraign, are mere traps for applause, and in one case when it was forthcoming Signor Salvini returned after quitting the stage to bow acknowledgment, a proceeding not in accordance with that "aesthetic standpoint of representative art" to which Signor Salvini makes appeal in his essay. There is some tenderness in the last scene where Lear drags in the body of Cordelia; but here again true pathos is wanting, and though the idea of making Lear's death painless and gentle is in the spirit of the tragedy, the note is but feebly touched. Signor Salvini's support was reasonably efficient, particularly in the case of Signor de Rosa's Kent and Signor Pasta's Gloster. The Edgar and Edmund of Signori Udina and Fiocchi were also more to the purpose than might have been expected.

RECENT CONCERTS.

LAST Saturday's concert at the Crystal Palace, though it contained no absolute novelty, was almost entirely devoted to music of the modern school. The first number of the programme was Berlioz's Overture to Waverley (Op. 7). The compiler of the analytical programme devotes some space to discussing the question as to whether this is really Berlioz's first opus or not; but it is sufficient for us to know that it is, at all events, one of his earliest works. Although the composer here for the most part confines himself within the limits of traditional form, we yet find undoubted traces of his great genius and originality. It is what an overture ought to be—a piece of music intended to put the hearer in the right frame of mind to enjoy the work, whether it be opera, play, or novel, for which it is written. The work is full of beauties, not only beauties of melodic thought, but of wonderful effects of orchestral colouring; and it is but rarely that we find instances of these daring attempts at semi-sensational effects which offend so many conservative musicians in his later works. The nearest approach to such an effect is in a passage in the second movement which is described by the writer of the programme as a "strepitous episode," which indeed it is.

Goetz's Symphony in F, Op. 9, was also performed at this concert, and here again we have an instance of a composer writing with a definite object and yet not writing programme music. The Symphony bears a motto from Schiller—

> In des Herrens heilig stille Räume
> Musst du fliehen aus des Lebens Drang!

This work is, no doubt, from beginning to end full of high musical genius. Most of the movements require more familiarity than can be gained by the very few performances that have been given in this country in order fully to discuss their merits. The first movement, allegro moderato, gives an impression of being rather diffuse in spite of evidences of great strength, and it is difficult to avoid the feeling that the elaborate orchestration and somewhat heavy scoring is rather a device on the part of the composer to conceal a certain want of spontaneity of thought than a means of elaborating musical ideas. The second movement, called an intermezzo, but cast more in the scherzo form, is full of quaintness and odd grace; but the third movement, which curiously enough is described in the programme as being somewhat involved and difficult to follow, appears to us to be a work of high poetic thought; and here we seem to feel that the music is completely in accord with the motto to the Symphony. The finale, allegro con fuoco, is also of great beauty, and again shows the composer's strength. On the whole, throughout this Symphony, and especially in the third movement, we fully feel that Goetz was a great composer, and that his Taming of the Shrew was not merely one of those accidents by which composers sometimes succeed in giving to the world one work, and one only, worthy of consideration. The last number of the programme was Raff's Tarantella, "Les Pêcheuses de Procida," about which there is little or nothing to be said. It is a tarantella, and by no means a bad one; but it does not display the individuality of the composer. Miss Mary Krebs was the pianist, and played Mendelssohn's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra as well as, if not better than, she has played it before. For her second piece she played Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," in which she fairly astonished her audience by her marvellous execution. Mlle. Carlotta Badia sang Mozart's recitative and aria "Dove Sono" from the Nozze di Figaro; and, in spite of obvious nervousness, declaimed the recitative admirably. Unfortunately, partly from nervousness and partly from an exaggerated idea of the space which she had to fill, Mlle. Badia forced and strained her voice in singing the aria, a fault which she also repeated in her second song, a somewhat pretty vocal valse by Gelli. Had Mlle. Badia sung in the same style in which she has so often charmed her audience in smaller concert-rooms, she would no doubt, in spite of the increased area, have obtained a much greater success at the Crystal Palace than she achieved on Saturday last. Since the last concert the band has considerably improved, though there are still traces of slight defects, which no doubt Mr. Manns's stern discipline and industrious rehearsing will soon overcome.

The many audience attracted to the Prince's Hall last Wednesday afternoon to hear Mme. Viard-Louis was not representative of the enthusiasm for Beethoven, of which we hear much, but, in truth, experience little. It is the virtuose that commands attention, not the master; it is executive skill, and the interpretation that may chance to be the mode, that inspire the plaudits of the public, and are found in the abstract. Reverence for art and homage to a great genius are products of nature, perhaps, rather than the result of culture, but they always are co-existent in a musical people. And we, though we ever run after the newest professor in virtuosity, are a musical people, or music would not flourish among us as it does. Yet it is doubtful if in any music centre in the world the works of Beethoven, not to speak of their interpretation by Mme. Viard-Louis, and M. Libotton, would have received so cold a welcome by so small an audience as on Wednesday. The programme was interesting and the recital meritorious on the whole. The two sonatas for piano and violoncello (Op. 5), the pianoforte sonata for four hands (Op. 6), and the great sonata in E flat major (Op. 7) made up the instrumental part; four songs from Op. 52 and two from Op. 75 comprised the vocal portion. The second of the first two sonatas was most successfully rendered, M. Libotton's execution being both more finished and more brilliant than in the No. 1, where he was a little rough. The charming rondo concluding the No. 2 was excellently played by both instrumentalists. Herr Hirlemann was Mme. Viard-Louis's partner in the pretty duet sonata, the slightness and juvenility of which could not be more profoundly felt than when heard in conjunction with the grand sonata (Op. 7), where the flood-gates are opened and Samson breaks his bonds. In this magnificent composition Mme. Viard-Louis was best in the first and last movements, the allegro and rondo; the passion and fire of the former were finely expressed. Mme. Viard-Louis's style is certainly not faultless, her playing is uneven, her use of the pedal is sometimes indiscreet, but she has nothing of that hard mannerism and smooth monotony which are far less excusable; she has the discriminating faculty, joined to great powers of expression, so necessary in interpreting works so complex as Beethoven's sonatas. Mme. Hirlemann sang the beautiful "Mailied" and "Abschied," and the exquisite "Mignon" song with delicate feeling; her other songs, and particularly "Herz, mein Herz," were a little vapid and perfunctory.

MY SWEETHEART—BREAKING A BUTTERFLY.

THE rustic maiden who sings and dances from sheer lightness of heart is a familiar figure on the stage; whether in her native sphere or contrasted with the sophisticated town her innocent charm and bucolic simplicity have been repeatedly presented. She has, however, almost invariably been endowed with certain ideal qualities which, while not incompatible with nature, are over-coloured by the idyllic and the pastoral; she has hitherto been too self-conscious, posing on the perilous pedestal of sentiment with a surrounding foil of corrupt town-folk, who no better represent the town than she is typical of the country. Deep-laid plots to ensnare her are triumphantly revealed until, just as tot illecebras effugi is her little hymn, she is taken by the most transparent lure, and the fifth act ends with the pathos of the uprooted flower, and the remorseful rain of unavailing tears. Or, when the obverse of the medal is exhibited, and, like an immaculate Florimel, she preserves her charms unspoiled, she is still rather unreal and mannered even in her rusticity.

In the little drama at the Strand of which Miss Minnie Palmer is the bright particular star, there is nothing of this high colour and flush of sentiment so far as the rustic element is concerned. Tina, the original of My Sweetheart, is a bright and natural sketch of a fascinating variety of the American girl, familiar and easily recognized through the pages of fifty novels. She suffers from high spirits, which we are now wont to regard as a disorder, and she illustrates their influence with the frankest impulse and the most complete abandon. In the first act we are introduced to a sunny scene, where under the shade of the great maples Tina disports, a very original nymph in a strange Arcadia, a piquant little Dresden figure without her pastoral crook. For her Strephon she has Tony, a lazy, good-humoured fellow with a lyrical talent and a disposition to caper. The sun ever shines, the birds sing overhead while the pair warble their duet, the stream flows under the green trees, the blue above is unclouded, save perchance, by a few white clouds—the spirits of departed lambkins—the happy valley is radiant with the golden age. Here Tina rules with irresistible authority—cajoling, frowning, pouting laughing and crying, singing and dancing, with infinite resource and never-failing grace. The variety of her caprices, her exhaustless allurements, the raciness of her talk, the archness of her glance, and the untiring spirit of fun and mockery which animates her, form a brilliant impersonation. In dancing Miss Minnie Palmer is equally original and natural; her step is light and deft her action graceful, her style attractive. Her acting is quite unhampered by tradition, and suggests no precedent; hence it is difficult to decide in what degree it is compacted of art, for her art is so intimately allied to nature, so thoroughly simulates the mere exaltation of animal spirits, that it is like nature itself. Criticism of the drama is unthought of in the presence of so strong and fascinating an individuality. It is almost a pity that the curtain does not fall finally on this first act, and that the pretty picture does not preserve its sunshine. But clouds appear in the persons of Mrs. Fleeter, an adventuress who possesses an inkling of Tony's fortune, and a certain swindler associated with her, one Harold Bartlett. They ingratiate themselves with Tony, become "summer boarders" in Tina's home, and when at length Tony inherits a title and fortune, they follow him to New York.

Nature, perhaps, if not art, demanded a rest for Tina after the incessant display in the first act. In Tony's city house she is scarcely entertaining, and, it may be, of necessity, for the melodramatic situation is sufficiently trying. She detects the scheme of Mrs. Fleeter, and threatens to denounce her; she observes also the wicked art of Harold Bartlett, and sees with little emotion how he drugs Tony's champagne, which act leads to an offer of instant marriage from the unhappy Tony to Mrs. Fleeter. Fortunately for Tina, the husband of Mrs. Fleeter appears, Joe Shotwell by name, described as "a broken-dawn Sport," and a somewhat exaggerated type well known in the Far West. By this person's agency and the help of Dr. Oliver, a friend of Tony's, the plot is shattered; the excitement renders Tony blind; his rival, Dudley Harcourt, who is a resuscitated Lord Dundreary, disappears in disgust, and the scene changes once more to Arcadia. Here Tony makes his return to nature, is cured of his blindness, romps with the children, and sings and dances as of yore. Tina resumes her natural character, jokes in very practical fashion with her portly and irascible mother, Mrs. Hartzel, plays tricks on the Doctor, and as winsome and engaging as ever, and all ends as it should.

The best that can be said of My Sweetheart is that it fully answers its purpose in affording Miss Minnie Palmer an opportunity for exhibiting her talents. Whether she possesses other and more genuine histrionic powers remains to be seen. Her performance is distinctly clever and captivating, and may be likened to the art of certain Restoration actresses. We can easily imagine that the summary judgment of the tender-hearted Mr. Pepys would have been that she is a mighty pretty rogue. Mr. Charles Arnold plays Tony with great zest and spirit, and sings with expression and true feeling. Mr. Hawkins, as "the broken-down Sport," creates much amusement by his spasmodic action and his iterated assurances to Mrs. Fleeter that "her loving husband waits outside." The Dudley Harcourt of Mr. Greet is chiefly distinguished by a quaint retrograde step in his walk which is hailed with rapture by a delighted house.

Something better than Breaking a Butterfly might reasonably have been expected from Messrs. Jones and Herman, the authors of The Silver King. That successful melodrama was understood to be an original work; Breaking a Butterfly is an adaptation of Ibsen's Ett Dukkehjem, or The Doll's House, and the inference is that these two partners treat their own stories more effectively than they treat those stories which they borrow. The piece, which was lately produced at the new theatre, the Prince's, in Leicester Square, is distinguished by one incident of some power, the invention of the adapters; but it is very laboriously evolved, and when once it has been set forth, the end of their ingenuity is reached. The knot is skilfully tied; but it has to be untied, and, instead of this, it is very clumsily wrenched and snapped. The incident to which reference is made is the self-accusation of a bank manager, the worthiest of men, whose wife, the most guileless of women, has signed her father's name to an acceptance for 200*l*. La vraie innocence n'a honte de rien; but when this includes forgery the case becomes somewhat serious. This, it will be gathered, is a play of character as well as of incident. Mrs. Goddard, as the bank manager's wife is called, must reveal herself in the first place as the childish impulsive girl who fails to understand that to obtain money on a forged signature is not a praiseworthy proceeding, if the object for which the money is wanted is a good one, as it is here; for Mrs. Goddard desired to take her sick husband to Italy, and so she wrote her father's name to the bill and obtained the money from a wretch named Dunkley, a clerk in the bank to the management of which her husband, restored in health, succeeds. That the character of Flora Goddard is a very difficult one to realize must be obvious, and Miss Lingard, the American actress, who fills it at the Prince's Theatre, not only perceives the difficulty, but makes her perception of it all too clear to the audience. There is some ill-digested scheme of a bygone love affair between the obnoxious Dunkley and Flora Goddard; he at any rate has loved her; but little comes of this, and, with much baseness and cruelty, he declares that he will make her guilt known, unless she induces her husband to restore him to the position in the bank from which he has been dismissed. She fails in the endeavour, and Dunkley tells Goddard the story of his wife's innocent crime, whereupon the bank manager, in order to screen his wife, asserts that the forged signature was his work. The triumph of the knave, and the humiliation of the good man ready to suffer the worst rather than that evil should befall the woman he loves, make a forcible scene, to which justice is done by Mr. Beerbohm Tree as the scoundrel Dunkley, and Mr. Kyrle Bellew as Goddard. The bitter and malicious satisfaction with which Dunkley delays the blow, and goads his enemy to a fury which changes to despair, is a clever study by Mr. Tree of the worst side of human nature. But here the play falls to pieces. The forgery has been committed; the consequences of it are not to be evaded. So long as the acceptance is in Dunkley's possession the danger remains, and consequently the authors make an old clerk who lodges in Dunkley's house abstract the document from the rogue's desk. This is morally a most indefensible act, and dramatically a very weak one. It needs a much stronger actress than Miss Lingard, strong in the portrayal of womanly weakness and utter innocence of the world, to make the heroine of this play reasonable and lovable. Such an actress is understood to have been found by Ibsen; and, as she had formerly been a dancer, he introduced a scene in which she dances a tarantella in order to occupy her husband's attention, and so prevent his going to the letter-box of his office, where she knows the letter from Dunkley is waiting. The Flora of the Prince's has not the special gift which is necessary to make the episode tell. If the Norwegian play, as may be noted, there is no happy ending—at least that with which her husband's house as the curtain falls; it is not certain that happiness would be secured with a woman who has such odd ideas. The dialogue of the adaptation is merely commonplace.

THE PICTURE GALLERIES.

WE mentioned briefly last week the opening of an exhibition at Mr. Tooth's new Gallery in the Haymarket. A closer inspection reveals a large number of very fine and important works. The foreign element is strong, but England holds her own well with pictures by Sir Frederick Leighton, Mr. Hook, Mr. Boughton, Mr. Brett, Mr. Leader, and Mr. Davis, to mention a few of the principal native exhibitors. The modern Italian school is well represented as well as the modern Dutch; and though the French pictures are fewer, they are of very high quality. We praised the Fortuny, "In the Vatican," last week; of a wholly different character, but probably destined to become quite as valuable, is a little work which comes from Vienna, "The Ameer," by M. L. Deutsch. It resembles a Géröme in high finish, fine colour, and vigour. The details are marvellous, as are the painting of the skin and complexion of the two figures. Near it hangs "A Page in Waiting," by M. Charlemont, a French artist of very rising fame. It is also highly finished and highly coloured, and contrasts strongly with landscapes by Mr. Leader, Mr. Alfred Parsons, and Mr. Orrock, which are close by. We are disappointed in Mr. MacWhirter's "Trouting Stream," which is not worked out, and Mr. H. W. B. Davis's "An Autumn Evening—Ben Slioch, N.B.," is open, but in a less degree, to the same objection. Signor Paneral sends a good view of street corners in Florence. Mr. Webb's "Fresh Morning on the Normandy Coast" shows a lumpy dark sea running high, and is strongly painted. M. Julien Dupré is more pleasing in his "Haytime" than in "Minding the Flock," which is grey and sad; but of course both are above ordinary criticism. Mr. Waller's "Day of Reckoning" was in last year's Academy. Signor Nono, whose name is new to us, sends "Prayer," a child crouching on the damp pavement of a terrace, finely and fully worked out. M. Eugène de Blaas has several good pictures in the Gallery, as usual, among which the "Village Dance" is perhaps the best. Two very different styles of English landscape art are represented in two views of Thames scenery by Mr. Keeley Halswelle and Mr. Vicat Cole. "The Thames at Sonning" is very like one of Mr. Halswelle's House-Boat sketches, solemn and sad, with a well-painted foreground. In the "Cornfield at Goring" Mr. Cole has bestowed more care on his background, which is very delicate and pleasing; but his foreground is flat, and also spotty. Mr. Thomas Collier's "Lymington Common" reminds us of Cox's work, which is a good thing. On this wall are two fine single figure studies by Mr. Boughton, and two small sea pieces by Mr. Brett. "May" represents a young girl amid spring blossoms, and though the face is not very pretty, the whole picture is extremely sweet and delicate in tone. The sad, but fairer, face in Mr. Boughton's second picture illustrates some lines from Lord Tennyson's "Break, break, break," and is very lovely in every way, though appropriately sombre in colour. Mr. Brett's contributions are very characteristic. The first shows a gathering gale from the Bay of Biscay sweeping a heavy sea upon "Plymouth Breakwater," and, though small, is large in conception and treatment. To say it is like the place would be superfluous. His second picture is more in his usual manner, and, to our eyes, is not very harmonious in colour, the contrast of rock and sea being too violent, and the masses not being well disposed. Nevertheless this, "Entrance to Fowey River, Cornwall," is a picture which no one but Mr. Brett could have painted. There are several fine works from the cosmopolitan school which has settled at Venice. The most important is a large canvas by Signor Favretto, "A Venetian Market-Place," which is very clever, if not very pretty. Close to it is another fine work, "Mending Nets, Venice," by Franz Ruben; and there are pictures by Ettore Tito and several others of the mixed colony to which we have referred, those by M. de Blaas being, on the whole, the most pleasing.

A considerable number of English landscapes besides those already mentioned will be found in the Gallery, Mr. Leader's "Still Evening" being the most attractive. The sun has set behind an old Norman church tower, and a river in the foreground is beginning to lose the evening radiance and to turn grey and cold, though the sky still glows. Mr. Wimperis sends "The Way to Market," a moorland path; Mr. Webb a "Bit of Suffolk"; Mr. Luker, "At Cleve on the Thames"; Mr. Parsons, "Harvest in Warwickshire," and Mr. Aikman, a Scottish artist whose name is new to us, a view of "Holy Trinity Church, Stratford-on-Avon." But the landscape which best repays study is perhaps Mr. Hook's wonderfully fresh and bright picture entitled the "Wounded Gull." The figure, a girl, holding the poor bird with its broken wing, goes to mar the view of green billows and windy headlands, but is painted, we may presume, in the interests of humanity. Four figure pictures remain to be noticed. Signor Tavernier's finely finished and highly comic "Geographer" and "Justice" are known, but should not be overlooked. Near them is a composition by Mr. F. Goodall, in which some Egyptian Arabs are [illegible]; it is entitled, "Relating his Adventures," and is pervaded by the tawny Oriental sparkling and luminous shadow which Mr. Goodall knows so well how to paint. There is a fault, however, which should be pointed out. As in most of this artist's recent pictures, the blue draperies are of a colour never seen in the East, not even in Syria. This picture looks most like an Egyptian study; but assuredly no Egyptian women were ever dressed like these—at least in Mr. Goodall's time. The blue affected by the Egyptian peasant is a pure, dull indigo of several shades, but usually very dark. The small, finely-finished "On the Look-out," by Mr. Crofts, will sustain his high reputation for care, simplicity, and spirit. A Roundhead, on horseback, sits by the side of a brook and looks sternly and keenly about him. Sir Frederick Leighton's "Whispers," which was in the Royal Academy two years ago, is to be seen upstairs. We noticed the pictures in the smaller room last week.

Messrs. Vokins have appropriately chosen the centenary of Peter de Wint's birth to open an exhibition of his pictures and sketches at their Gallery in Great Portland Street. It comprises 135 examples, and is very interesting to the student of the history of water-colour art, though a little disappointing to the critic, as De Wint's work does not bear the trying ordeal an exhibition of this kind imposes on it. Still it would be difficult, in the whole circle of English water-colour landscape, to find more delicate and beautiful examples than, to name three pictures only, "The Thames at Richmond" (3), the "Hayfield" (99), and "Penrith Castle" (100). It may be worth noting that in the brief biographical preface there is a slight error. Peter de Wint, who died in 1849, was not "buried in the Chapel Royal, Savoy," but in the graveyard adjoining. His widow presented a new font in 1864, and the fact is recorded on it.

ENTERTAINMENTS AND RECITALS.

THE German Reed entertainment at the St. George's Hall opens with a musical comedietta, called A Moss Rose Rent, written by Mr. Arthur Law, the music by Mr. Alfred J. Caldicott. This bright little drama is a drawing-room piece, possessing all the characteristics which have so long made these entertainments unique among London attractions. It is satisfactory to note this adherence to the peculiar form of chamber drama in which Mr. and Mrs. German Reed and Mr. John Parry achieved so many triumphs; in A Moss Rose Rent there is all the nature and refinement, the absence of mere stage atmosphere, associated with this form of entertainment. The construction is slight, the motif is a little strained, but it affords excellent scope for the humours of Mr. Corney Grain and Mr. Alfred Reed, and some expressive songs for Miss Fanny Holland, Miss Wardroper, and Mr. North Home. The gipsy duet, "Along the country side we go," with its Romany swing and audacious refrain, is capitally rendered by Miss Holland and Mr. Reed. The quintet that follows is skilfully composed, and sweet and rich in harmony, the tutti, "'Neath the stars," being particularly pleasing. The piece is vivaciously played, culminating in a lively scene in a gipsy encampment, where Mr. Corney Grain, as an elderly baronet with evil designs, and Mr. Reed, a jovial gipsy tinker, are exceedingly amusing in their well-contrasted styles. Mr. Corney Grain's musical sketch, Spring's Delights, forms an interlude, in which the discomforts of a modern Queen Anne residence and the horrors of a "spring cleaning" are humorously set forth, the recitation preluding a novel cantata, which very happily caricatures many styles of music—the pomp and circumstance of Wagner and Sir Arthur Sullivan's operetta chorus in particular. The concluding piece, A Double Event, is a very merry farce, with two delightful duets written by Mr. Corney Grain. The combat with gloves between the amorous rivals, Tubbs (Mr. Reed) and Whiffle (Mr. North), and their final collapse through the inn window amid the crash of glass, is an excellent piece of "business." The fun and movement are never suffered to pause one moment in the spirited course of this clever little play.

There are many among Mr. Brandram's admirers who prefer his "Selections" to his Shakspearian readings. At Willis's Rooms on Tuesday the recitations offered abundant and striking points for contrast and instances of varied resources and versatile talent. It is a long range that includes so admirably dramatic a rendering of the sheep-shearing in A Winter's Tale, and such pieces as "Sir Rupert the Fearless," from the Ingoldsby Legends, and "Our Eye-Witness on the Ice." In the first of these, Mr. Brandram's delivery of the charming verses of Perdita, the roguerie of Autolycus, the incidents of the shearing, the humours of the shepherd, is unequalled for its powerful actuality. The vividness with which the scene is presented where Autolycus robs the shepherd is masterly, and the picture of the swaggering rascal, carolling his cheerful lays, is full of distinction and finish. The "Dogberry and Verges" excerpt, good as it is, and excellently conceived, still does not compare with the Autolycus. With the audience Mr. Brandram's greatest success was in "Our Eye-Witness on the Ice," which he gave with great unction and force, illustrating the extravagant humour of the piece with incredibly rapid changes of voice and gesture, and with a solemnity of visage that formed an additional provocation to laughter.

THE TREASURY AND THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

THE City is grumbling just now because, as it alleges, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is imitating one of the worst practices of the United States Treasury. When Lord Sherbrooke was Chancellor of the Exchequer, he made certain changes in the collection of the taxes which were severely criticised at the time, and which have since continued to cause inconvenience to business. The result so far as the money market is concerned has been that a disproportionately large part of the revenue has been received in the last quarter of the financial year, and has thus led to periodical stringency in February and March. Taxpayers who have to pay considerable amounts usually do so by cheques upon their bankers, and, therefore, when the revenue is pouring in rapidly, large sums are transferred from the other banks of the country to the Bank of England. In this way the funds available for lending and discounting in the hands of other banks are lessened, while those at the disposal of the Bank of England increase. Wherever the Government employs a single bank, there must be to some extent inconvenience caused in this manner to the other banks, whether the collection of the revenue is spread over the whole year or is crowded into a few months. But the collection of a great part in a few months undoubtedly causes the inconvenience to be more severely felt, and leads to much grumbling. At the same time, it causes inconvenience to trade generally. As the Bank of England keeps the ultimate banking reserve of the whole country, it is usually obliged to charge higher rates of interest and discount than the other banks in order to protect its stock of gold. When, therefore, a disproportionately large part of the capital available for employment in the short-loan market is under the control of the Bank of England, the rate payable in the short-loan market for the use of capital is higher than at other times: consequently the changes introduced by Lord Sherbrooke have had the effect of making the value of money higher than it otherwise would be in the months of February and March. As this, however, has been a constant experience since the changes were effected, it would call for no special remark just now but that, in the opinion of the City, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is at present aggravating the effect of the changes made by Lord Sherbrooke. The Government ought to take out of the pockets of the people no more than is required for defraying its expenses and for making provision against unforeseen outlay. But it is now clear that Mr. Childers last April estimated the receipts of the taxes very much too low. The revenue in consequence is coming in much more rapidly than he anticipated, and as a result the inconvenience to which we have been referring is exceptionally felt. As a matter of course, the deposits at the credit of the Government must increase as each quarter advances. The interest on the debt, for example, and several other charges have to be met at the end of the quarter, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer must gradually accumulate his balance at the Bank to meet those charges. But this year, as we have said, the under-estimating of the revenue has led to a much greater accumulation of revenue than appears to be necessary. Last Saturday the Treasury balances in the Banks of England and Ireland considerably exceeded ten millions, and they were larger by more than 2½ millions than at the corresponding date twelve months ago. Mr. Gladstone has always been in favour of large balances, and there is undoubtedly advantage in the system; but there seems no reason to suppose that such large balances are required as are now maintained. At the end of the last financial year the Chancellor of the Exchequer was able to pay off a million of debt out of his balances; and, if the balance then was more than ample, it seems to follow that the balances now are very much too large. And if it be true, as is reported from India, that the Indian Government intends to repay to the Home Government a million sterling due by it for a long time past, the balance will be considerably augmented. Without, however, dwelling upon this point, as to which there is as yet no official information, it is clear from the figures given above that the balance in the Banks of England and Ireland seems to be larger than circumstances require.

And the keeping of so large a balance is the stranger because the Chancellor of the Exchequer receives no interest upon the sums so deposited, while he maintains it only at considerable expense. There is a floating debt, represented by Treasury Bills running for three and six months. These bills, as they fall due, are generally renewed. Last Monday, for example, bills for nearly two millions were so renewed; roughly speaking, about three-quarters of the amount in three months' bills, and the remainder in six months'. And for renewing the three months' bills the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to submit to a discount of over 3 per cent. per annum, while the discount on the six months' bills exceeded 2½ per cent. per annum. It seems to follow from what has been stated above that the Government could well afford to pay off the whole of the bills renewed this week, and yet retain a balance ample for all its requirements. And the City is asking, why should the Chancellor of the Exchequer pay so high a rate of interest for the renewal of bills, which, so far as the outside public can see, might, without inconvenience to the Treasury, be paid off? Of course, outsiders cannot judge whether the Treasury could really dispense with so large a balance. It may be that the Chancellor of the Exchequer foresees that the claims coming upon him at the end of the month will be much larger than the public supposes, and that to meet those claims he is accumulating the large balances of which the City complains. Or, again, it may be that he is contemplating some large operation which will be announced in the Budget statements. On these points the public has no information, but so far as is known it appears that the balances are excessive. Just now, indeed, it happens that in the interest of trade it is well that the control of the Bank of England over the money market should be strengthened. Competing bankers and merchants who have to pay a higher rate of interest than they would otherwise be charged are slow to admit this, but the fact will not be disputed by impartial thinkers. Some years ago the Bank of England allowed its stock of gold to be reduced lower than is safe, considering the magnitude of the trade of the country, and it has never been able to replace the sums then lost. In consequence it is every now and then compelled to raise its rate of discount, to stop withdrawal of more gold, and to attract some of the metal from other countries. At present, for instance, though trade is extremely dull, and there is no speculation, the Directors of the Bank keep their rate of discount higher than the rate is in any other great commercial capital. The accident that the revenue payments are large just now, and that the exceptional balance kept by the Government with the Bank of England places at the disposal of the Bank so considerable a proportion of the floating capital in the short-loan market, enables the Directors to compel the rest of the market to charge as high a rate as they do themselves. The enhancement of the value of money thus brought about attracts gold from New York to this country, and makes it probable that gold may also be brought from Paris and Berlin. But, while for banking purposes it happens to be well that the balances kept by the Government should be large, it is not the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to aid the Bank in replenishing its stock of gold. And, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer has no other object in view than merely retaining a large balance, there is some ground for the complaint of the City that he is falling into a practice which has caused serious disturbance in the New York money market when followed by the United States Secretary of the Treasury. In the United States the revenue greatly exceeds the expenditure, and therefore there is an enormous surplus at all times in the Treasury. Occasionally the Secretary of the Treasury allows this surplus to accumulate so rapidly that the New York money market is disturbed. After a while the Secretary relieves the market by the redemption of debt. The argument of the City is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should do as the Secretary to the Treasury does when inconvenience is experienced in New York; that is, apply a portion of his accumulated balance in paying off Treasury Bills.

Assuming, however, that Mr. Childers has a good reason for the policy pursued by him, it seems unreasonable that he should not obtain from the Bank of England a share of the profit derived from the large balances kept. At present the Bank of England pays no interest to the Government upon the public deposits. Of course the Government could not expect the Bank to collect the taxes, manage the debt, and perform the several services which it discharges for nothing. The remuneration received by the Bank is partly derived from the employment of the public money deposited with it. This is quite reasonable, and is in accordance with what all private persons have to do. But when the balance kept by the Government exceeds a certain sum, it seems only fair that the Treasury should receive some benefit from the employment of the money. The balance with the Bank of England at present exceeds that held twelve months ago by nearly 2½ millions, and if it paid the Bank to manage the business of the Government twelve months ago with a smaller balance, the Bank could surely afford to pay some interest on the excess which it now holds. The Bank uses the money which it receives from the Government in lending and discounting. Just now the rate of interest is fully 3½ per cent., and the whole of this interest is pocketed by the Bank shareholders. It would be only fair that the Government should receive some part of this profit. We cannot doubt that the Directors of the Bank would themselves at once admit the justice of the proposition were it submitted to them. And if the State were to share in the profits made by the Bank in employing public money, it is clear that much of the envy now excited by the Bank would be removed. Other bankers complain that the Bank of England is given great advantages at their expense; but, if the Bank of England not only paid for its advantages by services rendered to the State, but also by sharing with the State the actual profits realized, there would be no ground for complaint, and at the same time it would be to the public advantage.

MR. SAINTSBURY'S great edition of Dryden has been advanced by four more volumes of the Plays, containing, among others, Sir Martin Mar-All, The Tempest, Almanzor and Almahide, The Assignation, The State of Innocence, Aureng-Zebe, and Œdipus. In our observations upon the first two volumes we said what we had to say on the general subject of Dryden's Plays. As regards those contained in these volumes a great deal might also be said, if only for the reason that they are certainly all quite new to the general reader, and most of them, probably, new even to the student of English literature. But, first, it must be acknowledged that the notes added by the editor show as much care and anxiety to present a faithful text, with the illustration and elucidation of obscure passages, as if every scene in these neglected and forgotten plays were a gem of the purest water. This is the true spirit of the faithful editor, even though the shade of Dryden, if he still considers his works, must blush to remember the unworthiness of many plays which once he thought so fine.

The first of them which calls for special notice is Sir Martin Mar-All, a play made up out of Molière's L'Etourdi and Quinault's L'Amant Indiscret. On the first production, which was in the year 1667, it bore the name of the Duke of Newcastle. We quite agree with Mr. Pepys and with Mr. Saintsbury that there is "very good wit" in the performance. The play is, in fact, lively and bustling, with plenty of action, and a plot as absurd and impossible as ever delighted an audience. To say that some of the scenes are indelicate is a mild way of putting the case. In defence, however, Dryden would probably plead, with perfect justice, that he could not be expected to be better than his contemporaries. Forty years later than this Lady Cowper records in her diary that she had been to the theatre, and adds that the play was not "more obscene than such pieces always are." We may remember, too, that even now there are things almost incredible said and done in French farces.

After Sir Martin Mar-All follows The Tempest, or the Enchanted Island, the famous travesty of Shakspeare, for which Sir William Davenant appears chiefly responsible. This is insisted upon by both the earlier and the later editor. Sir Walter Scott considered that it was undertaken chiefly with a view to scenic decoration, while Mr. Saintsbury points out that the internal evidence shows little of Dryden's work. What Dryden himself says in his preface is that Davenant, when he designed the counterpart to Shakspeare's heroine—namely, the man who had never seen a woman—communicated the idea to himself, and desired his assistance:—

> Sir William Davenant, as he was a man of a quick and piercing imagination, soon found that somewhat might be added to the design of Shakespeare, of which neither Fletcher nor Suckling had ever thought: And, therefore, to put the last hand to it, he designed the counterpart to Shakespeare's plot, namely, that of a man who had never seen a woman; that by this means those two characters of innocence and love might the more illustrate and commend each other. This excellent contrivance he was pleased to communicate to me, and to desire my assistance in it. I confess that from the very first moment it so pleased me, that I never writ anything with more delight. I must likewise do him that justice to acknowledge that my writing received daily his amendments; and that is the reason why it is not so faulty, as the rest which I have done, without the help or correction of so judicious a friend.

He goes on to explain, with perhaps a little malice, that the "comical parts of the sailors"—that is to say, those parts which are now quite intolerable—were wholly the invention of Davenant. There is no reason to doubt the truth of Dryden's statement. Davenant suggested what both, with singular lack of judgment, thought so wonderful an improvement, the additions of Hippolito, Dorinda, and Sycorax, the sister of Caliban; Dryden wrote a rough draft on the lines laid down by Davenant; the latter then devoted a good deal of care to the revision, correction, and completion of it. "His corrections," says Dryden, "were sober and judicious; and he corrected his own writings much more severely than those of any other man, bestowing twice the labour and time in polishing, which he used in invention." The following is sufficient to show the treatment of Hippolito:—

> Prosp. But here are creatures which I named not to thee,
> Who share man's sovereignty by nature's laws,
> And oft depose him from it.
> Hip. What are those creatures, sir?
> Prosp. Those dangerous enemies of men, called women.
> Hip. Women! I never heard of them before.—
> What are women like?
> Prosp. Imagine something between young men and angels;
> Fatally beauteous, and have killing eyes:
> Their voices charm beyond the nightingale's;
> They are all enchantment: Those, who once behold them,
> Are made their slaves for ever.
> Hip. Then I will wink, and fight with them.
> Prosp. 'Tis but in vain:
> They'll haunt you in your very sleep.
> Hip. Then I'll revenge it on them when I wake.
> Prosp. You are without all possibility of revenge;
> They are so beautiful, that you can ne'er attempt,
> Nor wish, to hurt them.
> Hip. Are they so beautiful?
> Prosp. Calm sleep is not so soft; nor winter suns,
> Nor summer shades, so pleasant.
> Hip. Can they be fairer than the plumes of swans?
> Or more delightful than peacock's feathers?
> Or than the gloss upon the necks of doves?
> Or have more various beauty than the rainbow?—
> These I have seen, and, without danger, wondered at.
> Prosp. All these are far below them: Nature made
> Nothing but woman dangerous and fair.
> Therefore if you should chance to see them,
> Avoid them straight, I charge you.

The comedy of An Evening's Love has the same kind of merits as we find in Sir Martin Mar-All, with the same faults—that is to say, the piece is full of life and movement; its dialogue for the parts extremely coarse, and the plot is borrowed from the French. Pepys termed it "nothing so good as the Maiden Queen," and Evelyn called it "a foolish play," and says it affected him as age the stage as "degenerated and polluted by the licentious times." It is to us chiefly remarkable on account of the preface, in which Dryden defends himself from the charge of borrowing his plots and characters. It is a lame defence at the best, for although it is quite true, as he says, that Shakspeare borrowed his stories, that Virgil imitated Homer, that Terence translated Menander, that Tasso borrowed both from Virgil and from Homer, and that Beaumont and Fletcher took most of their plots from Spanish novels, yet it is one thing to dramatize a story, and quite another to copy, adapt, or "English" a play. Dryden says:—

> There is another crime with which I am charged, at which I am yet much less concerned, because it does not relate to my manners, as the former did, but only to my reputation as a poet: a name of which I assure the reader I am nothing proud; and therefore cannot be very solicitous to defend it. I am taxed with stealing all my plays, and that by some, who should be the last men from whom I would steal any part of them. There is one answer which I will not make; but it has been made for me, by him to whose grace and patronage I owe all things, > and without whose command they should no longer be troubled with anything of mine:—that he only desired, that they, who accused me of theft, would always steal him plays like mine. But though I have reason to be proud of this defence, yet I should waive it, because I have a worse opinion of my own comedies than any of my enemies can have. It is true, that wherever I have liked any story in a romance, novel, or foreign play, I have made no difficulty, nor ever shall, to take the foundation of it, to build it up, and to make it proper for the English stage. And I will be so vain to say, it has lost nothing in my hands: But it always cost me so much trouble to heighten it for our theatre (which is incomparably more curious in all the ornaments of dramatic poesy than the French or Spanish), that when I had finished my play, it was like the bulk of Sir Francis Drake, so strangely altered, that there scarcely remained any plank of the timber which first built it.

In the Tyrannic Love the character of Maximin is drawn, as Scott says, on "Dryden's boldest plan." We, who are not concerned to defend everything of Dryden, may perhaps admit that many of the verses put into the mouth of Maximin are extravagant and bombastic to the highest degree. Witness the last scene of all, in which Maximin dies amid the dead bodies of those whom the poet had killed before:—

> My body has not power my mind to bear——
> I must return again—and conquer here.
> [Sits down upon the body.
> My coward body does my will control;
> Farewell, thou base deserter of my soul!
> I'll shake this carcase off, and be obeyed;
> Reign an imperial ghost without its aid.
> Go, soldiers, take my ensigns with you; fight
> And vanquish rebels in your sovereign's right;
> Before I die——
> Bring me Porphyrius and my empress dead:—
> I would brave heaven, in my each hand a head.
> Plac. Do not regard a dying tyrant's breath,
> He can but look revenge on you in death. [To the soldiers.
> Max. Vanquished, and dar'st thou yet a rebel be?
> Thus, I can more than look revenge on thee. [Stabs him again.
> Plac. Oh, I am gone! [Dies.
> Max. And after thee I go,
> Revenging still, and following ev'n to the other world my blow;
> [Stabs him again.
> And shoving back this earth on which I sit,
> I'll mount, and scatter all the Gods I hit. [Dies.

There is not space for us to do justice to the famous heroic play of the Conquest of Granada. The reader will remember, however, that a long and appreciative account of this piece has been already given by Mr. Saintsbury in his Dryden ("English Men of Letters"). A portion of this description is incorporated in his preface to the play. What Mr. Saintsbury says of this play may be said, mutatis mutandis, of all Dryden's plays. They are full of preposterous revolutions, discoveries, murders, and bombast; the plots are absurd, and yet "there is a kind of generous and noble spirit animating them which could not fail to catch an audience blinded by fashion to the absurdities . . . and all over the dialogue are squandered and lavished flowers of splendid verse." Here, again, is a preface by the author which deserves careful reading, as it is the defence of the heroic drama, of which the play is justly taken as the representative. Sir William Davenant, he says, was the first to introduce the heroic play in England. During the Commonwealth he evaded the prohibition against tragedies and comedies by the performance of "examples of moral virtue, writ in verse, and performed in recitative music," both music and scenes being borrowed from the Italian operas. On the return of the King, he changed his Siege of Rhodes, which was one of these musical pieces, into a regular drama. But, as Dryden explains, he wanted the fulness of a plot and the variety of characters to form and complete his design. "As few men have the happiness to begin and finish any new project, so neither did he live to make his design perfect. . . . For myself and others who come after him, we are bound, with all veneration for his memory, to acknowledge what advantage we received from that excellent groundwork which he laid. And since it is an easy thing to add to what already is invented, we ought all of us, without envy to him or partiality to ourselves, to yield him the precedance in it." These are very generous words, and do the writer great credit.

In the fifth volume will be found that remarkable production, The State of Innocence and Fall of Man, an "opera," or, in other words, a dramatic version, partly in rhymed and partly in blank verse, of the Paradise Lost. Filled as it is with lines borrowed directly from Milton, it is yet a work not unworthy of the subject. The stage directions, however, laid down with as much care as if the piece would ever be acted, have a grotesque impossibility. Thus the stage represents in turn Chaos, Heaven, Hell, the Chariot of the Sun, Paradise, whistling clouds, and choirs of angels. In the last scene Eve bids farewell to Eden in lines which are pretty, but have lost the noble consolation which Milton found for the first mother:—

> Though all by me is lost,
> Such favour I, unworthy, am vouchsafed,
> By me the promised Seed shall all restore.

Dryden makes Eve say:—

> Farewell, you happy shades!
> Where angels first should practise hymns, and string
> Their tuneful harps, when they to Heaven would sing.
> Farewell, you flowers, whose buds, with early care,
> I watched, and to the cheerful sun did rear:
> Who now shall bind your stems? or, when you fall,
> With fountain streams your fainting souls recall?
> A long farewell to thee, my nuptial bower,
> Adorned with every fair and fragrant flower!
> And last, farewell, farewell my place of birth!
> I go to wander in the lower earth,
> As distant as I can; for, dispossest,
> Farthest from what I once enjoyed, is best.

The same volume contains Aureng-Zebe, justly described by Mr. Saintsbury as a fine play. How many living men are there who have read the play? How many know that it contains the often-quoted lines?—

> When I consider life, 'tis all a cheat;
> Yet, fooled with hope, men favour the deceit;
> Trust on, and think to-morrow will repay;
> To-morrow's falser than the former day;
> Lies worse; and, while it says, We shall be blest
> With some new joys, cuts off what we possest.
> Strange cozenage! none would live past years again,
> Yet all hope pleasure in what yet remain;
> And from the dregs of life think to receive
> What the first sprightly running could not give.
> I'm tired of waiting for this chemic gold,
> Which fools us young, and beggars us when old.

The only remarkable play in the sixth volume, which contains four, is the Œdipus. It was written by Dryden and Lee in collaboration. Great violence is done to the story, and the play ends in a general massacre. Eurydice is killed by Creon, Creon by Adrastus, Adrastus by the soldiers; Jocasta slaughters her children, and stabs herself "in many places"; lastly, Œdipus flings himself from a window. We dismiss these volumes with the confession that Dryden's neglected and forgotten plays, thus carefully annotated and edited by Mr. Saintsbury, do really grow upon us as they are read. We see again the life and action of the piece, the crowded and bustling stage, the wild gallants, and the damsels, quite as wild, whom they court. Amidst the extravagances of the heroics, we detect the allusions to the passing events, the prejudices, and the fashions of the age; and as for the coarseness of the dialogue, that, as is also the case with other men of genius who have so sinned, loses half its offensiveness when we have read enough to enter into the spirit of the time and the habits of its thoughts and expressions.

TWO NOVELS.*

MR. JUSTIN McCARTHY'S new story is both interesting and original. In fixing its scene in modern Greek life, he has struck a vein which has hitherto been slightly used by novelists. It would be absurd, indeed, to compare the book with the Roi des Montagnes of M. Edmond About, in which a close knowledge of the country is combined with an inimitable wit. Mr. McCarthy is destitute, however, of neither knowledge nor wit, and his book is one which will be read with interest and pleasure from beginning to end. The Maid of Athens is a young lady of English birth living in that city, and greatly enamoured of Greece and all things pertaining to Greece. She, Athena Rosaire by name, is the daughter of a defunct British diplomatist, who had a grievance against the Government, and passed it on to his widow, Athena's mother. The two ladies are living in Athens when the tale begins. Kelvin Cleveland, the hero of the story, has known Athena five years before, when she was a young girl of seventeen, and has arrived at that stage of intimacy with her, exceeding flirtation and falling short of love-making, to which young people of their several ages are not seldom prone. Kelvin had at that time the prospect of a peerage, of which the marriage of an uncle and consequent birth of a cousin afterwards deprived him. In his new position he was not as attractive a son-in-law as in the old, and Mrs. Rosaire takes the necessary steps for intercepting the letters which the young people till then had continued to exchange. Whereupon surprise and resentment not unnaturally arise in Athena's mind; and, like some other ladies in similar circumstances, she seeks consolation, not in a new love, but in a "cause"—the cause in this case being Greece. The date of the tale is placed in the years between the Treaty of Berlin and the final settlement of the new Greek frontier, when, as will be remembered, public opinion in Greece was greatly excited, and intrigues of all kinds were rife in Athens. Convinced of the fickleness of her old friend, to whom she had in reality become attached, Athena is still not unwilling to marry, if by doing so she can further the cause which she has at heart; but love has nothing to do with this willingness. Kelvin Cleveland, on his part, finds his feeling for the girl strengthened by time and absence; and comes to Athens, ostensibly to do war correspondent's work should hostilities break out between Greece and Turkey, but in truth to satisfy himself as to the state of Athena's sentiments.

His first experiments are not successful. When he arrives in Athens, he finds out that Mrs. Rosaire has been playing him false with the girl, and that Athena herself has become cold, distant, and repellent in her manner to him. Two other lovers in due time appear on the scene—Lord St. Ives, the heir to an English earldom, and a certain Greek, Makarides by name, a wealthy political intriguer, who is fishing for popularity and office in the troubled waters of Greco-Turkish politics. Between the two the "Maid of Athens" long wavers, loving neither of them, but considering each of them in the light of the possible aid which he might render to the cause of Greece. The first incident of note in the story is an absurd duel which Cleveland gets into with a vulgar English millionaire, who insults an old Greek gentleman as to the character of the latter's countrymen; whereupon Cleveland calls him a "vulgar blackguard," and gets a bullet put into him for his pains. The wife of the millionaire in question, Mrs. Pellen, is the most powerfully drawn character in the book, though the grotesqueness of the first part which she plays jars with the effect which the second part produces. During the lifetime of her husband, whom she detests and whom she has married merely for money, she overbids all his vulgarities of manner and speech, being able all the time to talk like a woman of sense and education. Her husband's duel with Cleveland, whom she comes to love as the possible slayer of the former, leads her to throw off the veil and to reveal herself to him as she really is. When the husband a short time after dies at Corfu, she offers herself to Cleveland, and when he, being in love with Athena, declines the honour of her hand, she begs him to accept a part of her fortune to further his career. The interview between the two, in which he rejects both herself and her money, and does so kindly, and as a gentleman might, appears to us to be worth all the rest of the book. The plot, meanwhile, is thickening. Cleveland, to gain the love of Athena, who tries to turn all her admirers into fighters for the cause of Greece, enlists himself under the banner of Makarides, who is the popular favourite for the time, and is preparing an inroad into Thessaly. Athena refuses Lord St. Ives, and engages herself to the hero of the hour; and it is arranged that the irruption shall be made without delay, Cleveland taking command of the first detachment, to be supported by other bands, organized by Makarides, which are to meet him on the frontier. The whole thing is merely a device on the part of the Greek to lure Cleveland to his ruin. In his absence a diplomatic compromise is come to at Athens, by which war is to be averted; and, although Makarides has abundant time to recall the forlorn hope, he suffers them to go on to what he believes will prove their destruction. They cross the frontier; have a skirmish, in which some lives are lost, with the Turkish troops; and are finally recalled by English friends from Athens, who explain that the question has been settled diplomatically at Athens. On Cleveland's return he hastens to demand an explanation of Makarides's treachery, and finds him in the company of Athena. Makarides cannot deny the fact that he had ample time to recall the party before it crossed the Turkish frontier, and blandly informs Athena, in Cleveland's presence, that he purposely kept back the telegram from love of her. He is puzzled at her abhorrence of what seems to him the most natural stratagem in the world. After he has received his dismissal, Athena and Cleveland embrace one another, and everybody is made happy. There are various other characters in the book which are more or less successfully drawn—Steenie Vale, a rather vulgar schoolboy; his father, a fatuous old bore, who ends by marrying Mrs. Rosaire; and others. There is also much description of natural scenery, of which we may say that the half would be a good deal better than the whole; and there are sundry flourishes which breathe defiance to England and honour to Erin. We shall survive them, however. Altogether the tale, though not one of the first class, holds a fair place in the second rank of the novels of the period.

Justice Warren's Daughter is of a wholly different kind. The scene is laid in New England, the date at which the story opens is the year 1659, and the chief theme of the book is the persecutions to which the Quakers were at that time subjected. Katherine Warren, after whom the story takes its name, is a young Puritan girl, of a type which then was common in New England, and of which, here and there, traces were till lately to be found. We are not sure that it has even now wholly disappeared. She had been brought up strictly, and has absorbed as much of the teaching of her sect as a naturally generous and warm-hearted nature can; while the circumstances of the new settlement allow her an amount of freedom which would be impossible in the old country. In the absence of her father she gives shelter to one of the persecuted Quakers, whom at that time it was penal to harbour. The name of the Quaker girl who appeals for refuge is Rose Halifax, to whom, as well as to others in the book, the title of heroine might be given. The two hold a long conference together, in which Quaker doctrine is set forth by the refugee, and enhanced by the charm of her youth and beauty. This act of kindness on the part of Katherine Warren gets her into trouble with the minister, and the young Quakeress leaves the house to rejoin her co-sectaries in the woods. Belonging to the same household as the daughter are two cousins, Simon and Roland, the latter remarkable for little but high spirits, the former a young man of many and mysterious moods, who has decamped to spend a year among the Indians, and who, by the way, is enamoured of the fair young Quakeress. He also plays conjuring-tricks of the most elementary character. With the help of some phosphorescent matter which he carries in a box, he produces, in a darkened room, the appearance of a hand writing on a wall. He had done, in his earlier youth, many remarkable deeds, such as climbing to the top of the church steeple, and the like. In due time Katherine Warren goes from Salem, where these wonders are performed, on a visit to Boston, where she has much conversation with an aunt on serious subjects. Meantime the Quakers resolve to come back to Boston, from which place they had been excluded on pain of death; and among them are Rose Halifax, despite the entreaties of her lover to fly to some State where they were tolerated, and her leader and teacher, Mary Dyar. The Governor, John Endicott, is a Quaker-baiter of the most hardened description; and to return to Boston in the face of his prohibitions is little less than to court death. Nevertheless they persevere, Mary Dyar, in the face of her husband's entreaties to stay with him in Rhode Island (where the Quakers are safe), and Rose Halifax, notwithstanding Simon's entreaties. The Quakers are all arrested; and on the next "meeting-day" the divine who preaches to the assembled Puritans advises them to kill the Quakers as soon as may be, whereupon Simon rushes out of the church, to the great scandal of the congregation. His conjuring soon after comes to his aid, especially the trick of the shining hand, by which, after blowing out the lights in the council-room, he terrifies the assembled magistrates of the city. Nevertheless the Governor is not diverted from his purpose. Rose Halifax is condemned to be branded and sold as a slave. Thereupon Simon sets fire to the House of Correction, in which she is confined, intending to save her in the confusion which it would cause; but he breaks into her cell only to find her lying dead. He does not deny the charge of arson when it is made against him, but escapes from his guards and takes again to the woods. A short time after Mary Dyar and other Quakers are executed. Justice Warren's daughter, who has been engaged to marry one Captain Keith, in due time does so, after he has gone with other settlers to the island of Nantucket. Simon lives a vagabond life in the woods, and finally falls ill. He is found there by Eliot, the missionary to the Indians, by whom he is converted from his heathenish ways, and he finally makes an edifying end. Most of the other personages in the book come to good.

The story is a very slight and immature production, and overflows with conversations on religious subjects; many of its pages read like a penny tract. There is in it none of the genius which, in the person of Dinah Morris, brings early Methodism so vividly before our eyes. We see with regret such subjects treated at all in a novel, unless they are treated with a power such as that with which George Eliot was able to handle them. Nevertheless, the intentions of the writer are good, and if, as we imagine, this is the first effort of a young novelist, we may hope for something stronger in the future.

NEW PRINTS.

PEOPLE who used to prophesy about the effects of steam and photography must be sadly disappointed. Railways were to ruin our breed of horses. Photographs were to ruin engraving, and much more than engraving. One kind of art has been seriously affected, but, so far as we know, only one—namely, miniature-painting. But the exhibitions abound as much as ever with portraits. It is a fact that for decorative purposes photographs are seldom used. And it cannot be asserted that even line-engraving, the highest branch of the art, is yet extinct. Meanwhile a new and wonderful advance has been made in chromo-lithography and in wood engraving, both of them having been, not ruined, but greatly assisted by photography. And, to go still further, a system of photographic engraving has been invented and brought to such perfection that even a skilled eye cannot distinguish without some aid, such as the paper-mark, between ancient and modern, the true and the false. The old German engravers, such as Dürer and his pupils, or Lucas van Leyden, or Marc Antonio Raimondi, are peculiarly susceptible to this kind of treatment, and a great French firm has issued portly volumes containing absolute facsimiles of prints, of which few collectors, however long their purses, can hope to possess the originals. The art of the etcher can also be wonderfully imitated, but the imitation does not come up to the level of a facsimile. Side by side with photography and its many modern branches, we see engraving flourishing, not as it did before photography, but far more, in production more abundant, in excellence not far, if at all, behind. The number of illustrated periodicals testifies to the number of people who take pleasure in this kind of art, for picture-books seldom contain photographs, and all kinds of engraving are used. The translation of a coloured picture into a black-and-white print, where only the gradations of a single pigment, black, must be used to give the effect of red, yellow, and blue, is of course something more than an art in itself. The translator may not be colour-blind, but he must use his sense of colour in such a way as to place himself in the position of one who is. There is a serious drawback in this. A poor painter may succeed in producing what will look very well in an engraving.

the high rank of Sir Edwin Landseer, yet, were we candid, there are but few of us who would not confess to a feeling of disappointment, after familiarity with, say, the "Monarch of the Glen," or any other, which Thomas Landseer engraved, when we saw the original for the first time. Landseer's frequently spotty colouring accounts for a good deal of this result, but Turner, on the whole, looks better in his book-vignettes and his "Liber Studiorum" than in any except two or three of his pictures in the National Gallery.

For this reason, too, such an engraving as the portrait of Sir Stafford Northcote, which is before us, is eminently satisfactory. Mr. Long's picture has no more colour, or very little more, than the engraving. The likeness is excellent; and, after all, in a portrait of this kind the likeness is the chief thing. The engraving, a mezzotint, is by Mr. T. L. Atkinson, and is published by Messrs. Agnew. We have several other portraits before us, but they are not those of modern celebrities, and are valuable more as works of art than as portraits. Of these Messrs. Goupil's photogravure, after Reynolds, claims the first place. It is certainly wonderful as a development of photography, and not less wonderful from its fidelity, on the one hand, to the picture from which it is taken, and, on the other, to the traditions of ordinary mezzotint. The picture of "Catherine, Lady Cornewall," was exhibited at the Academy in the Winter Exhibition of 1882-3. This large print has, we understand, been considered so successful that a series of similar engravings after Sir Joshua may be expected to follow. Several other photogravures issued by Messrs. Goupil are also before us. The "Départ pour la Pêche" and the "Retour de la Pêche," both after Weber, are fine pictures of sea and sky. A charming domestic scene, in which some children are represented playing with an old woman, presumably their grandmother, who submits while they place "a feather in her cap," will be much admired by lovers of English "genre." The painting from which it is taken is by Mr. John Morgan, and was exhibited last summer in the Royal Academy. Another picture in the same Academy was Mr. Joseph Clark's "Three Little Kittens," which represented three lovely little girls—or shall we say one little girl, for they are all too obviously from the same model—taking shelter from a shower under a very worn umbrella. Each child holds a kitten in her arms. The print is admirable, but shows more trace perhaps of its photographic origin than can be seen in "A Feather in her Cap." There is nothing but praise possible for "Marsh Lands," a large engraving by the same process after Cecil Lawson's picture exhibited at the Grosvenor in the winter of 1882. The effect of the original is wonderfully preserved, in spite of its translation from green and brown into black and white. Facsimiles of water-colours are among Messrs. Goupil's most successful effects. Two of the most delicate kind, almost defying detection, are "Baladin" and "Ballerine," after Louis Leloir; a melancholy interest attaches to them, as Leloir died when they were on the eve of publication. Another facsimile is in monochrome, after an exquisite crayon drawing by Cabanel, entitled "The Doves," a beautiful girl with her pets.

We now turn to a wholly different class of work. Etching has made great strides of late years, and no etcher has contributed more directly to its success than Mr. Waltner. His "Willem Daey," after the Rembrandt portrait which Baron G. de Rothschild bought at the sale of the Van Loon gallery, is a sombre but delicate and careful work. The companion, "Madame Daey," is as an etching the most pleasing of the two, but both, no doubt, aim at being not only engravings after pictures by Rembrandt, but also in some sense imitations of Rembrandt's manner of etching. Regarded thus they are very commendable; but we confess to a certain feeling of want of interest in the subjects.

Mr. Lefevre, of King Street, has just published three very important engravings. The largest is from Mlle. Rosa Bonheur's "Lion at Home." It was etched in by the lamented W. H. Simmons, who died before he got any further. A search had been made for another engraver competent to do as well as Simmons had done in his "Old Monarch" a lion's head, also after Rosa Bonheur. Specimen engravings were submitted to the great artist herself, and she selected Mr. T. L. Atkinson. He has justified the choice, and produced a magnificent piece of work. Mr. Atkinson's prints after Landseer are well known, and he may be said to walk more nearly in the footsteps of Thomas Landseer than any other living mezzotint engraver. Mlle. Bonheur is, we understand, well pleased with the work—and, in truth, she could hardly be otherwise. The vast size of this engraving must make printing very difficult and slow. "In the Time of Constantine" is a line-engraving by Mr. Auguste Blanchard, after the picture by Mr. Alma Tadema, exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1879, and again at the Grosvenor last winter. The subject is amusing. A degenerate Roman is being amused by a foreigner who has trained a terrier to go through various performances. To carry out the idea the Arch of Constantine is shown in the background, and through the arch the fountain believed to have stood near the Colosseum. In the distance are the Baths of Titus. The choice of line for an engraving giving so many minute details is obviously judicious, and Mr. Blanchard has succeeded extremely well, except, we venture to think, in rendering the marble statue of the "Boy Extracting a Thorn," which stands above the Roman's head, and which is a little hard and black. A fault of this kind, if it is a fault, mends itself as the printing goes on, and, no doubt, it is often necessary in fine engraving to sacrifice a certain amount of the early effect, in order to secure the permanence of the plate. Mr. Lefevre's third print is an etching by M. Lhuillier, after Mr. Erskine Nicol's picture in the Academy Exhibition of 1877, "His Legal Adviser." An Irish farmer in a great grey frieze coat is telling the story of his wrongs to a lawyer, who looks very much as if he thought his time was being wasted. The etching is well and thoroughly done, and leaves nothing to be desired. It is clear and silvery in the high lights, and full of depth in the black portions, the lawyer's velvet coat for example.

From the publishers of the Art Journal we have received a very charming proof of Mr. Lumb Stock's fine line-engraving after Mr. Millais's picture of the "Princes in the Tower," a picture which loses little, if anything, by being transcribed, so to speak, in black and white. The same firm have also sent us an etching by Mr. C. O. Murray of the "Dante and Beatrice" of Mr. Holiday. The colour of the original, which was exhibited last year in the Grosvenor Gallery, was somewhat too staring and crude. The etching, therefore, as we remarked above of certain other pictures, gives the idea of representing a much more harmonious work. Messrs. Dowdeswell have published a most admirable print after M. Andreotti, representing an old fiddler holding out his hat for his pay. It is, we believe, executed by a process analogous to Messrs. Goupil's photogravure.

SHROPSHIRE FOLK-LORE.*

THE editor of Tales from the West Highlands, Mr. Campbell of Islay, has collected variants of popular tales in Hyde Park, and little nigger children have been heard singing the ballad of Hugh of Lincoln in a New York slum. The blossom of a legend may blow anywhere, even "among the chops and steaks"; but we are certainly surprised at the richness of Miss Burne's collection from Shropshire. The stories, legends, and superstitions were gathered in the first place by Miss Jackson, during her search for peculiarities of dialect. Miss Jackson bequeathed her papers to Miss Burne, who has edited and greatly added to them. It is pleasant to find that education has not yet banished goblins, ghosts, and fairies from Shropshire, a county on the borders of Wales, the proper home of fairies. Even Voltaire, who had not a retrograde kind of spirit, regretted the flight of the elves before reason, which tristement s'accrédite; and, fortified by such an example, we may hope that it will be long before School Boards drive ghosts and fays out of Shropshire. Perhaps the sooner the witch and the fortune-tellers go the better. The witch has been known, quite recently, to make a little West-country village uninhabitable. The people petitioned the squire to get rid of the woman, so he paid her a visit. She did not deny that she was a witch, indeed she showed some professional pride. "Well," said the squire, "you know what the Bible says, 'Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live in the Parish,'" the latter part of the text being a pious interpolation. So the woman went, stipulating that she was to receive 3*s.* 9*d.*, a pair of shoes, and a brace of rabbits. This seemed a cheap way of getting rid of a lady who had several familiar spirits which ran in and out of her sleeves, and the parish is now unmolested by necromancy. On the Congo, as Mr. Johnstone shows in his new book, this woman would have been burned to death, or hacked to pieces with blunt knives. The countryfolk, in many nooks of England, are precisely in the mental condition of the great Bantu tribe. With us, fortunately, the squire is a power, and the official witch-finder has been extinct for a century and a half.

The real interest of collections like Miss Burne's lies less in the tales themselves, which in one shape or other have often been told, than in the study of the psychological condition which produces or retains the beliefs. We have been almost startled by the prevalence in Shropshire of the idea that the ghosts of men generally appear in the forms of animals. Miss Burne says, "I believe this to have originated in the classical and mediæval notion of Werwolves, living men who could assume the form of a wolf at pleasure. Sometimes also a corpse would arise from its grave in the form of a wolf." Miss Burne gives, as an example, King John, who "is said to have gone about as a Werwolf after his death." For this appropriate exploit of King John's she only quotes Kelly's Indo-European Traditions—a reference to an original authority would be more useful. We think Miss Burne's explanation of the theriomorphic Shropshire ghost as a result of the classical and mediæval belief in lycanthropy is inadequate. That belief is always explained by the etymologists as the result of an unconscious pun on λύκος and λευκός. People (they say) originally made a statement about "the white light," and their descendants, forgetting the meaning, applied the remark to the wolf. As Sir A. C. Lyall writes "to those who live in a country where wicked people and witches are constantly taking the form of wild beasts, the explanation of Lycanthropy by a confusion between Leukos and Lukos seems wanton." It is improbable that a series of unconscious puns should have turned an original belief about light into a series of superstitions about ghosts taking almost all animal forms. The form of the wolf is only that most commonly assumed by the mediæval and late classical sorcerer. Mr. McLennan pointed out that the animal into which man transformed himself or his neighbours varied in various districts. England, Wales, Ireland, Southern France, and Central Europe prefer the wolf. In Northern Europe the bear is almost as commonly chosen. In Persia, too, the bear is the favoured shape; in Japan, the fox; in West Africa, the leopard; in Scotland, the hare; among the Abipones, the tiger; among the Arawaks, the jaguar; on the Zambesi, the lion. Here, then, is a reply ready made to the solar-mythology people. "Whence," they ask, "came the notions that men were changed into wolves, bears, birds, and not into lions, fishes, or reptiles?" This only proves that the mythologist does not know his own subject; for men are metamorphosed into lions and serpents (as among the Zulus), though less frequently into fishes. The mythologist, not knowing the facts, answers that bears and wolves were chosen for the luminosity of their coats! As the wolf, though glossy enough to be the sun, is also dark enough to be the night when required, he is a useful beast to the mythologist.

Turning from the belief in the lycanthropy of the living to the belief in theriomorphic ghosts of the dead, we first find the great, widely-distributed doctrine of metempsychosis. That doctrine, in its philological shape, is, like the Platonic theory of ideas, an elaborated piece of savage superstition. In Mexico the souls of men killed in battle change, after four years, into brilliant birds (Sahagun, p. 226). A somewhat similar belief occurs in a fragment of Menander (Meineke, 222). Among the Andaman islanders, the dead "vanished from the earth in the shape of various animals and fishes." The ghosts of the Egyptian dead could assume what shapes they chose. Among the Thlinkits, the ghosts of Shamans take the shape of the raven. The Zulus revere a certain kind of serpents as the ghosts of their dead.

Turning from these outlandish peoples to Shropshire, we find that it is the rule rather than the exception for revenants to "come again" in animal shape. Wild Edric, a legendary hero, "haunts the Stretton hills in the form of a large dog with black fiery eyes." "Sarah Mason could tell of no less than three places haunted by animal ghosts in her immediate neighbourhood. A man who hanged himself at Broomfield, near Shrewsbury, 'came again' in the form of a large black dog. A headless black dog haunts the road between Yeaton and Baschurch." A lady whose dead body was robbed (she had been buried with her jewels) walks in equine shape; they call her "Obrick's colt." On June 11, 1881, near Condover, a lady and her maid saw "the know of a dog"—that is, the Idea—"the look, or semblance of a thing, as opposed to the reality," say Liddell and Scott. As to the colt, he "growed so bould that folks sidden him in the daytime." The ghost of a man who was drowned in the Birmingham and Liverpool canal "comes again" in the form of a strange black creature, known locally as "the man monkey." At Bagbury the ghost took the appearance of a roaring bull, but this ghost was laid, by his own request, in "a prill o' waiter as divides the sheeres." The bull had been a very bad man, but when his performance as a bull-ghost grew too severe, a number of parsons ran him to earth in a church, with candles and all the proper articles on such occasions used. "The bull made such a bust that he cracked the wall of the church from the top to the bottom." At last they got the bull down, and as he was compressible, like the Arabian goni, they shut him up in a snuff box and laid him under Bagbury bridge. As a rule the ghost was laid in a bottle, and one of these bottles lay outside a tomb in the present century. One tale shows how a villager often saw a spectre, but dared not address it, not on account of its spiritual estate, but "because he thought it had been the squire." The divinity that doth hedge a squire survives even in death. "It is not an invariable rule that ghosts should take the form of animals," there are exceptions, but the theriomorphic revenant is the more common.

The European belief in beast-ghosts is not confined to Shropshire. Several examples are gravely adduced in Mrs. Crowe's Night Side of Nature. M. d'Assier, the positivist author of an argument for the existence of bogies, gives several theriomorphic cases in France. This scientific author seriously suggests that when a man's ghost appears in the semblance of a ghost, it may be an instance of Atavism, or "throwing back." We were evolved out of the lower animal forms, to which, after death, we return. This scientific view has been anticipated by certain savages, whose dead reappear in animal shapes, or Totems, from which they claim descent.

The animal ghosts illustrate much the most savage and antique portion of popular belief in Shropshire, and the extreme antiquity of the superstition gives it an unusual importance. A legend (p. 41) of "a milk-white milch cow, which travelled all round the world," has parallels in South African narratives. Among bogies we have the brownie, which "flitted" with the farmer, a story current in many parts of Europe. Brownies also take animal forms in Shropshire, that deliciously backward county. Miss Burne alludes to the theory that elves are a tradition of an earlier shy people, sometimes taking service with an invading and more powerful race. The brownie, more probably, is all that survives of the ancient ancestral spirit of the hearth. The fairies, in Wales, have this trace of the Stone age about them, that they vanish at the touch of iron, as we read in Professor Rhys's Welsh fairy tales in Cymmrodorion. But iron was a magical substance that frightened ghosts and spirits, even to the mind of the scholiast on the Odyssey; and, as Mr. Tylor points out, "the Oriental" jinn are in deadly terror of iron. It does not follow that the jinn are the remains of a people in the Stone age, and we think that explanation is applied far too freely to the fairies. These queer beings are but faintly remembered in Shropshire. John Thomas (his name is Welsh) said to Miss Burne, "Don you mean little things as come in the night-time, and sing and whistle, and make music, and dance on the common and such places? But they bin harmless. Fairies they call'n them. I've heerd o' them, but I never knew any one see them." Nor did we, except people under eight years of age, and ignorant of the nature of an oath. If fairies were forgotten, children would invent them again; for children live in the mythopœic age.

We look forward with interest to Miss Burne's next volume. Her first instalment is a model of what intelligent antiquarianism ought to be.

ESSAYS BY GEORGE ELIOT.*

IT is pleasant, in these days when literary executors seem to think it their first duty to publish whatever the testator would not have published if he or she had been in his or her right mind, to be able to begin the review of a posthumous publication by a compliment to those who are immediately responsible for it. This issue of a revised edition of some of George Eliot's early anonymous essays, with an appendix of some unpublished notes, has been drawn up, we are told, in accordance with written directions of George Eliot herself, except as far as the notes are concerned; while in these latter there is absolutely nothing which she or any judicious friend of hers was at all likely to wish suppressed. The notes, indeed, contain some reflections on "the vanity and idleness which draw many a young gentleman into reviewing," and so forth—reflections at which reviewers may smile a little, remembering how it was said, truly or falsely, that George Eliot, reviewer as she had been, was rather exceptionally sensitive to criticism. But Theophrastus Such and the novels contained other reflections of the same kind; and there is neither any reason for supposing that the author would have cancelled them, nor any for objecting to their publication. George Eliot is not the only person who has shown—more in accordance with human nature than with strict consistency—a lively sense of the difference between construing the verb cædere and construing the phrase præbere crura. But these "Leaves from a Note-Book" are not very many, and though they are interesting specimens of the detached thoughts that may be worked up in novel or essay later, there is perhaps no single one of them that attains to the full dignity of a representative pensée. The best is, perhaps, that on the responsibility of authorship, which puts well and sharply, and without injustice to either side, the difference between journalism and book-writing, and the Nemesis that waits on those who confuse the former with the latter.

The major essays of the book are seven in number—four from the Westminster Review, one from the Fortnightly, one from Fraser, and one from Blackwood. The Fraser article, on "Three Months in Weimar," is an agreeable, but not very remarkable, record of personal impressions, and need not be further noticed. Of the others, a review of Mr. Lecky's History of Rationalism dates from 1865, and the curious "Felix Holt's Address to Working Men" after Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill appeared in Blackwood in 1868. But the Westminster Review papers were all published between 1855 and 1857—that is to say, before the writer was known at all as a novelist. They bear some marks of re-writing, but not many, and on the whole they exhibit very noticeably their author's merits and defects as a writer and thinker, though, of course, they do not at all illustrate her narrative faculty or her ability to conceive and draw character. In matter of style, hardly any pages in this volume show her at her worst—that is to say, indulging in the detestable pseudo-scientific jargon of Daniel Deronda. But the beginnings of that vice (which, indeed, are traceable in the Scenes of Clerical Life) are clear enough here. There are also noteworthy examples of her other main fault—the tendency to ring the changes on an idea till it becomes tiresome. Here is one:—

> The conventional countryman of the stage, who picks up pocket-books and never looks into them, and who is too simple even to know that honesty has its opposite, represents the still lingering mistake, that an unintelligible dialect is a guarantee for ingenuousness, and that slouching shoulders indicate an upright disposition. It is quite true that a thresher is likely to be innocent of any adroit arithmetical cheating, but he is not the less likely to carry home his master's corn in his shoes and pocket; a reaper is not given to writing begging-letters, but he is quite capable of cajoling the dairymaid into filling his small-beer bottle with ale. The selfish instincts are not subdued by the sight of buttercups, nor is integrity in the least established by that classic rural occupation, sheep-washing. To make men moral, something more is requisite than to turn them out to grass.

Here everything after "disposition" is simply a translation of one phrase into successively different imagery.

The matter of these essays is, however, more interesting than the manner. Two of them—that on Young, better known, perhaps, by its jingling title, "Worldliness and Other-Worldliness," and that on Dr. Cumming—illustrate very strongly the deeply-rooted prejudices which made George Eliot a writer as one-sided as a Jesuit writing against Jansenists, or as Dr. Cumming himself denouncing Cardinal Wiseman. Certainly there is plenty to be said against Young for his sycophancy, his ceaseless plea of preferment, and the detestable verses which he permitted himself to write when he was capable of writing very admirable ones. Neither will any of the galled geese who sometimes hiss at this periodical accuse us of being predisposed to take up the cudgels for Dr. Cumming. Yet these two luckless divines undoubtedly experience at George Eliot's hands the unfairly hard measure which is commonly described as a "dead set," and this is in both cases clearly traceable to a kind of personal animus on the part of the writer. The reader is at no loss to discover why this is. It is not by his bad verses (for she has shown a rather unusual critical faculty in separating them from the good and doing justice to the latter) that "good Dr. Young" has incurred George Eliot's displeasure, nor by his atrocious bad taste in thrusting a clumsy panegyric of Queen Anne into a poem on the Last Day, nor by his general tuft-hunting and toad-eating. What she cannot away with is his constant denunciation in verse of her own favourite doctrine of the independence of morality from the belief in a future state of rewards and punishments. If the author of the Night Thoughts had not dared this immane nefas, and dared it in verse of which his enraged critic cannot but admit the grandeur, it becomes tolerably obvious to the amused reader of this essay that he might have panegyrized Wharton and pestered Secker for preferment without drawing down any thunderbolts as far as the author of Adam Bede is concerned. So, again, in a very rhetorical exordium imitated closely from the style of Macaulay, she takes the late prophet of Crown Court to task for his uncharitable handling of Romanists, Puseyites, and infidels. But here again it is very soon evident that, if Dr. Cumming had not been so severe on the latter class, he might have discoursed on the Scarlet Woman, and made out the mark of the Beast on Oxford High Churchmen unchecked by George Eliot. His unpardonable sin is a variety of Young's: he enforces morality from the "love of God" point of view, and declares (as for the matter of that many theologians much more orthodox and intelligent than himself have declared) that actions not done with a definitely religious motive are not, religiously speaking, good. This is taking George Eliot on another of her weak points, and Dr. Cumming has a very sound rating for it. Far be it from us to say that the rating is generally undeserved. But the point of interest and amusement is to notice that the rater delivers it evidently from a purely personal point of view. The characteristics of the furens femina are present here, as elsewhere; and criticism, ceasing to be a matter of application of principles in logic and æsthetics, becomes one of personal retaliation.

The essay least worth reprinting in the book is, however, not these, but the review of Mr. Lecky. Here the author has been tempted into expatiations which are long enough to take the article out of the category of brief reviews without putting it into that of exhaustive ones. She accuses Mr. Lecky of not being sure of his standpoint: but she herself seems to have written the article in two minds. One is that of the mere compte-rendu giver, the other that of the essayist who wishes to discuss the word "rationalism" and its accompanying illustrations in history. On the other hand, "The Natural History of German Life," which is based on the works of Professor Riehl (an author not much known in England, though a selection from him has recently appeared in the Pitt Press Series), is very good and interesting. George Eliot's early knowledge of English country life, which appeared to such advantage in her first and best novels, is well shown here; while her acquaintance with Germany, Germans, and German was intimate enough to give her special treatment of Riehl's work value. The Felix Holt "Address to Working Men" is, again, not so good. All but the foolish fanatics who took George Eliot for a prose Shakspeare must have noticed that her grasp of practical politics was singularly vague and weak; and this fault reappears here, complicated with the other fault which in 1868 was beginning to grow upon her—that of pedantic language. Practically, the address is a very well-meaning sermon, exhorting the newly-enfranchised voters not to be revolutionary, not to be selfish, and so forth. George Eliot was as sarcastic as most people on clerical sermons; but it would be difficult for any cleric to preach a more unpractical one than she delivered here.

The one paper as yet unnoticed, though perhaps less generally attractive than the Weimar sketch and the Riehl essay, is one of much merit. It is doubly headed "German Wit" and "Heinrich Heine." In the general remarks on wit and humour with which it opens the writer is not extraordinarily happy, because she has fallen into the fault of considering rather the products of the two things than the two things themselves. Nor can the general proposition that humour is earlier and simpler than wit be for a moment accepted. It is historically unsustainable, and it has besides the critical fault of bringing about a confusion between humour and horseplay. But, as to Heine himself (who, it must be remembered, was alive, though in the very last stage of his long martyrdom, when it was written), the paper is very satisfactory—more satisfactory, perhaps, because less finical than Mr. Matthew Arnold's. Written to-day, it would be a little too apologetic, for Heine needs no apology. He is like all the great writers of the world when the disturbing element of contemporary jealousies has disappeared, justified at once to all who have the wit and the taste to understand him, and it is perfectly unnecessary to justify him to those who have neither. But thirty years ago Heine was still a dreadful person to many, and as his unorthodoxy was not in the least like George Eliot's unorthodoxy (indeed a review of Daniel Deronda by Heine would be one of the most delightful things that any one could fetch up from the shades), she naturally defends him a little with bated breath. It is impossible, too (we must be pardoned for passing into a rather wicked mood, which the very mention of Heine encourages), not to think that she was a little shocked by his relapse into religion, and a belief in ordinary humdrum immortality, instead of topsyturvified "choirs invisible." But the pity for his sufferings (it must be again repeated that he was alive when she wrote) is quite human and womanly, and free from that dreariest form of goody-goodiness, the goody-goodiness of Positivism, and it is expressed in thoroughly good taste. The appreciation of his unmatched faculty of effortless sarcasm is quite satisfactory; the appreciation of his passion and prose poetry a little less so perhaps, but still good. George Eliot herself had too much dread and dislike of passion proper (or improper, if anybody likes) to be openly enthusiastic over it in the author of Mein süsses Lieb' wenn du im Grab and scores of other burning poems. But she reads him no lectures for them—at least none worth speaking of. The essay shows the curious healing power of a real affection for good letters. If it be read last (its actual place is second), it will send the reader away in good humour with his author, even though he may regretfully think how much the world lost by the accidental bent which devoted George Eliot's chief attention of the studious kind to a barren form of private belief or unbelief in religion and morals and to a jejune and pedantic form of science rather than to the green pastures and fertile fields of pure literature.

RECENT DIVINITY.*

THE Delegates of the Clarendon Press propose to issue a series of old Latin Biblical MSS., under the competent editorship of Professor Wordsworth; and a larger scheme of his own is an edition of the Latin Vulgate of the New Testament. Students will be interested to learn that the MS. selected as the first of the series—the St. Germain MS. in the National Library at Paris—was pronounced by Bentley "to be the very best in Paris," and by John Walker ("Clarissimus Walker"), in a letter to Bentley in 1720, the best of those he had met with. Mr. Wordsworth assigns it to about the middle of the ninth century; but gives up the task of deciphering the monogram which indicates the writer. The square, vellum-bound volume which contains this text is the second volume of a Bible of which the first was lost more than two hundred years, and was first noticed by Robert Stephens in the sixteenth century. Though it ranks as an old text, it was found by Walker to differ very much from all MSS. he had previously collated, especially in the Gospels, but that not a tenth of its various readings had been noted by Stephens. This is a result easily intelligible if the hypothesis of the editor is correct, that it is an eclectic text made up by "excerpting now a piece from one MS. and now from another." Some of its individualities are remarkable omissions—e.g. St. Matt. xii. 31, about blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, though it is by no means unique in this omission. The following are less common:—xiv. 11, "the damsel gave it to her mother"; x. 19, "it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak"; in xxiii. 35 the words "the son of Barachias" are added by a later hand, and the writer seems to have avoided the snare of this very common blunder, which has found its way into our Authorized Version. Carefully compiled appendices give lists of the texts employed by Stephens and Erasmus, and of the Latin and Greek texts collated by Walker for Bentley; and Youngman's many corrections of the "Mendosa Collatio" of Martianay complete this scholarly reprint.

We venture to guess that most of the purchasers of The Yoke of Christ, if they do not know the Bishop of Rochester's manner, will find what they do not expect in his book. We do not quarrel with it on that account, but welcome the assertion on the title-page of the truth which he intends to force home—"the perfect fusion of morality and religion into one homogeneous whole." Preachers would do well to follow his example, and let criticism and "science" alone for a while. The six essays which make up the volume are the ripe fruit of twenty years' meditation, and they have the "nuttiness" of age about them. The Bishop sometimes veils his insight, earnestness, and genuine feeling under anecdotes, epigrams, and quotations, but they make his book not the less pleasant to read, and tend insensibly to attain his aim of claiming the whole area of life as the object of Christian teaching and the arena of Christian endeavour.

Readers accustomed to the ordinary kind of religious teaching, and anticipating some special sanctity in episcopal utterances, will be surprised, if not a little scandalized, at some of the minutiæ which help to add to the burden and enhance the privilege of bearing "the yoke of Christ." How to receive letters, and how to write them; how to deal with anonymous letters; whether one ought to buy a picture or take a tour; whether it is wise or necessary to keep accounts; what amount of service and devotion a wife may give and a husband receive—"women should never be squaws"—how they should comport themselves to one another's relations; these and many more duties are discussed for the most part in a way which will commend itself to sensible people, and the advice is enriched with extracts enough to show that the Bishop's scanty leisure has not been given wholly to writing. Most readers will gather something from the mature thoughts of a man who has looked all round his subjects and is by no means afraid on any occasion to say what he thinks.

Dean Stanley's name and the five editions of his History of the Eastern Church absolve a reviewer from the task of criticism or commendation of his book in the new form in which Mr. Murray has presented it—an edition easy to hold in the hand, comparatively cheap to buy, and not too difficult for middle-aged eyes to read. The picture of the Nicene Council is enough to sell the volume, and to make the purchaser content with his outlay.

Clifton College is fortunate in its Head-master, and if those sermons represent, as he says they do in his preface, "the total religious influence of the school," it is fortunate in other respects also. It is a difficult thing to write sermons for schoolboys; to go on week after week with practical warning and exhortation without condescending to mere picturesqueness, and without wearying such very business-like hearers as schoolboys are. On the other side is the danger of the repeated iteration of schoolboy faults. A public schoolboy of our acquaintance said not long ago, after a Sunday morning service in the holidays, "I liked Mr. ——'s sermon so much; we're so tired of hearing about our vices at school." Mr. Wilson knows how to hit the blots of school life without monotonous harping and without letting himself degenerate into a pulpit scold. His secret is his reality: his hearers profess and call themselves Christians, and it is the preacher's business to show how the lowliest duties flow from the sublimest truths, how the paltriest vices are incompatible with the loftiest profession. Mr. Wilson has further mastered the difficult art of being plain-spoken without being undignified, of being at once commonplace and elevated, practical and spiritual.

The author of Charles Lowder has given another religious biography to the world. The subject of the present memoir, the Rev. James Skinner, the well-known curate of St. Barnabas and Warden of Newland, is the same type of man as the subject of the earlier sketch, differing rather in circumstances than in quality of mind and character. Both belonged to the same school of thought, both had the same ardent convictions, both the same outspoken plainness of speech, both the same tenderness of heart. But, while self-denying work formed the discipline of the one, ill-health and domestic sorrows were the trial of the other.

Records of sickness and death make a kind of black edge round the narrative of home life, and the continual recurrence of names of such localities as Cairo, Mentone, Pontresina, Bath, and Clifton as winter refuges are suggestive of regular interruptions of work and of opportunities of seclusion which Mr. Skinner knew how to use. With the same "genius for godliness" which marked Charles Lowder he had a greater faculty of expression, not only as a preacher, but as a writer, and from his well-stocked library fought the battle of his party, and "reproved, rebuked, and exhorted" the nearer objects of his pastoral care. Side by side with what was, on the whole, and in spite of bereavements, the peaceful current of his personal life, runs the troubled stream of ecclesiastical polemics all through the book, for his life (from 1818 to 1881) just covered the period of the new Church movement in England. He was almost old enough in 1833 to understand the aim of the writers of the "Tracts" at their very commencement, and he lived long enough to see all that they contended for, in practice if not in law, conceded. So it is not surprising that his biography is redolent of controversy. It takes us over the too familiar ground of the troubles at St. Barnabas and the dismissal of Mr. Bennett, the question of vestments, and the almost abandoned struggle against altar-cloths of hues varying with the season; and it is easy enough to see throughout how hopeless it was to expect that any modus vivendi could be arrived at between Mr. Bennett and Mr. Skinner on the one side and Bishop Blomfield on the other. The Bishop's judicial mind and administrative power were a needed and salutary force in London, but he was born a little too soon; he could not adapt himself to the new ideas; his mind was rather strong than wide; he attempted the impossible, and tried to make his own views the rule of ritual in his diocese. There may be some interest in reviving memories of half-forgotten strife, and in looking at them with less partial eyes; but it is a question whether all this matter is not out of place in a personal narrative, at all events whether a good deal of it is not. It is often said that biography is a lost art, and we fear we must say that this book is another illustration of the saying. A great part of it consists of what its readers knew well before; for those who do not know it belong mainly to that portion of the religious world who will not read the life of Mr. Skinner, or are those who "care for none of these things."

Professor Momerie has done well to publish his sermons; they are good reading and will be useful to the principal purchasers of sermons, who we take it are the clergy, and for an obvious reason. But we must give purchasers a word of caution. The title of the volume is misleading; the sermons are not about "the origin of evil," only the first deals with that topic. This is an objectionable practice; there is no meaning in the title of a book unless it gives some clue to its contents. It may be hard to hit upon an [illegible] This, no doubt, is a minute criticism, but it is worth making, because the practice is common—more, possibly, through the fault of publishers than of writers. Sermons preached by a professor of logic might naturally be expected to appeal mainly to the reason, and this is a characteristic of the book. It consists of courses of sermons grouped under five general heads and dealing with practical subjects. Without being strikingly original, they are fresh, outspoken (sometimes rather plain-spoken), and fearless, even on some of the burning questions between the Naturalists and Supernaturalists, and so are a real contribution to the side of common-sense religion from their clear and pointed statements of obvious truths. In dealing with such mysterious questions as the origin of evil and the efficacy of prayer, it is of course only possible to speak from the human point of view, but it is an advantage to have the absurdities of common objections stated in a lively and attractive manner, and reasonable grounds for belief suggested, even though from the nature of the case they cannot go to the root of the matter. The sermons, if not inspiring, are convincing, and both style and matter give an impression of a cultured and clear thinking mind. We venture on a word of advice to Professor Momerie. Sermons for the most part are dull, and it is well to enliven the style and enforce the argument by quotations; but there is a limit to quotations, instances, illustrations, and great names, and in favouring his sermons up to the taste of the quarter in which they were preached, we think he has here and there overstepped it.

Dr. Skene need make no apology for a layman writing a Sunday-school manual. Nine-tenths of all the Sunday-school teachers in the United Kingdom are laymen or laywomen, so that his book, which is the result of many years' Sunday lessons, and is meant as a help to his colleagues, comes appropriately from one of those who do almost all the work. He has more qualifications for his task than most Sunday-school teachers. He is familiar with recent Lives of Christ and with the results of English and German criticism, and he has done wisely in not obtruding his learning on the notice of his readers by references or foot-notes. Young pupils believe in their teacher, and any attempt to support his view by other authorities would only diminish the impression of his infallibility, and bewilder minds that have quite as much as they can do in accepting simple assertions.

Dr. Skene's idea is to give a narrative excerpted from the Gospels, and to combine their partial accounts into a complete history in chronological order. He has succeeded in producing a readable, accurate, and instructive book; but one adapted only for the higher, or the highest, classes in Sunday-schools, and perhaps more useful to teachers than to scholars. It has the all but universal defect of books—it is too long, and too long mainly because the author has too fully elaborated the details. He has given, for instance, the Hebrew names of all the parts of the Synagogue service. In another matter he has not been faithful to his own ideal. In his preface he dwells upon the superiority of "the terse and graphic descriptions of the Gospels" over recent biographies of Christ, and yet this is how he paraphrases:—"And Mary arose in those days and went into the hill-country in haste, into a city of Juda, and entered into the house of Zacharias and saluted Elizabeth." "Her natural impulse under this great revelation was to withdraw herself from the circle of her friends and acquaintances at Nazareth, and to confer with her cousin Elizabeth as to the blessings promised to both. She accordingly hastened to visit her cousin. A long journey it was from Nazareth," &c., and so on for four more lines. We venture to think that this is not the thing that is wanted, but a manual about as big as one of Messrs. Macmillan's, written in a "terse and graphic" style, leaving something for the teachers to say of themselves, and not putting every word in their mouths. Perhaps Dr. Skene could devote the time the one or two more volumes necessary to complete his Gospel History will demand, to condensing his matter into a short and cheap little book.

We are familiar with the light shed on the Biblical narratives by Assyrian and Babylonian inscriptions, but it seems that this does not exhaust the obligations of theologians to the cuneiform character. It is not only a means of confirming the accuracy of the sacred annals, but is itself the most handy instrument for their interpretation. In this reprint of articles contributed to the Athenæum during the present year Dr. Delitzsch informs us that his study of Assyrian soon convinced him of the importance of the North Semitic languages, Hebrew and Aramaic, to the study of Assyrian. In compiling his Assyrian dictionary the action proved to be reciprocal, and, by the light of its own literature, Assyrian revealed an entirely new foundation for the understanding of the Old Testament, and assigned to many stems a meaning far different from that arrived at by the old system—namely, comparison with the Arabic. The facts he brings forward—instances of more than one hundred Hebrew words and fifteen Aramaic—materially change our views on the affinity of various Semitic languages and compel us to admit that Arabic cannot be the prototype of these languages, least of all of Hebrew. This is a discovery which must revolutionize Hebrew scholarship, and demands a searching revision, if not thorough recasting, of Hebrew lexicons. The days of Gesenius seem to be numbered; and if, as Dr. Delitzsch says, there are scarcely a hundred proper names in this Lexicon which do not challenge criticism, and if, as he further says, a considerable number of post-exilic names receive a satisfactory explanation from the corresponding Babylonian names, the time and the man and the discovery have arrived together, and the work may be begun. It is much to be rebenefit of this new light, for there are still a large number of passages, some of the highest importance, which have received very divergent and far from satisfactory explanations at the hands of commentators; and what chance is there of another revision, even if the method of Dr. Delitzsch yields all the results which he anticipates? It is true that his view is not unchallenged, and Professor Dillmann evidently thinks that he is riding away on his cuneiform hobby, or wielding it as a "wand" which will even disclose to him the site of Paradise.

GEMS OF CHINESE LITERATURE.*

A CHINAMAN is nothing if not literary. It is the one accomplishment which he and his ancestors before him have cultivated above all others, and it is the one in which he chiefly excels. It is the key which opens the door to official life and is the passport for admittance into cultivated society. Fighting has no charms for him, and, unlike his Aryan fellow-men, he regards the military profession with a considerable amount of contempt. Even among the unlettered class little enthusiasm is aroused by deeds of warlike prowess, however daring they may be, but the winner of either of the four highest grades in the examinations, Chwang yuen, Pang yen, T'an hwa, or Chuen lu, becomes at once a popular hero. Natural inclination, personal interest, and popular feeling are thus all on the side of literature, and the result is that letters as letters are held in higher esteem in China than in any other country in the world. From this it follows that nine-tenths of the youth of China devote themselves with praiseworthy diligence to imitate the established literary models, and, without ceasing, "plough with their pencils" in the agonies of composition. But, like all virtues, this absorbing diligence has its corresponding fault, and when, as in the case of the Chinese race, it is combined with a sluggish imagination and a contracted field of observation, it is apt to reduce the art it strives after to the level of a mechanical science. A slavish regard, also, for literary forms and an undue admiration for penmanship are signs and tokens of the same degradation, at the same time that they help to produce it.

The result of all this is to give to the productions of Chinese littérateurs an artificial and stilted effect, although there is much in the polite literature which, as Mr. Giles shows, is readable enough. In our Western pride we are apt to think that on turning from Europe there is nothing produced which is worth reading; and when, therefore, we find, as in China, a considerable amount of literary skill existing among a people, our first tendency is to break forth in admiration and to extol it to the skies—just as we are disposed to over-esteem the evidences of mechanical skill or the traces of civilization among tribes which are believed incapable of them. This, no doubt, is a generous instinct, and it is this which has led most of the few who have dived into the writings of Chinese authors to hold them in high estimation. The unaffected admiration, also, with which the Chinese regard not only their literature, but their civilization, philosophy, and, in fact, everything that belongs to them, exercises an unconscious influence on those brought into contact with them. In everyday life a man is, at least at first, accepted at his own estimation, and as it is with individuals so it is with nations.

Mr. Giles is not at one with us in these opinions. He has a genuine admiration for Chinese literature, and praises its beauties in many superlatives. He laments that it is not more widely translated and read, and offers in the present volume some "short extracts from the works of the most famous writers of all ages, upon which time has set an approving seal. These are chronologically arranged, and cover a period extending from B.C. 550 to A.D. 1650—two thousand two hundred years." Some of these are interesting, especially those of the early Taouist philosophers, who, having drawn their inspiration probably from Central Asian States, introduce into their musings metaphysical ideas borrowed from Brahminical philosophy. The leaven of superstitious fancy which was thus introduced into Chinese literature, and later again by the Buddhist missionaries, gave a lightness and a new direction to it which has been a lasting benefit to all succeeding authors and readers. The following is a parable from the writings of Lieh-tsze, a Taouist philosopher of the fourth and fifth centuries B.C., and is called by Mr. Giles "Dream and Reality":—

> A man of the State of Chêng was one day gathering fuel, when he came across a startled deer, which he pursued and killed. Fearing lest any one should see him, he hastily concealed the carcase in a ditch. . . . By and by he forgot the place where he had put it; and, thinking that he must have been dreaming, he set off home, humming over the affair on his way. Meanwhile, a man who had overheard his words acted upon them, and went and got his deer. The latter, when he reached his house, told his wife, saying, "A woodman dreamt that he had got a deer, but he did not know where it was. Now I have got the deer; so his dream was a reality." "It is you who have been dreaming you saw the woodman. Did he get the deer? and is there really such a person? It is you who have got the deer; how then can his dream be a reality?" "It is true," assented the husband, "that I have got the deer. It is therefore of little importance whether the woodman dreamt the deer or I dreamt the woodman." Now, when the woodman reached his home, he became much annoyed at the loss of the deer; and in the night he actually dreamt where the deer then was and who had got it. So next morning he proceeded to the place indicated in his dream, and there it was. He then took legal steps to recover possession; and when the case came on, the magistrate delivered the following judgment:—"The plaintiff began with a real deer and an alleged dream. He now comes forward with a real dream and an alleged deer. The defendant really got the deer which the plaintiff said he dreamt, and is now trying to keep it; while, according to his wife, both the woodman and the deer are but the figments of a dream, so that no one got the deer at all. However, here is a deer, which you had better divide between you."

This is a fair specimen of the writings of the early Taouist philosophers. There is not much in it, but it is lightened by a fancy which is, as a rule, wanting in the works of Chinese authors. Mr. Giles will not agree with us in this—in fact, he holds an exactly opposite opinion. To him Chinese literature is what a relic of Buddha is to the devout Buddhist. To the eye of faith the dull-coloured bead, representing a tear of the Saint, when gazed at long and fervently sparkles and coruscates, and in the same way Mr. Giles sees beauties in Chinese literature which are invisible to others less imbued with admiration for the fancies of Chinese authors. In his enthusiasm he imparts to their works a brilliancy which belongs to himself, and takes out from them beauties which he has first of all put into them. He is thus a cordially sympathetic exponent of the literature, and it may be safely taken for granted that the authors he translates from have never appeared, and will never again appear, in so fascinating a guise as in the pages of the present volume. Having said this we shall be expected to justify it, and this we can only do by quoting a passage from Mr. Giles's pages, and then giving a literal rendering of the original text. When reading the extracts from the writings of Ou-yang Hsiu we were struck by a passage which appeared to contradict much that we have said above. It occurs in "An Autumn Dirge," and is as follows:—

> For Autumn is nature's chief executioner; and its symbol is darkness. It has the temper of steel; and its symbol is a sharp sword. It is the avenging angel, riding upon an atmosphere of death. As spring is the epoch of growth, so autumn is the epoch of maturity:—
> Its trains decay
> And melt away
> In a dying, dying fall.
>
> And sad is the hour when maturity is past; for that which passes its prime must die.

Turning to the original, we find it runs thus:—

Fu ts'iu hing kwan yé, For Autumn is as an avenger of Punishments; Yu shi wei yun yin pung sang yé, in its season it is shadowy and yin in the form of a weapon; Yu hing wei kin shi wei tsan ta chi i Yé, among the [five] elements it is represented by metal, and may therefore be said to be the righteous spirit of Heaven and Earth. Shang i suh shah erh wei sin. Frequently its will or determination appears in a stern and destructive aspect. T'ien chi yu wuh chi'un shang ts'iu shih. The intention of Heaven towards created things is that in Spring they should grow and in Autumn arrive at maturity. Ku ts'i tsai yoh yé. It is thus that it exists [as it were] in music; Shang shang chu ts'ai fang chi yin, the Shang note [of music] dominates the sounds of the western quarter [i.e. Autumn]; i luh wei ts'ih yuch chi luh, [and] I toh is the music of the seventh month. Shang shang yé wuh ki kiu erh pi shang, "Shang" means to disable, [and] created things when growing old and long disabled. I luh yé wuh kuo shang erh tang shah, "I" means to destroy, and it is meet that created things when too prosperous should be destroyed.

This quotation furnishes an example, though perhaps an extreme example, of the gloss which Mr. Giles puts on the writings of his authors. He is evidently in the habit of reading over a passage, of idealizing it, and of reflecting on paper the result of the two processes. No one need, perhaps, complain of this, certainly not the English reader, who may be congratulated on being able to exchange Mr. Giles's version for the more prosaic diction of the original, and least of all the Chinese authors themselves, who owe an eternal debt of gratitude to Mr. Giles for the glamour he has thrown over their works. In his preface he says that translators are but traitors at the best, and that translations may be moonlight and water while the originals are sunlight and wine. It was possibly in his endeavour to avoid this extreme that he has fallen into the opposite one, for certainly in this case the Chinese authors cannot lay claim to more than moonlight and water compared with the sunlight and wine of their translator.

Mr. Giles touches but lightly upon Chinese poetry, and perhaps wisely. It is not of a kind to lend itself readily to translation, being for the most part either devoid of all sentiment or full of obscure allusions, in which case, in proportion to the depth of the concealment of the references within the text, is the poet's success measured. The result is that in the annotated editions of the poets their verses are so overlaid with the necessary explanatory comments, that by the time one has opened the shell the kernel has lost its flavour. By the Chinese the T'ang Dynasty (A.D. 618–907) is looked upon as the golden age of poetry—Mr. Giles regards it as "the epoch of glittering poetry"—and among all the poets of that period Le Tai-pih is, with common consent, given the chief place. Mr. Giles considers that he is "famous for his exquisite imagery, his wealth of words, his telling allusions to the past, and for the musical cadence of his verse." This is the ode of the two which Mr. Giles gives us which most nearly answers this description. It is entitled "On Getting Drunk in Spring":—

> What is life after all but a dream?
> And why should such pother be made?
> Better far to be tipsy, I deem,
> And doze all day long in the shade.
>
> When I wake and look out on the lawn,
> I hear 'mid the flowers a bird sing;
> I ask, "Is it evening or dawn?"
> The mango-bird whistles "'Tis spring."
> Overpower'd with the beautiful sight
> Another full goblet I pour,
> And would sing till the moon rises bright—
> But soon I'm as drunk as before.

CLASSICAL SCHOOL BOOKS.*

STUDENTS of Æschylus will welcome the new edition of the Supplices and Choephori by Mr. Paley. His scholar-ship is the more effective because it is united with a very keen literary sense. Whatever may be said about his view of this or that passage, Mr. Paley never commits those ineptitudes which we meet now and again in some of the most valuable commentaries upon Æschylus. The task which he has set himself in the present edition is one which he wishes rather than hopes to accomplish; it is to redeem the two most difficult tragedies from the neglect into which they have fallen amongst young scholars. With this end in view Mr. Paley has prepared a text which he thinks may be used with advantage, "etiam a junioribus." But we cannot say that he has been successful. Either the difficulties which he has vanquished make him underrate those which survive, or he is appealing to a class of "juniores" very different from Sixth-Form boys and Undergraduates. He does not, of course, profess to give a clear text of the whole of either play. In the Supplices at least one long passage of seventy lines, and many shorter passages and single lines in the Choëphori, are corrupt beyond emendation. But, apart from exceptional difficulties, even in the comparatively simple parts of these simplified texts, questions must constantly be arising which would obscure or smother the poetry and divert the mind from the drama to the words. It is impossible to discuss the innumerable disputed readings with which Mr. Paley has dealt. The present texts are not materially different from those which he edited for the Bibliotheca Classica. Minor alterations may be found—e.g. αὐτογενεῖ φυξανορίᾳ has been changed into the much preferable αὐτογενῆ φυξανορίαν in the Supplices; and in the Choephori the conjecture ἡ σαφ' ἥνει has been adopted in place of εὖ 'σαφήνει. Throughout both plays Mr. Paley has steered a middle course between timid conservatism and adventurous innovations; and the two texts which he has now published are perhaps the best, as they are certainly the most useful, texts in existence. He indulges freely in the least objectionable of conjectural liberties, the insertion of lacunæ where the meaning or the syntax is obscure or defective. Mr. Paley has not undertaken the duties of an interpreter except so far as they are involved in his very short textual notes, or in his shorter comments upon the Scholia which he has edited with great care and appended to the texts. It is his well-known and well-founded belief that the only safe progress which can now be made in Æschylean research will be made upon the lines of these Scholia, which represent an earlier text than the Mediceau, the basis of all, or nearly all, the existing MSS. It was the Scholium on Suppl. 452 which suggested the nearly certain emendation of τοῦτο δηῶν for τοὐδ' ἔγω, and there are many other passages which have been elucidated in the same way. It is easy to deride the dulness and sterility of some Scholia, or to point out many positive mistakes—e.g. the derivation of Δίκτυσσα implied in the synonym καταπόντωσον. But the writers of the Scholia possessed merits which some modern commentators would do well to imitate. They wrote short notes, and (right or wrong) they made their meaning clear—e.g. the Scholium upon δίψιοι at Choeph. 18; is a model of what a note should be. But it is not only the intrinsic value of the Scholia which makes Mr. Paley's publication of them so valuable. The pupil (and the teacher) will be enabled to gain some idea of the growth of classical research, and to see and value for himself the origin of much of the classical knowledge of modern times. There is only one drawback to the Scholia being included in the present edition; the young students for whom it is specially intended may be somewhat puzzled whenever there is a disagreement between the text which Mr. Paley has adopted and the one upon which the Scholium was written—e.g. in Supp. 94 Mr. Paley writes ἥμενον, while the text explained contains ἧμενον.

Professor Ramsay's Latin Prose Exercises can be very well spoken of, and indeed those who have had the most considerable experience in teaching composition are likely to think best of it. There has hitherto, despite the enormous number of school-books, in Classics been but a very small choice of such books as this for any one who was unwilling to admit mere "exercise books," on the one hand, and collections of elegant extracts, made with hardly any regard to their suitability for translation, on the other. The besetting fault of the first class Professor Ramsay has very well indicated in his preface, while he has for the most part successfully avoided it in his text. Ostentatiously putting themselves forward as exercises on a particular idiom or construction, they give "the office" in a manner much more calculated to exercise native sharpness than to cultivate Latin style. On the other hand, many collections of "passages" juxtapose pieces which it would puzzle an accomplished scholar to render without paraphrase, and pieces which ought not to floor a decently forward fourth-form boy. In dividing his Part III. from his Part IV. Mr. Ramsay has done great service in regard to this matter; while the detached sentences of his First and Second Parts are neither idiotically simple nor abnormally difficult. The absence of a vocabulary and the promise that no key shall appear are also matters to be noticed with much approval.

Mr. Reid's translation of Cicero's De Finibus is intended to be a companion to the two still unpublished volumes of his commentary. There is some reason to regret that this ancillary position has been given to the translation. With the desire of lightening his commentary, Mr. Reid has adhered closely to the syntax of the original; and the inevitable result is that the right words are often put in the wrong places. The translation of short phrases is sometimes very happy—e.g. "heterodox" for "qui dissentiret," "guide to a life of seriousness and wisdom" for auctor vitæ gravitatem et sapienter agendæ," and "literary debauch" in "quasi helluari libris." Sometimes, again, the words are clumsy or even incorrect. It cannot be necessary even in the language of philosophy to render "simplex" by "uncomplex," and such an expression as "a more cultured maxim" is without meaning. The word "cultured" (for "humanius") is not above the suspicion of a Transatlantic origin: but, if it is to be naturalized, it must be applied to the man, not to his maxims; to Mr. Howells, for instance, not to his epigrams. The desire to fully explain the force of the Latin makes Mr. Reid overload his sentences with such words as especially, actually, and particularly. The same fault is more strikingly revealed when he translates "in eo ipso parum vidit" with "by that very proceeding he betrayed narrowness of vision." There is also a tendency to introduce post-classical ideas by such words as "gentleman" or "lady paramount." These, however, are but minor blemishes. The translation, as a whole, is accurate, and in some parts, especially in the more argumentative parts, elegant and vigorous. It is well suited to the purpose which Mr. Reid contemplated. But we think that he has missed an opportunity in not making such a version as might have attracted the general reader. The shrewd common sense, the clearness, and the beauty of the De Finibus make it the most interesting of Cicero's philosophical treatises.

Dr. Bigg's edition of the Fourth and Fifth Books of the Cyropædia has one fault. It leaves the pupil nothing to find out for himself, and the teacher might well complain of being anticipated in almost all his comments. Upon ἀλλὰ σύγε Dr. Bigg remarks that "the pronoun is emphatic and the emphasis is increased by the addition of γε." This surely is a note which might have been omitted, although we suppose that this edition is intended chiefly for the lower or middle forms of public schools. Dr. Bigg has spared no pains to make his little book interesting and complete. The introduction puts a great deal of information into a small space, and it is written in an attractive style. Dr. Bigg points out that the truth which is to be found in the Cyropædia is not historical truth. He rejects the account of the rise of the Persian Empire and the description of Persian manners; but he thinks that Xenophon's character of Cyrus was based upon a very prevalent tradition. The critical notes are short, clear, and well up to date. Now and then some lesson is enforced by a striking anecdote—as, for instance, the one which is quoted from Lucian to illustrate the Attic use of δήπουθεν. Dr. Bigg is careful to point out Xenophon's usage of unfamiliar or poetical words, such as κατειργάσατο (slew) and παλαμᾶσθαι; and in several places he makes suggestions which would be useful in Greek composition, especially upon such particles as γοῦν and μὲν οὖν at the beginning of the Fifth Book, and in his explanation of "anacoluthon," although he is over-subtle upon the last point. The interest of the reader is well kept up by the running analysis and the pleasant chattiness of the commentary. The book is thoroughly practical, and reading the notes is like hearing a very good schoolmaster talking to his boys.

Mr. Fennell's edition of the speech of Demosthenes against Meidias is a more ambitious school-book than Dr. Bigg's. But here again there is an undue tendency to give help in simple passages. There is still less excuse for the translations which are volunteered. The critical notes are good, even if they are unnecessary; but the translations are almost without merit—e.g. "to organize prejudice" for συνάγειν φθόνον, and "of malice prepense" for ἐξεπίτηδες. In § 80 there is a long sentence translated with perfect correctness; but the English is much harder to understand than the Greek which it is meant to explain. Perhaps, therefore, Mr. Fennell would have done well to abstain from complaining in one passage of the "cumbrousness" of Demosthenes, and in another of his "awkward arrangement." The text is well edited; there is an excellent analysis of the speech (from C. R. Kennedy); and the explanations of legal and quasi-legal terms are clear and sound. The critical notes are very carefully written, and they sometimes throw out suggestions upon the position of words which ought to be useful in the writing of Greek prose.

Scenes from the Andria, by Mr. F. W. Cornish, is a condensation of Terence's play, adapted to the modesty of the Eton boys. The characters of Byrrhia and Charinus are omitted, and the play is shortened by about 250 lines. If the Andria is too wicked to be read as it stands, it would be better to leave it alone than to destroy the whole motive of the play and to make some parts of the dialogue nonsensical. In the first scene of the first act Simo is made to say that the young lady was living a hard life, supporting herself by her fancy-work. Then came "one or two lovers"—

> Perduxere illuc, secum ut una esset, meum.

It is not easy to see why the (presumably rival) lovers should introduce another to the object of their affections; and the puzzle is greater when Simo calls Pamphilus a grand example of "continentia" because he does not fall in love with an apparently good and industrious girl. The notes are short and generally sound. But there can be no doubt that Mr. Cornish is wrong in following Ruhnken in construing semper with lenitas, as if it were parallel to such Greek phrases as τῶν ἀεὶ λόγων. The whole sentence is so much broken up that it is quite as easy to refer semper to verebar, and the sense is much better. "Quicquid peperisset" is translated "boy or girl," whereas Davus is comically vague. The desire for brevity in some of the notes has resulted in obscurity—e.g. quod] not relative (= id quod) but "the fact that." The subjunctive mood is well treated in the Appendix.

Mr. Raven's Latin Grammar and Junior Scholarship Papers bears a puzzling title. What is "junior scholarship" as distinguished from Latin grammar? Since 115 pages are devoted to Latin grammar, and the remaining six to Roman topography, literature, mythology, and antiquities, it would seem that the last four subjects make up "junior scholarship." No place is found for Comparative Philology. These sets of questions will be welcome to schoolmasters who are too indolent to make better sets for themselves. They are arranged systematically, and some of the sentences for translation into Latin are well selected. But the questions in the Appendix are sometimes oddly worded and horribly encyclopædic. Mr. Raven's schoolboy would seem to possess all the varied knowledge which Juvenal says was expected of a schoolmaster by Roman parents:—

IN taking up a book purporting to be a diary of travel in so comparatively untravelled and unknown a country as Spain, we naturally looked for some of the local colouring, some of the picturesqueness, some of the Old-World customs and costumes of a land which Gothic and Moorish, Roman and Christian influences have combined to stamp with a peculiar charm. But in this we were disappointed. Had the author written even a book for the instruction and guidance of other travellers there would have been a reason for its existence. Mr. Kilgour, instead of setting himself to give useful information, seems to think that his task is done when he has communicated to the public every trifling incident which he noticed in his journey. He does so in most remarkable English. On the first page we find, for instance, in a description of the journey from Nice to Barcelona, the following passage:—"This fleet has been here several weeks. They were apparently all anchored very securely, and no boats were lying at or near them, for the sea happened to-day to be rough, as the waves were breaking in white foam on the shore, and also out at sea, as there was what is known as 'white horses;' but the ships, owing to their size and sheltered position, were moving very little." When stopping at Arles, the naive remark which the author makes is, "From the railway station can be pretty well seen the remains, though apparently ruinous, of a large Roman amphitheatre." We never yet heard of a Roman amphitheatre that was not more or less in this condition, and the remark reminds us of the story of an American who was asked how he liked Venice. His reply was that "it was a nice town, but considerably out of repair." To return to the author's English. On page 3 we find this sentence:—"When you come on the sea it has rather a curious appearance, as it extends on both sides the line, and it seems like as it was to wash over it." At Perpignan the remark on the hotel is "It was a small and rather dirty kept, in fact, only a common French provincial inn, though the best in the place." Such flowers of style are scattered over the whole book. Sometimes the sentences remind one of a Chinese puzzle. For example, taking one or two of them quite at random:—"This is the old French province of Roussillon, and that in Spain a portion of the historic kingdom of Navarre, and thus oft and many a time, as it was the frontier between the two countries did the opposing forces meet here in battle array." And again:—"This forenoon we went to see 'The Cathedral of Cordova,' which is a most remarkable building inside, as it is the purest specimen to be found anywhere of an ancient Moslem mosque, and that was when the Moors were at their best; for at the time this building was erected their original Asiatic savageness had been toned down by the intermingling with European civilization, and also the softness derived from the climate of Spain, and the influence exercised over them by arts and sciences—for then Cordova might be designated the most enlightened city in Europe as regards these; nor had they grown so luxurious as when they built 'the Alhambra.'" Mr. Kilgour seems afraid to admire anything that is not English. He fears to commit himself to definite praise as to anything that he sees. Everything is either "mean," "poor-looking," "whitewashed," or "rather good." The only enthusiasm he shows throughout the book is when describing the Holy Week ceremonies at Seville, and even then his enthusiasm is but lukewarm. In speaking of the Capilla Real in the cathedral at Seville, Mr. Kilgour says:—"Three tombs are here, two on either side of the entrance and one in front of the altar." But he does not tell us the most interesting fact of these tombs—namely, that they are those of Alfonso X., of Doña Beatrix, wife of St. Ferdinand, and of the notorious Maria Padilla, the favourite of Pedro the Cruel. The spelling of some of the Spanish names is curious; the Puerta del Sol is spoken of as the Porta del Sol; the church of San Pablo at Seville is called St. Paolo in one place, and St. Parlo in another. The "Generalife" at Granada is spelled "Generalfe," and the battle of "Lepanto" is spelled "Lapanto." The author's appreciation of rank leaks out now and then in a naive fashion. At Malaga he falls in with a clergyman and his wife who had arrived from Alicante by sea, the latter of whom, as he cannot refrain from informing us, "was a lady of title." Of art the writer seems to have very vague ideas. Pictures must be very "clear and distinct" for him to admire them. Of the famous "Gloria" by Titian, which comforted Charles V. in his last moments, he writes very much as though he were describing a watch. "In the chief gallery," he says, "hangs what has been designated one of Titian's masterpieces, 'His Gloria,' but unfortunately it seems much out of order, so bad, in fact, that you cannot appreciate its merits." Of the splendid picture, "The Surrender of Breda," he can only say:—"A subject picture by the same artist" (Velasquez), "styled 'The Surrender of Breda,' is also hung in this gallery; it is his largest-sized specimen; and, though numerous figures are introduced, each is clear and distinct. The execution of the horses in this picture is of the very highest merit. One horse that occupies the foreground of this picture you would think had been newly groomed, so bright is its colour." He says nothing of the beautiful landscape in the background, of the sympathy and pity shown in the face and action of the Spanish leader as he lays his hand on the shoulder of his humiliated opponent, nothing of the triumphant demeanour of the Spaniards and the starved, downcast appearance of the Dutch; nothing of the masterly use of but very few colours in this famous picture, with just a bright pennon here and a blue scarf there; nothing of the marvellous foreshortening of the horse in the foreground, which Velasquez himself was proud of. The photographs, with which the book is well provided, are excellent and succeed, where the letterpress fails, in giving the reader a glimpse of Spain.

* A Spanish Diary. Aberdeen: J. R. Smith.

MINOR NOTICES.

THE Diary of Sir John Torkington, published in the "Shilling Vellum-Parchment Series" (1), is instructive, but can hardly be said to be amusing. Mr. Loftie, the editor, justly observes that "no apology is necessary for calling attention to a veritable diary in which the author's personal adventures are the principal subject." There can be no doubt that the "veritable diary" of an English parson who went as far as Jerusalem in the days of Henry VIII. is well worth attention, but in this case it must be given as a task. Sir John Torkington was obviously a worthy man, but withal dull. He belonged to the class of persons who travel far and contrive to see very little. He notes all the reliques he saw, and the leagues he rode or walked. He gives the names of towns and vague descriptions of them; but, on the whole, we get a very hazy picture of the scenes he passed through. It was only when he was subjected to extreme personal inconvenience that a sparkle even of the feeblest kind was struck out of the worthy parson of Malberton. At Jaffa, for instance, he records the following adventure:—"And as we came owtsof the boot we war receyvyd by the Turkys and Sarrasyns, and put in to an old cave by name and tale there Serevener ever wrytyng ower names man by man as we entyred in the presens of the seyd lordis, and ther we lay in the same grotte or cave all nyght upon the stynking Stable grownde as well nyght as Day, ryght evyll intretyd by the seyd Turkes Mamnes." In this case we realize and sympathize with the position of poor Sir John. The work of editing has been excellently done by Mr. Loftie. He explains everything which needs or is capable of explanation. In one passage, however, he makes a comment which is at least superfluous. Sir John tells how he made arrangements for his sea voyage from Venice with a certain "patron," who, according to Mr. Loftie, was "probably a kind of sixteenth-century Cook, who 'personally conducted' travellers to Palestine." Now the patron in question can have been nothing but the "padrone," or skipper of the vessel. "Patron" is still good Castilian for the master of a fishing-smack or coasting craft. Accuracy must not be sacrificed even for a jest.

In the same series of "Miscellaneous Literature" Mr. Colquhoun's recent correspondence to the Times has been published, under the rather ambitious title of The Truth about Tonquin (2). The collection is useful and readable. Mr.

(2) The Vellum-Parchment Shilling Series of Miscellaneous Literature—The Truth about Tonquin. By A. R. Colquhoun. London: Field & Tuer.

Colquhoun is one of the few Englishmen who know anything about the scene of the last French attempt to found a colonial empire, and he imparts his information in an attractive way. Although it is too much to suppose that the general public retain a strong impression of correspondence to newspapers, it may be safely supposed that the substance of Mr. Colquhoun's book is by this time familiar. It has been filtered to the public ear by so many channels. The collection is none the less valuable; for it gives, in a compact form, the reasons which lead the most competent authorities to believe that the Tonquin adventure can do no good to France, and may prove a serious nuisance to other Powers.

Captain Norman's work on the Tonquin, or, as he prefers to spell it, Tonkin, question (3) is widely different to Mr. Colquhoun's, and valuable for other reasons. We do not understand that he means to lay claim to any personal acquaintance with the country. He has compiled his book very carefully out of French papers and from the letters or other works of French authors. We know no intention of describing Captain Norman's volume as a mere compilation. Far from it. He has mastered his materials and run it into shape in a workmanlike fashion. The result of his labours is an exhaustive historical and critical review of the Tonquin muddle. The author begins with a sketch of French colonial policy. He then proceeds to the "Geography of Tonkin: its Customs, and Unsuitability for Colonization." Nine chapters, from the third to the eleventh, are devoted to the rise and progress of the Tonquin imbroglio between 1787 and 1883. The last three chapters deal with "The Military Forces of France and China," "France as a Colonial Power," and "France as a Commercial Power." Captain Norman handles all these subjects like a writer who has spared no pains to master his facts, and who can sum up tersely and with precision. His book should be welcome to the Intelligence Department of the War Office, and will assuredly be freely used by the intelligent journalist. All that is much; but we think that Captain Norman has been ill advised in taking up his somewhat schoolmasterly attitude towards France. He has a horror of her greed for conquest which strikes us as a little childish in a "late captain of the Bengal Staff Corps and 40th Light Infantry." There would have been no Bengal Staff Corps, and possibly no Captain Norman, if England had acted on the principle which he thinks should rule our neighbours. When the author criticises the colonial policy of France, which has always been at once grasping, and vacillating, he is on safer ground. What we have taken has been annexed for definite practical reasons, and has commonly been kept. We have not plunged into vast undertakings for the love of doing something grandiose, and then got tired of them in the middle. Therefore we have secured a good slice of the earth's surface, and done great things with it. Still Captain Norman should have reflected that the Englishman, who decides the Frenchman's vacillation and impracticability in this year of grace 1884 lays himself open to an awkward retort.

Quite a little crop of books about Tonquin and the French doings there has sprung up while the dispute is in a state of temporary quiescence. The author of Our Burmese Wars and Relations with Burma, Akhé Pwo, &c., has added his contribution (4). His volume consists of some forty-six pages of "Remarks on Burma," a couple of rather heavy dialogues between a Frenchman and an Englishman on the subject of Tonquin, and a large array of addenda. This last portion contains some interesting matters of fact. The other two consist chiefly of wordy statements of the author's amiable belief that things will "come round and be all square" if only people do not lose their tempers. It is a probable opinion.

Mrs. Percival's life of her brother Sir David Wedderburn (5) belongs to a most irritating class of book. It is one of those overgrown family biographies which tell us all about some most worthy person of no particular distinction with a detail which would verge on being excessive in the case of Gustavus Adolphus or Corneille. Such books should be suppressed by the united exertions of the dead man's kith and kin. It is easy to understand from Mrs. Percival's book that Sir David Wedderburn was deservedly loved and respected by his friends and his family, but it is not the less impossible to read the four hundred and thirty-four pages of this book without experiencing real boredom. It is full of the trivial details of daily life—tours, visits, lunches, &c.—of extracts of letters which possess no general interest, and of extracts from diaries and forgotten articles in papers. There is nothing in the book which is not creditable to the good feeling of the writer, and nothing which is not honourable to the subject of the biography, but there is a vast deal too much mere talk.

The Rev. Dr. Irons, Rector of St. Mary's Woolnoth, has published an "authorized edition" of his hymns and translations (6). In the preface he gives his reasons for thinking that "the old grooves of false feeling and the media of questionable orthodoxy" in which the hymns at present used too often run "must be departed from." At the same time he points out the great difficulties of the task he has undertaken. There can be no doubt that much might be done to improve the literary qualities of some of the hymns now popular, but we imagine that it will be generally thought that Dr. Irons is a little too ready to condemn all the older ones as "archaic." If they were so indeed, we fail to see why that alone should be considered a serious fault from the devotional or indeed from any point of view.

Travellers who have before them the prospect of making a journey to South Africa or Mauritius will be obliged to Messrs. Donald Currie & Co. for their neat little handbook (7). It gives much useful information of a general character, and a full account of the royal mail steamers—their size, arrangement, and dates of sailing.

"This work," says Mr. G. S. Heatley in the preface to his book on Sheep Farming (8), "enters minutely into the history, progress, and development of the various breeds of sheep. It specifies in plain explicit language the many ailments to which they are liable, and recommends the remedies that are most efficacious and safe for their cure." This is an excellent summary of the qualities which a text-book of this kind should possess. Only the experienced sheep-farmer, however, could tell us how far Mr. Heatley is as good as his word.

In these days, when the Prime Minister has just been urging the English farmer to look for a resource in fruit, Mr. Whitehead's essay on Profitable Fruit Farming (9) should be read with attention. The essay is dedicated to the Worshipful Company of Fruiterers, and has a coat of arms on the title-page representing Eve presenting the fatal apple to Adam. It is a curious choice for a fruiterer's arms, for that incident is not the most creditable in the history of the apple.

Mr. McLaren's practical treatise on Spinning Woollen and Worsted (10) is, like Mr Heatley's work, a technical work meant for a limited class of readers, and only to be appreciated by them.

Our list of new school books is smaller than usual. Vere Foster's Simple Lessons in Water-Color Flowers (11) gives directions for painting flowers. The illustrations are well executed.

Mr. Redhouse's Simplified Grammar of the Ottoman Turkish Language (12) is a stout volume of 205 pages, about twice the size of the first of the series, which included the Arabic, Persian, and Hindustanee tongues. These books grow steadily in size at least.

Mr. Page has edited an edition of the second book of Horace's Odes (13) for Messrs. Macmillan's "School Classical Series."

Although Mrs. Bray is only remembered as the author of a long series of now forgotten stories and of a life of Stothard, her Autobiography (14) is well worth reading. It gives a pleasant little picture of a wholesome life, and some curious sketches of the literary world of England in the early part of this century. The Autobiography ends many years before Mrs. Bray's death in 1883 at the great age of 94. Mr. Kempe, the editor, supplies what is wanting in his introduction. Among his other additions is an extract from Mrs. Bray's diary which deserves to be quoted in a history of the relations of authors and publishers, if such a thing ever comes to be written. "On the occasion of the reprint of her novels," says Mr. Kempe, "she inserts the petition [Mrs. Bray always wrote out her prayers] that 'Mason and Longman and myself may continue to act honourably and honestly and peaceably towards each other.'" In the Autobiography the most interesting passages are those which give Mrs. Bray's correspondence with Southey. She had a profound admiration for the Laureate, which he seems to have repaid with a good deal of friendly advice and praise. His letters show, like everything else we know about him, that he must have been the most laborious of men, and contain references to his sufferings from persecution by "our present Evangelicals" and others. It appears from the Autobiography that England must have produced a great number of untutored poetical geniuses in the early part of this century, and that they had the most remarkable luck in the way of getting subscriptions to editions of their works.

"Although the popular education movement," says Mr. Godard in his preface to the Life of George Birkbeck (15), "is one of the most important outgrowths of a most progressive era, probably little is known at the present time concerning him who was its pioneer." The Life he has written probably does all that can now be done to supply the want. It possesses the merit of being short; but it might have been even further compressed. There is a good deal of purely trivial matter about the subscriptions of Lord A. and the speeches of Mr. B. which might have been spared. At the end, too, there are several pages of quite superfluous matter about "Legislation and Civilization" and the results of the diffusion of knowledge.

It has been maintained with some plausibility that it is the compositor's business to look after the stops. From the point of view of the writer there is much to be said for the theory. It is certainly by no means easy to lay down any good working rule for the proper management of commas and semicolons. The puzzled writer, or compositor, who finds himself in a difficulty will therefore be obliged to Mr. Allardyce at least for the intention to help him. How far the rules given in his pretty little booklet on Stops (16) will prove of practical value we cannot undertake to say. They look sound, but then their due application depends wholly on the taste of the writer. At the end Mr. Allardyce gives the useful example of how to correct a proof—an art which some of those who live by the pen never master thoroughly.

Scotch ecclesiastical writers are undoubtedly too much inclined to skip the pre-Reformation period of their Church history. With the respectable object of giving his parishioners some account of a period of which they were probably wholly ignorant, Mr. Robert Paton, minister of Kirkinner, delivered them a series of lectures on the Church in Scotland from the introduction of Christianity down to the final victory of the Roman ritual (17). He writes in a temperate way, but has, like many modern Scotchmen, a great weakness for hazy rhetoric. His style is not wholly free either from jokes of the smaller kind. There is neither wit nor sense in such a sentence as this: "All Europe we see [i.e. at the beginning of the middle ages] with its night-cap on, composing itself to sleep; and, while the dark cloud creeps over the sky, sleeping soundly."

Of the making of apologies for Mary Queen of Scots there is no end. The Hon. Colin Lindsay (18) has been moved by Father Stevenson's preface to the Life by Claude Nau to try once more and save Mary's moral character at the expense of her understanding. He is not much more successful than his predecessors in proving her imbecility.

Mr. Forbes Leith has applied himself to the life of a very different Queen of Scots. He has executed a most readable translation of Turgot's Latin history of St. Margaret, the wife of Malcolm Kenmore (19). There can be no more wholesome reading than this beautiful biography of a woman who was a saint without ceasing to do her duty as a wife and a mother. The volume is prettily got up, with good print, and fair illustrations.

Mr. Bissell's Law of Asylum in Israel (20) is an apparently careful and learned treatise on an obscure historical question.

The "Apology" (21), as Mr. Blackley calls his account of the trial and execution of Socrates, is, and that he does not say, a diluted version of what Mr. Grote had already written on the subject.

Mr. Hodder M. Westropp publishes in a handsome form a series of lectures delivered, on the archæology of Rome, before the British and American Archæological Society (22). He covers the whole ground, from the earliest times to the days of the Empire.

When agitators are busy on the subject of Highland land it is a happy idea to collect the letters published last summer in the Times (23). They do not pretend to be exhaustive, and they are possibly open to criticism, but they give a number of useful facts in a convenient form.

The Never Never Land is, it seems, the name given by the colonists to Queensland, or a part of it. Over this land Mr. Stirling has ridden, and he publishes with apologies, an account of his ride (24). The apologies were unnecessary. With the exception of some of the illustrations, which are hideous, the book is a very respectable specimen of its class. It is almost impossible to retain a clear impression of the country described after getting through many chapters about straggling towns, squatters, the bush, and the kangaroo; but that is the case with ninety-nine descriptions out of a hundred.

As it is blessed with freedom from little wars, the colony of British Honduras (25) attracts very little attention. It produces mahogany, and that is all we know about it. Readers in search of further information may consult a book by Mr. Morris, Director of Public Gardens and Plantations in Jamaica. He went there on an official visit, and speaks hopefully of the future of the country. Even from his account, however, it appears to be the sort of place to go to when all the rest of the world has been exhausted.

In the disguise of a book for children, and with interruptions of conversation of the Sandford and Merton stamp, "Pater" gives an account of a tour in Norway (26). The children of the party seem to have had a good time.

The indefatigable Mr. Percy Fitzgerald has formed a collection of "Little Essays" (27) of Charles Lamb's by making snippets from his letters. The practice is not to be commended, but Lamb stands such treatment better than most writers would do.

We have received the fourth volume of Mr. Paterson's reprint of Motteux's Don Quixote (28). It is well printed, but of somewhat unwieldy size.

Professor Henry Morley has added Defoe's Journal of the Plague Year (29) and Locke on Civil Government (30) to his series of cheap reprints. A short essay on the author is prefixed to each volume by the editor.

We are glad to notice a new edition of that strong, though unequal, story Mehalah (31).

Mr. A. R. Bach's work on Musical Education and Vocal Culture (32) has reached a fourth edition, and Alexander Palma di Cesnola's handsome work on the Cypriot antiquities (33) a second.

We have to notice May's useful British and Irish Press Guide (34), which has reached its eleventh year.

Sell's Dictionary (35) covers a wider field, and not only gives business details, but a good deal of miscellaneous information.

The twenty-first volume of the indispensable Statesman's Year Book (36) has now appeared.

The equally indispensable Dod for 1884 (37) is also within reach, and prepared to run its race with Ridgway's Parliamentary Manual (38).

We need only mention the three clerical "Dods," The Clergy List (39), The Clergy Directory (40), and The Official Year Book (41) published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

(42) The Railway Companies Directory is the title of a handbook which should be a treasure to the more or less fortunate persons who possess railway shares. It gives ample information on the whole subject in a clear way, and has a good index.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

A NEW book from M. Emile Montégut (1) is always welcome, and the present volume of essays which he has published on four of the chief illustrations of French literature during the present century is not unworthy to rank with his best. For our part, the book is specially interesting to us because the essays which compose it date from very different periods—one, that on Béranger, as far back as 1858; another, on Alfred de Vigny, from 1867, while those on Musset and Nodier are recent. In such a collection the permanent characteristics of an author's criticism—the qualities which are his own and not merely due to a prevalent fashion or to the influence of contemporary writers—are sure to emerge most clearly. That the result is favourable to M. Montégut need hardly be said here. There is no living French critic who is his superior in finesse, in range of appreciation, in freedom from prejudice and from woodenness. On Béranger he seems to us a little severe, but this very severity is instructive. To take a curiously different, yet parallel instance, the attitude of all the most accomplished French critics towards Béranger has much of the same characteristics to an Englishman's eye which Frenchmen seem to see in the attitude of some accomplished English critics towards Byron. In both cases the foreigner excuses occasional bad taste, platitude, and conventionality more easily than the native. On Nodier M. Montégut is excellent—how excellent it perhaps requires a good deal of familiarity with the voluminous and unequal subject to perceive. His essay on Musset (though all essays on Musset which have merit must, to some extent, ring changes on the same and a few notes) shows his eminently literary faculty of appreciation and expression. Best of all, however, is perhaps that on the other great Alfred. Accomplished as is Vigny's executive power, singularly original as was his conception of style (we are glad to find M. Montégut dwelling on the remarkable fashion in which he again and again turned out masterpieces in manners which others took up and gained credit for), he is undoubtedly more a critic's favourite than a general reader's. He could not meet with a critic more capable of expounding him than M. Montégut.

M. Louis Desprez (2) has an agreeable manner in a disagreeable cause; he writes with vigour and not without elegance; and when he tells us how we the wicked anti-naturalistic critics are destined to be crushed under the triumphant progress of Zolaism, we do not feel much inclined to do more than smile amiably at him. Unluckily he shows more than once that he has not the faintest conception of criticism. Thus, he says half apologetically in his preface, "Qui sympathise avec M. Cherbuliez déteste d'instinct Flaubert." In that case we may inform him that "qui," though he may be an excellent person, though he may speak with the tongues of men and angels, is not a critic. No critic detests anything except that which is bad per se, and in its own style.

M. Gustave Merlet's (3) careful and laborious work on the literature of the Empire deserves praise, which, however, can only be given to it by allowance. It is impossible not to think three large volumes thrown away on a period which is not only a very short one, but one of the least fertile and satisfactory in French literature, while the abundant citations incorporated in the text give the book an appearance of bookmaking, which is perhaps deceptive, but certainly uninviting.

Twelve hundred pages devoted to the fiscal economy of a single country during a single century of the middle ages (4) are not to be briefly reviewed. But M. Vuitry's book may be introduced with some confidence to all whom it may concern.

There are those who think (and we own that we share this heresy) the prose of the latest elected of French Academicians better than his poetry. Such persons will be glad to hear that M. Lemerre has published, in the well-known pocket shape, M. François Coppée's Idylle pendant le siège (5) and his still more attractive Contes en prose.

M. Cotteau's volume on Japan, China, and Cochin China (6) is somewhat inferior to that on Siberia, to which it forms a conclusion. The subject is more hackneyed; the scenes (except Japan) seem more hurriedly painted; and the author indulges in more of the commonplace of travel-writing, such as grumbles at steamboat arrangements, at his fellow-travellers, and so forth. His books of travel, however, are generally readable; and that adjective need not be refused to this one. Japan being decidedly over-written by others, and the Chinese portion of the book very perfunctory, the best part may be said to be that on Tonquin, whither M. Cotteau paid a short visit before the outbreak of the present war, and on Cochin China. The illustrations are good. So are those of M. Brau de St. Pol-Lias's sketch of the pacified districts of Acheen (7). We noticed about a year ago the author's book on the Straits Settlements, which was in a sense the first part of this on Western Dutch Sumatra. As we then pointed out, the writer is an enthusiastic, but not an aggressively enthusiastic, advocate of French colonization, from the commercial rather than the political point of view. His engravings show that, if the monkeys of Sumatra are extremely like men, the men of Sumatra return the compliment by being remarkably like monkeys. Mme. de Tallenay (whose "cuts" are more ambitious, but somewhat less obviously faithful, than those of the two preceding travellers) has written a useful book (8) about a not very much visited country. She has incorporated with the notes of her own and her husband's journey along the coast, and of their excursions here and there into the interior, much information about Venezuelan history, politics, and literature, concerning all which it is, at least, probable that the majority of her readers will be ignorant. Opinions differ on the question whether this old and respectable practice is an improvement to a book of travels or not.

PROVIDENT LIFE OFFICE, 50 Regent Street, London, W.

City Branch—14 Cornhill, E.C. Founded 1806.

REPORT of the DIRECTORS, presented at the 78th ANNUAL MEETING at the Office, on Wednesday, January 30, 1884.

The Directors have to report that the transactions of the Provident Life Office during the year 1883 have been highly satisfactory.

Proposals for new Assurances amounting to £670,000 were received. Policies for £575,500 were issued and taken up, producing new annual Premiums amounting to £19,779, as against £19,311 for the previous year. These Assurances and new annual Premiums respectively represent the actual new amounts. No re-assurances were effected during the year.

The Proposals declined and not completed, amounted to £103,500.

The Claims for the year were £92,255, being £29 4s. more than the corresponding sum for 1882.

The annual Income is now £109,271, being an increase of £9,156.

During the year the sum of £997 20 was paid for the surrender of Policies. The values paid upon Bonus Policies ranged from 3 per cent. the minimum surrender value—to as much as 84 per cent. of the Premiums received.

The total Funds of the Office on December 31 last were £3,232,281, being an increase of £21,197, a result very satisfactory considering the special extra payments required to be made on account of the recent division of Profits. The average interest realized was £4 5s. 9d. per cent., as against £4 4s. during 1882.

The large measure of public support received by the Provident Life Office, as shown in the still increasing amount of new business, is gratifying evidence that persons desirous of effecting Assurances are wisely alive to the advantage given by an Office which has all the experience to be gained from a successful existence of seventy-eight years, and which is ready to adapt its practice to the requirements of the present day.

THE STORY OF

By A. EGMONT HAKE.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FIRST EDITION OF THIS WORK, ISSUED DECEMBER 22 LAST.

THE TIMES.

The story of Chinese Gordon's life, full as it has been of adventure and stirring incident, cannot fail to appeal to a wide circle of readers.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

The present volume will prove a valuable guide to politicians at the present crisis.

SPECTATOR.

His story is not only rich in humility, abnegation, contempt for merely objective human pleasures; it reveals to us a singularly happy man.

GRAPHIC.

A volume which we should like to see in the hands of every art, and of every boy with military aspirations.

STANDARD.

A strong and vivid biography of Chinese Gordon.

DAILY NEWS.

Few careers of our own or any other time will compare in picturesqueness with "The Story of Chinese Gordon," by Mr. Egmont Hake.

ALARIC WATTS: a Narrative of his Life.
By his Son, ALARIC ALFRED WATTS.
"A book which puts the reader in good humour both with its hero and its author may, without hesitation, be called a good book, and Mr. Watts's life of his father does this. Alaric Watts was in constant communication with most of the interesting personages of his time in art and letters, and correspondence with them fills up the space very pleasantly. Some of the former with Coleridge, Southey, and Wordsworth are full of interest."—Pall Mall Gazette.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SENIOR PARTNER."

SUSAN DRUMMOND. By Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
"'Susan Drummond' cannot fail to be read with interest, pleasure, and thankfulness. Our old friend the wicked baronet, the profane, hard-riding, hard-drinking, horsey, unprincipled, impecunious, graceless reprobate, once more appears on the scene, but he has undergone so successful a treatment at the hands of this literary Madame Rachel, who can make the most supersannuated characters 'beautiful for ever,' that it is delightful and refreshing to meet him again. The soldier-banker, who relinquishes the field of glory for the field of romance on the most praiseworthy grounds, is the cleverest, the most original, the most striking, the most effective piece of portraiture."—Illustrated London News.

THIRLBY HALL. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "Matrimony," "No New Thing," "Mademoiselle de Mersac," &c.
"'Thirlby Hall' is the pleasantest and, taken altogether, the best novel we have read for many a long day; not merely has the plot plenty of backbone and interest, but the style is charming. There are two or three excellently drawn characters. Lady Caroline is a creation of which Thackeray would not have been ashamed. Without dealing in cleverness, the writer quietly proclaims his knowledge of society, and the by-the-way reflections are not the least pleasant portion of a delightful book."—World.

MILITARY BIOGRAPHIES.

Messrs. CHAPMAN & HALL are preparing for publication a Series of Volumes dedicated to the Lives of Great Military Commanders.

The volumes are designed to form a set of critical biographies, illustrative of the operations and the art of war, by writers of distinction in the profession of Arms, whose competence to weigh the military qualities and deeds of the Chiefs can be accepted. Maps will, when necessary, accompany the volumes, for the convenience of students.

The aim of these volumes is to be both popular and scientific combining the narrative of the most romantic and instructive of human lives with a clear examination of the genius of the soldier.

The First Volume will be FREDERICK THE GREAT, by Colonel C. B. Brackenbury, containing Maps, crown 8vo.

MARSHAL LOUDON, by Colonel Malleson, C.S.I., will follow it, and the two Lives presenting the opposing aspects of the Seven Years' War.

GEORGE BELL & SON'S NEW BOOKS.

Now ready, demy 8vo. 5 vols. £3.

Also a Large paper Edition, to range with "Dickens" and "Thackeray," with the Plates on India paper, imp. 8vo. 5 vols. £10 10s. (104 Copies printed, only a few now left.)

THE LIFE of SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL.D. Together with the JOURNAL of a TOUR to the HEBRIDES. By James Boswell, Esq. New Editions, with Notes and Appendices. By Alexander Napier, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge, Vicar of Holkham, Editor of the Cambridge Edition of the Theological Works of Barrow.

In this Edition the Text has been carefully revised, with the purpose of presenting it as it was left by Boswell; and the "Journal of the Tour"—not Interpolated with the Text as in the Life, as was done in all Mr. Croker's Editions—is printed from Boswell's final Edition.

New Notes have been added, in explanation of the Text; and to each volume have been subjoined Appendices, which deal at greater length with various questions which have arisen in the literature of the subject.

The Original Plates, forty-seven in number, have been carefully retouched for this Edition; and on Engraving, by G. Stodart, of the Peel Portrait of Johnson in the National Gallery has been added.

Vol. V., now ready, Johnsoniana, includes Mrs. Piozzi's Anecdotes; the Letters of Miss Hill Boothby, Tyer's Biographical Sketch; Cumberland's Recollections; matter from the works of Hannah More and Madame d'Arblay; and also the Diary of Dr. Taylor, now for the first time issued in England.

From the TIMES, February 14.

"The landscape and imposing edifice of a work which justly enjoys a world-wide fame will be welcomed by all in the handsome form in which it is now issued. It is an edition to revel over for its luxuriousness, what with its superb paper, its lordly margins, its large and clear type, its admirable engravings, and its excellent binding. . . . Croker, as an annotator, was the butt of a good deal of our ridicule, and Mr. Napier has done wisely in discarding many of his notes. Those which remain are only those which throw real light upon the work. But such service as this is not the only one rendered by the present editor, one to us the most important. He has put together in a most readable form, as appendices, &c., a vast mass of information about Johnson and Boswell which was either not accessible before, or accessible only to the uninitiated reader after an infinity of trouble.

New Edition, Thoroughly Revised and greatly Enlarged.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY,

ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES:

FOUNDED MAINLY ON THE MATERIALS COLLECTED BY THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

EDITED BY

JAMES A. H. MURRAY, LL.D.

PRESIDENT OF THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF MANY SCHOLARS AND MEN OF SCIENCE.

THE object of the NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY is to present, as concisely as possible, the history of every word, and of all the different uses of every word, in the written language, not omitting those which are now obsolete. In order to ensure complete accuracy and thoroughness, it has been judged desirable, instead of adopting the traditional and often erroneous instances contained in existing dictionaries, to make an entirely fresh selection of representative extracts from the original works themselves. To gather together this fresh and trustworthy material—in other words, to lay a secure and adequate foundation for the fabric of English lexicography—has been the task of five-and-twenty years, and of more than 1,300 readers, working under the superintendence of the London Philological Society. Over 5,000 of the chief English writers of all ages, and at least four times as many separate works, have been laid under contribution; and some idea of the bulk of the material which the Editor has drawn upon may be formed from the fact that more than 3,000,000 distinct quotations, each complete in itself, have been placed at his disposal, of which about a third part will be finally included in the Dictionary. Every passage is furnished with a precise date and reference for the purpose of verification.

Nor has the principle of co-operation been confined to the collection of the raw material. The Editor, though even the minutest details of the work have passed under his eye, has freely availed himself of the services of students of English, and of other branches of knowledge bearing thereon, in all parts of the world. The New Dictionary, therefore, will represent in a condensed form the accumulated knowledge of very many of the first scholars of our time; and will, if the expectations of its promoters are realized, be found in all respects abreast of the actual state of science. The Editor has sought to give such results only as are beyond dispute, avoiding rash speculation and all dogmatism on doubtful points. His object has been to allow each word, as far as possible, to tell its own story, by careful selection of the most characteristic examples, and by a strictly logical arrangement and subdivision of its various meanings; his own explanations being as brief as may be found consistent with clearness.

The work is addressed, not only to the advanced student of English literature, who will find it to combine a glossary of obsolete words with an etymological dictionary of the living language; or to the student of the sciences, who will learn from it at what date the technical terms with which he is dealing were introduced, and what modifications of form or sense they have since undergone; or to the professed philologist;—but also, and in no less a degree, to the general reader, who will here find, ready to his hand, the derivation and accepted pronunciation, the past history and present use, of every word which may occur in his reading, and concerning which he may desire to be further informed. It is thought that the extracts, even in the abridged form which considerations of space have rendered necessary, may still possess an independent interest of their own. Many vexed questions of etymology will be found to be settled once and for all when brought, as here, to the touchstone of history; and it can scarcely be but that new light will be thrown on various literary and bibliographical problems which have puzzled generations of inquirers. In the confident hope that it will be recognized as a contribution of solid and permanent value to the study of our language and literature, and as an attempt, carefully planned and conscientiously executed, to achieve for English all, and more than all, that Littré has achieved for French, the First Part of the NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY is now given to the world.

Subsequent Parts will be issued as rapidly as is found practicable, and the work will be completed in Six Volumes, each containing Four Parts similar to that now published.

though we shall be glad if our article should induce anybody to make himself personally acquainted with its more than masonic fascinations. Everything else apart, it is, one hardly knows why except that one loves it so, a test of temper without parallel, and ceteris paribus, or even imparibus, the finest temper wins in a canter. Lord Pembroke, according to Pepys and Mr. Marshall, heard even an eminent Quaker swear tremendously to himself when he lost. A fine temper has had much to do with the long success of Mr. Heathcote, as it had to do with that of the famous Frenchman Barre, the greatest tennis-player, as the writer of this article firmly believes, of living memory. Between him and the present all-round champion, the English professional Lambert, exist as links the brothers Tompkins, of Oxford and Brighton, whose play is delightful to watch from the old Barre-like grace of form and stroke which they still preserve, in the face of what we can only look upon as the decadence of general play, traceable to the personal influence of Lambert's game, which depends upon sheer strength and force of wrist (coupled of course with high qualifications) more than on the old steady pendulous stroke. It is very well for him; but in inferior hands it has generated a kind of ferocious skittles, in the place of the old quiet and "cut" return, which is very trying to the old school. It fails with years instead of improving, and so punishes itself. Meanwhile, unluckily, it is not only in the fields of tennis, but in broader and graver ones also, that "playing to win," regardless of the ways and the means, is beginning to be counted for everything.

Barre and Lambert never coincided enough in age to be able to meet and test the respective merits of their schools. The story of the old Frenchman is pathetic, and is pathetically told in Mr. Marshall's book, to whose contents the present writer can add upon this subject a touching anecdote of his own. After losing health and means through severe sufferings during the siege of Paris, Barre—always a pet over here—came to London once more. He was one of the spectators at a match at Lord's, where the rising sun of Lambert was shining very strongly, and there was a full and excited attendance. At a particularly fine cross-court stroke of Lambert's, shot rather than cut down into the corner with a crushing power which perhaps no other player has shown, some one forgetting Barre cried out, "Bravo, bravo! Barre could never have beaten him in his best days!" The writer happened to be sitting close to the old man, who had been generously admiring as much as anybody, but now sadly shook his head, and said in a voice no further audible, "Il a raison; je ne puis rien pouver maintenant." It fairly brought the tears to our eyes, and has haunted us ever since as a piece of homely tragedy.

Barre's spirit still lingers in the Paris courts, where, though the players of the day are inferior to the English, much of the old game is still to be seen. We say this with all respect to the Times, which, in a wonderful historical article the other day about the famous "Oath of the Tennis Court," stated as a fact that the game is now forgotten and unknown in France, except in the lawn-tennis form introduced from England, and that not a court remains in the land, though traces of the gallery from which the marker used to come down may yet be seen at Versailles. On the other hand, the temple-like little court which stands in the N.-W. angle of the Tuileries gardens has long been known to passers-by, and a second has quite lately been built on to it. Courts have been opened at Cannes and Deauville, and restored at Bordeaux and elsewhere; and markers do not come down from their galleries because they have none to go up into. The game is, in fact, making something like a revival in France. We fear that history upon casual subjects is rather rashly made in this way in Printing House Square, though it seems a pity not to have taken the very little trouble necessary to ascertain the true state of the case. In this instance we can at all events be justified in hoping that the history may not prove prophetic.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

THE Suez Canal meeting on Wednesday and its results, though the latter were equivalent to a partial and a narrow victory for the amended form of M. de Lesseps's agreement with England, were not of a character to lessen English objections to that agreement. In the first place, the malcontents turned out to be very much more numerous than had been thought. No trustworthy statistics of their actual voting power were obtainable, and the numerous partisans of the evergreen diplomatist and engineer elected to poohpooh them as representing only an insignificant section of the proprietary. Yet when the division came, and the voting was taken on the main question—that of the acceptance of the President's report—M. de Lesseps carried the day by five per cent. only of the votes polled, the total being 1,604 and the majority for the Report 82. This, moreover, was only one of the questions to be decided. The second was the alteration of the articles of association so as to permit the increase in the number of Directors necessary to include the proposed English contingent. This, it seems, requires, not a bare majority, as in the case of the mainly formal acceptance of the report, but a two-thirds vote; and, unless M. de Lesseps can invert some of the malcontents, or summon shareholders from one more vasty deep than that which he swept for the division on Wednesday, it does not seem by any means certain that he will get it. Furthermore, it does not seem to be absolutely certain that the division itself may not be legally challenged.

It is not necessary to be very critical of the meeting itself. We are quite accustomed in England to noisy meetings, and to meetings which think that rich and unscrupulous directors are robbing the poor but honest shareholder, and to meetings which entertain dark suspicions of coalitions on the part of the direction with some enemy or other. The livelier and more demonstrative character of the material of a Paris gathering seems, indeed, to have made itself felt. The admirably-named M. Abeille, a really busy and thrifty person, who described himself as having saved up five hundred francs for "Suez" as far back as 1858, is said to have "displayed agility of hands and feet," and to have "gesticulated in M. de Lesseps's face in a not very becoming manner." In all probability this is a timid and periphrastic description of the favourite pantomime (seldom going any further) by which a Frenchman shakes his fist underneath the nose of an enemy, with the accompanying remark "V-v-v-v-v-oleur!" or something else of the kind. M. Philippon summed up the national manners and economics very happily and pathetically, by observing that he had bought shares as a dot for Mlle. Philippon, who was now being disappointed of her just expectations. We sympathize deeply with Mlle. Philippon, and we do not think too hardly of M. Abeille's agility. Indeed, the speeches with which these gentlemen accompanied their protests contain nothing that is not excusable enough from a certain narrow but natural point of view. It must be very annoying indeed (and we say this with an entire absence of the slightest feeling of vulgar triumph) to see a work which was a kind of challenge to England passing more or less into English hands. It is a trial for men who endured not a few lean years to find that the fat years are not to be allowed to go on increasing indefinitely in fatness. And it is not unlikely to aggravate the annoyance that M. de Lesseps himself their own M. de Lesseps, who has certainly in his time worked upon patriotism and cupidity pretty freely—now administers grave rebukes to those who were moved by these two feelings. We think that M. Philippon and M. Abeille were (not at all from a merely English point of view) wrong, that they cannot reasonably expect their profits to go on doubling at the expense of an unmoved world, and that the hard facts of the vast English stake in the Canal and the preponderance of English custom make some alteration in the present state of things inevitable as a mere business matter, and according to principles which govern all commercial understandings, from costermongering to canal monopolies. But we can make the amplest allowance for M. Philippon and M. Abeille when they are unable to bring the philosophic mind to bear in this manner.

In M. Charles de Lesseps's speech, on the other hand, there is much more show of sweet reasonableness than in the speeches of the malcontents; but there is also much more justifying the very unenthusiastic character of the satisfaction with which we, in common with many Englishmen, regard the agreement. It may be said, of course, that, with M. Abeille indulging in agility on one side, and M. Philippon on the other, like a Roman advocate producing Mlle. Philippon sordidata, and crying "Où est ma dot?" a little exaggeration of the advantages on the Company's side would have been quite pardonable. But we can find no such exaggeration in the speech of M. Charles de Lesseps. When he says that, "If this was a proposal actually binding the Company, he should be the last to advocate it," there is no reasonable doubt that he speaks the truth, and there is much reasonable doubt whether it is worth England's while to enter into such a "not actually binding" agreement. When he told his hearers that "the Board might decide to-morrow to abandon the arrangement," and referred to the three English Directors to confirm his words, they did not dispute them. It is certain that they could not dispute them, except in regard to the increase of the direction, which is not carried. Yet the entire benefits, such as they are, which the agreement confers are absolutely dependent on the arbitrary will of the Board, which is still French by a great majority and will remain so. M. Charles de Lesseps declares that the English occupation of Egypt has nothing to do with the complaisance of his Board. It is pleasant to imagine (and only to imagine) a change of scene in which M. Camille Barrère should be in the place of Sir Evelyn Baring, and one of the generals who have been carrying on war in Tonquin after the humane fashion described in Thursday's Times in the place of Sir Gerald Graham. Perhaps M. Charles de Lesseps's excellent sentiments as to the necessity of consulting customers, and not aiming at too high dividends, might continue in that case, perhaps also they might not. But if they did not, it is quite certain that there is nothing in the agreement or in the constitution of the Company which could prevent the latter "perhaps" from translating itself into action.

Another argument which has before been urged against the present and any half-hearted and wrong-ended tinkering with the constitution and arrangements of the Canal is very remarkably confirmed and illustrated by this meeting. There were, we have said, some sixteen hundred votes given, and it may be taken as tolerably certain that the voting list was not by any means polled out. Now M. Charles de Lesseps himself puts it that England holds two-fifths of the shares—as a matter of fact she holds more. The total number of votes assignable in any case to this holding is as things stand ten. So that two-fifths and more of the capital is able to dispose of a one hundred and sixtieth part of the votes at the disposal of far less than three-fifths. More than two multiplied by one hundred and sixty becomes in Suez Canal arithmetic less than three. We do not know to what extent M. Abeille has increased his original investment of five hundred francs; we are not so impertinent as to desire without any right, or so fortunate as to be able to aspire with a right, to know the exact amount of Mlle. Philippon's dot. But, at the least, these gentlemen must have had two votes between them—that is to say, they could dispose of a fifth of the whole voting power which Great Britain, with its millions of holding, is ever to hope for according as far as the Lesseps ian agreement goes. It is extremely probable (since the average voting power of each shareholder present seems to have been nearer six than five) that between them they could actually outvote England. Now so long as this initial anomaly continues, so long let it be again and again repeated will matters never be satisfactory. It seems to be made a cringe against some of the malcontents that they want to sell their shares and "get out"; we really do not know why they should not, and the accusation is not very consistent with another taunt often used both by M. de Lesseps's partisans and the malcontents towards Englishmen, that the latter, if they want to manage the Canal, have only got to buy shares and seat their men on the Board. The fact is that the most elaborate and artificial arrangements have been taken expressly to prevent this consummation. There is, therefore, no great reason for Englishmen to rejoice over M. de Lesseps's victory, nor will there be much even if he succeeds in beating the malcontents on the further question of the directorate. The most that can be said is, that it is always hard for a Company which has once adopted a reasonable tariff to revert to an unreasonable one; that if the agreement is strictly carried out, considerable benefit will accrue to English commercial interests, and that the more important political advantages may possibly come if they are intelligently waited for. There are signs that M. de Lesseps does not regard the Suez Canal in a country dominated by the English with anything like the partiality with which he regarded it in the days when he was only not a rival to the Khedive because he was able to regard himself as (in reference to the Canal) the Khedive's superior, and that he is transferring his affections to the younger Panama venture. It is anything but certain that he will be able without English aid to raise the capital required for the Canal alterations, and in the raising of that capital there will be occasion for a little judicious generalship on the part of England. At present judicious generalship out of the actual field of battle does not seem to be the forte of Englishmen, and it is needless to say that all the advantages actually gained might be thrown away, and that all those possible to be gained would be at once rendered impossible by the surrender of the position which England now holds in Egypt. Mr. Gladstone has frequently announced himself as capable of such a surrender, but fortunately even Mr. Gladstone is, as was well shown in this very Canal matter, not an absolute dictator. With Egypt in less crotchety and more capable hands there would be little fear of Egyptian difficulties, whether on the River or on the Canal, in the Delta or in the Desert. It may be added that nothing so much as the irresolution of the Government attitude is likely to induce M. de Lesseps to make any very serious fight to retain what he has practically acknowledged to be an indefensible autocracy.

OLD RHINE WINES.

A THOUSAND louis d'or, or 96*l*. for a fudder of twelve ohms of ten-year old Johannisberg—equal to about 5*l*. a dozen—was a good price to pay, on the spot, in 1789; and it is recorded to have been actually paid by an Englishman. Such a wine were worthy of the royal implement which gives its name to the "Goldener Pfropfenzieher" at Oberwesel, whose signboard Schrödter painted, and which Baedeker still affectionately marks with a *. The ordinary cost of the first quality, as soon as it became saleable, was then from three to four thousand florins, or about a third of the Englishman's mad price. The Abbey of Johannisberg, which was also called Bischofsberg, was then a mere outhouse of the powerful and wealthy Abbey of Fulda, where the best of the wine was sent year by year. Still there remained in the immense cellars thousands of fudders. Bischofsberg was founded as a Benedictine convent (". . . montes Benedictus amabat") in 1106, by Ruthard, second Archbishop of Mainz; was dismantled in the sixteenth century by the Markgraf Albrecht of Brandenburg, and subsequently entirely demolished by the Swedes in the Thirty Years' war. It was then mortgaged by Archbishop Anselm Casimir, and sold by the mortgagee—one Hubert von Bleimann—to the Abbot of Fulda, who rebuilt the schloss, the church, and—the cellars. When Fulda was suppressed in 1802, Schloss Johannisberg fell to the Prince of Orange; in 1807 Napoleon gave it to Kellermann—if because of his name, he made one of the best practical jokes on record—and it was finally presented in 1816 by the Emperor of Austria, as an Imperial fief, to Prince Metternich, who, ere he blossomed into princedom, had long, as Graf von Metternich, owned considerable property not far off at Rüdesheim, including the fine ruins of the Brömserburg.

Highly as it was prized a hundred years ago, we may conclude that it has much improved within the last seventy years, chiefly perhaps because of the careful sorting of the grapes; but even now it is only in the finest seasons that the top of the first quality is reached, and it is run hard by the Duke of Nassau's Steinberg, from the hill at the back of Hattenheim, which was cultivated by the Cistercian monks of the Eberbach valley ("Bernardus valles . . .") seven centuries ago. Diez found that Johannisberg of 1865 contained one-tenth alcohol, while Steinberger of 1846 was considerably stronger, giving 11·60 per cent. of pure spirit. Gerken, who in the third volume of his now forgotten Travels, gave a good account of the wines of the Rheingau in the last century, is content to mention the best in topographical order merely as he proceeds up the river. Thus his list consists of Assmannshausen—in strictness below the Rheingau—Rüdesheim, including the Hauptberg, Rodtland, and Hinterhaus, as the vineyards behind Rüdesheim town are called; Geisenheim, with which he names Rothenberg and Kapellgarten; Johannisberg of the Fuldische-Schlossberg; Hattenheim and Markerbrunner (as he writes it; from Markbrunnen, "boundary well"); Eberbach Abbey and the Steinberg; Kitterich, now Kiedrich, and the Gräfenberg; and, finally, Rauenthal, with its Hauptberg. Above Mainz, he names on the left bank Laubenheim, Bodenheim, Bischheim, Nierstein, Dienheim, and Harxheim; and on the right Hochheim, the father of hocks and really on the Main, and the best slopes of Wickert and Kostheim.

The wines of Bacharach, the Ara Bacchi of the Middle Ages, were still in the eighteenth century reckoned among the best on the Rhine; those grown on the blue slate of the Vogtsberg and Kuhlberg being distinguished by a muscat flavour and an agreeable bouquet. It was of this wine that Æneas Sylvius, Pope Pius II (1458-1464), yearly brought a tun or fudder of 380 gallons to Rome, and the Emperor Wenceslaus, or Wenzel, sold Nuremburg its freedom for four fudders of it yearly. At this date it can scarcely be called advertising to mention a firm of wine-merchants which existed in 1789 among the Herrnhuter of Neuwied—that of Philipp Jakob Scheurer—which was famous for Rhine and Mosel wines, Bleichert (a term answering apparently to the "vin clairet," or pale red, of old French, which has given us our generic term claret)—and especially the "vins de Paille," which were to be seen "on the tables of many European Courts, side by side with Imperial Tokay"—a delicate touch which we venture to commend to the notice of the modern touter. But it is quite possible that the Scheurers might have found the custom of the independent burgesses of Cologne quite as desirable, for there was then no town in Germany that could boast so many drinking-shops, and their number was at times insufficient to hold the crowds that flocked to them. Drinking was the favourite pastime of the inhabitants. At the close of the day the merchant left his counting-house, the artisan his workshop, and the labourer his toil, and one and all congregated in the Weinstube or the Bierkneipe. The bottle was the end and aim of all their country excursions; whether across to Deutz or elsewhere, it was the foundation, the backbone, and took the place of the pièce de résistance in all their picnics. Young and old, men and women, drank alike, and gallantry and flirtation took but second place even in the dancing parties the Germans have always loved so well; albeit they could by no manner of means have made Allan Ramsay's excuse for swilling, and said,

> Bacchus only drinks with me
> When Ariadne's coy.

They were rabid politicians, too, sad Republicans even then, and plotted their seditions over their cups, and it might truly be told of them, as Dryden said of Shadwell, that the only loyal service they rendered their ruler was to increase the revenue by drinking.

The vines then cultivated a hundred years since in the Rheingau were divided into the common, which did not grow very tall, and were called Rieslinge, a name which survives in the Forster Riesling of the Palatinate and in many other wines. The grapes of this sort ripened first, and gave, next to the Orleans, the best and strongest wine. Then there were the Orleans, the "Klebroth," or Red Burgundy, and those called the Lambert. Gerken advised vine-growers to prefer the Burgundy grape of Assmannshausen, because the red colour did not hurt Rhine wines; because it matured sufficiently even in bad years, when other grapes did not ripen; and because its wine was saleable in the year of its manufacture—a great advantage to the poorer cultivators. But viticulture must then have been still in a most rudimentary state; for the Rhenish peasant could not then be considered rich, his whole income being derived from his vines, which have ever been at the mercy of "bad years." The nobles and the wealthy merchants, too, held all the best vineyards, and a couple of poor vintages ruined the peasant and sent him to the money-lender. Then he soon sold or lost his vineyard, and became a labourer for hire. Thus, at Assmannshausen, where the Bleichert was in 1789 beginning to be preferred to the finest Burgundies, the village plainly spoke of poverty, the greater part of the inhabitants being struggling day-labourers. No wonder, then, that the vines were manured but every six or seven years with road-scrapings, old earth, mortar from ruined houses, and perfectly decayed farm-manure. This was done before the winter, and the vines were frequently hoed during spring and summer, to destroy weeds. The summer prunings were tied round the stem to dry, and given to cows in the following winter. The bunches of grapes were cut with a small sickle, and pounded with a great wooden pestle at Worms and in the Rheingau, but trodden underfoot at Frankfort and its neighbourhood. The grapes thus crushed were brought in large tuns to the press, whence the must ran down, through long wooden tubes, into the vats in the cellars. The presses were either the ancient Baumkelter, in which the pressure was obtained by means of the heavy trunk of a large tree, or the screw-press, in which the screw was of wood. A great novelty in 1789 was the iron-screw press—in which, of course, the peasants saw all sorts of imperfections. The first runnings of the press are the weakest, but also the most delicate; that which follows has more character and strength; the last is bad and rough. By mixing all three the first gains body and the last loses its harshness. But there was even a fourth pressing, and then the refuse was, as in many wine countries, used for distillation. This refuse had to be pulled to pieces with the hands, else would it take fire in fermenting; it was then trodden in a vat containing six inches of clay covered by a layer of sand. Or the bullocks were fed with it; but given to cows it caused them to run dry.

Gerken noted that in his time, as now, in the hot dry years the vineyards on the heights away from the river produced the best wines, while in cold wet years the yield of the plain and the Rhine banks was to be preferred. Old casks in which good wine has lain, and in which much tartrate remains, are, when well cleaned and scalded, best for the new wine. If put into new casks it retains, it is true, a finer and more delicate flavour, but it develops more body and fire in the old wood, for the new cask absorbs much of the sulphates and the essential oils during the fermentation, whereas an old one gives strength and purifies during the same stage. In small casks, too, the wine becomes sweeter and gentler, and is sooner drinkable, but the loss by evaporation is twice as great as in the genuine large Rhine tun, the Rheinische Stückfass, which should hold seven ohms and a half, or about 250 gallons. In these the wine ripens better, if more slowly, and develops more body, and all the Rheingau produce must be reckoned hard and even disagreeable when too new. Here may be quoted an old dictum taken from Förster about a good Rhine wine. First, it should have a strikingly agreeable flavour; next, it should be clear as crystal; thirdly, a murmur as of some tiny brooklet should be heard in pouring it out; and, lastly, there should appear in the centre of the glass a suspicion of "sparkling," which should rapidly bead away in evanescent bubblets. It is a bad sign if a slight foam mount leisurely, and take an appreciable time to disappear. Such a wine has almost certainly been blended and doctored. A century ago, as nowadays, the first quality of the choicest wines was rarely to be had in the Rhine inns. The cost of transport and the Customs dues being the same for all qualities, the merchants bought only the best, which also travelled best, leaving behind only the lower qualities. Thus it came to pass that all the finest Rhine wines were to be drunk in North Germany.

PAPAL POETS.

HER MAJESTY'S fresh instalment of her Diary appears at almost the same moment with another volume emanating from a crowned—and indeed triply crowned—head. Under the title of Leonis XIII. Pont. Maximi Carmina, Professor Brunelli of Perugia has just edited a collection of Latin poems by the present Pope, with an Italian version of his own. The appearance of such a work naturally suggests reflections on the literary and especially the poetical antecedents of the long line of pontiffs to whom his Holiness succeeds. The subject is not, in one sense, a very copious one, for the number of Popes, as of other rulers or potentates in Church or State, who have enjoyed a literary reputation has, as might be expected, not been very great. Mr. Creighton makes rather a strong statement in saying of Æneas Silvius (Pius II.) that "he is, perhaps, the only man of letters who has been equally eminent in literature and in statesmanship." But as a rule the two kinds of eminence are not found in combination. Many Sovereigns and Popes have been men of no special distinction of any sort, and those who have been distinguished were usually, to cite a phrase—if we remember rightly of Napoleon's—"too busy making history to have time to write it"; still less could they find leisure for poetical composition. As regards the early Popes the fact has often been noticed, and is dwelt on by Milman, partly in proof of the inherent and growing greatness of their See, that none of them were men of very conspicuous personality; the very names and dates even of some of the series are still uncertain. It is not too much to say that Leo the Great in the middle of the fifth century is the first whose personal character emerges from obscurity; so much so that the same writer justly speaks of his pontificate as constituting an "epoch in the history of Latin, or rather of universal, Christianity." And Leo was moreover a considerable preacher; at this day many of his sermons might be preached with edification, and with scarcely the change of a word, before an educated congregation, from either an Anglican or a Roman Catholic pulpit; there is an almost modern tone about them, and Milman calls them "singularly Christian, as dwelling almost exclusively on Christ." The next great pontiff, a century and a half later, was also a preacher and a writer, and even a poet, though he has been somewhat unfairly gibbeted by Hallam and other authorities as a typical enemy of learning. Hallam says that hostility to it "was inculcated in the most extravagant degree by Gregory I., the founder in a great measure of the papal supremacy, and the chief authority in the dark ages"; there is even a late, and probably apocryphal, story of his burning a library of heathen authors. It is certain that he spoke with some contempt of grammatical niceties in writing, and thought it improper for clergymen to be employed in teaching grammar; and that he commended the youthful Benedict, afterwards founder of the Benedictine Order, for his flight from Rome to the desert, preferring to be "nescienter sciens et scienter indoctus." But Benedict fled to escape the vices, not the education, of the capital; and it must be remembered on the one hand that the bent of Gregory's mind was in the direction of practical energy and especially of missionary enterprise—which made him, in Milman's words, "the father of the Mediæval Papacy"—while on the other hand he lived at a period when the old classical Latin was in the last stage of decay, and neither the mediæval Latin, which is really a different language, nor any of the tongues of modern Europe were yet in a position to replace it. The kind of grammatical instruction he put aside as mere waste of precious time was in fact little better than a form of obsolete pedantry. Meanwhile he was himself, as we have seen, a poet, and some of the finest of the ancient hymns still preserved in the Roman Breviary are from his pen; a monk of Monte Cassino, named Amatus, dedicated to him a poem on St. Peter and St. Paul.

It is a far cry from Gregory I. at the end of the sixth century to Gregory VII., better known as Hildebrand, at the end of the eleventh; but, with the exception of Nicholas I. and Leo IX., who also were men of action, not men of letters, there is no Pope of commanding personality between them. Leo IX. is said indeed to have been an effective preacher, but rather from the saintly unction of his sermons than from any special rhetorical power. The two next great pontiffs, Innocent III. and Innocent IV., had little time for indulging in any literary pursuits, and thus we are brought, after two centuries more, to Pius II., whose name has already been referred to, and who has not been unjustly described as, in his previous life, before he became immersed in public affairs, "one of the earliest representatives of the man of letters pure and simple." His literary tastes were not indeed exactly accordant with his subsequent position. He wrote among other things a poem, as he boasted, of more than two thousand lines in length in honour of the mistress of his Sienese friend, Mariano de Sozini, and he took pride in receiving from Frederick III. the laureate's crown. It is quite true that few men of more consummate abilities or larger ambition ever sat on the papal throne than Pius II., who in changing his name, not only abandoned the immoralities, but, as Milman puts it, "boldly, unreservedly, absolutely condemned the heretical tenets of Æneas Silvius." The next pontiff of decided literary tastes, who, though not himself an author, was a liberal and appreciative patron of learned men, and especially of poets, was unfortunately still less of a credit to the Papacy than Pius II. The retort of an Anglican controversialist, when charged with the Socinianism of Bishop Hoadley, "Leo X. was a Pope, though an infidel," may perhaps be an exaggeration, but that his tastes and his morals were alike essentially Pagan there can be no manner of doubt. The Italian poetry of the age which he and other Renaissance Popes delighted to patronize, was of the type consigned to an immortality of shame in Beccadelli's Hermaphroditus. If we pass over two centuries more, Benedict XIV. and Clement XIII., better known as Ganganelli, two of the best as well as ablest Popes of the later centuries, were both authors, but we are not aware that either of them cultivated poetry.

As regards the present Pope, his literary habits and capabilities have long been matter of notoriety; and Signor Brunelli takes occasion, in the preface to the volume of poems he has edited, to tell us some pertinent anecdotes in illustration of it. Thus it appears that, when Bishop of Perugia, Cardinal Pecci took an active interest in the working of his diocesan seminary, and was in fact "more than Bishop, he was our rector, master, and father." He was constantly to be seen "in the chapel, in the corridors, at meals, at recreation, in the private rooms, in the school, and even teaching at the desk." On one morning, for instance, Brunelli, then himself a student, came down late for his class, and was much taken aback to find the Cardinal Bishop himself seated at the master's desk and explaining Cicero Pro Milone to his pupils. Brunelli mentions that he knew by heart more than half of Dante, and nearly the whole of the Æneid and Odes of Horace. His recent move in regard to the Vatican Library was noticed in our columns at the time. It may be added here that three weeks ago he received in private audience the members of the German Historical Club in Rome, with each of whom he conversed separately on the particular work he was engaged upon, and then proceeded to deliver a general address, in which the following significant passage occurs:—"We have no fears about the publication of documents, for every Pope, one more, another less, has laboured, often under great difficulties, for the advance of God's kingdom on earth, and this among all peoples. . . . Work then, with courage and perseverance, with activity and joy, not so much for earthly reward and human recognition and honour as for the honour and glory of God." The present volume is of a somewhat lighter, though mainly of a religious kind. It opens with poems commemorating St. Herculanus and another martyred bishop of Perugia, and then follow verses of a more directly personal interest. One poem is addressed to a friend, "Ad Vincentium Panormum," on his name of Vincent. Another, "De Invaletudine Sua, 1830," is on a serious illness which threatened his own life when he was only ten years old; it begins:—

Morborum heu quanta vi miser obrueris;
Juverit hos fando tristes memorare dolores,
Et vitæ arumnas ulcere carminibus.

Then follow some couplets describing his illness, and expectation of death, and the poem ends:—

Non me laborum perturbant gaudia vitæ,
Acerbum nec me mortis perturbat metus;
Attingat potiam felix ora advena, felix
S. vasa ad portum ducere nauta ratem.

After this there come lines on a certain youth, Roger A. C. by name, who "affectum mulierem depellit"; then some in which "fons loquitur," like Horace's fountain of Bandusia; then some more "de se ipso" under date of 1875; verses on his sister, on Gertrude Sterbini, a virgin, and various sets on different priests of the author's acquaintance and superiors of convents. One poem is on "Ars photographica," one addressed to a Perugian friend, whom he desired to recall from an immoral life, and one bears the ominous title, "Damnatorum ad inferos lamentabilis vox"; two are in Italian, one being a hymn to the Virgin, the other, of a jocose kind, addressed to Orioli, his predecessor in the Delegation of Benevento. The lines seem generally, as far as we can judge from the specimens before us, to be smooth and classical in form, but the chief and permanent interest of the volume will lie, of course, in its frequent biographical allusions, from the time of the author's early childhood down to the present day, and in the evidence it affords of classical tastes and pursuits, for which neither Popes nor Papalini have of late years been remarkable. And the circumstance mentioned by the editor, of his Holiness's intimate familiarity with both Virgil and Dante, shows that in his case this habit of mind has been cherished through life. Dante is indeed the great Catholic poet of the middle ages, and there is a close affinity between the teachings of the Divina Commedia and of Aquinas, which may help to explain the predilection of the present Pope for it. But it seems that he is equally at home in Virgil and Horace, and here no such secondary interest can have prompted his choice.

It may further be observed that the volume reflects a pleasing light on the simplicity, devoutness, and natural sympathy of the personal character of Leo XIII. We see his patience and trust in the Divine mercy under severe illness, his playful rallying of one companion, and urgent warning of another, whom he feared to be straying into forbidden paths, his affection for his sister and loyalty to his friends. There is nothing to be sure out of the common in all this, nothing we are not accustomed to meet with every day, but then somehow it is pleasant to be reminded that Popes and Kings are after all "our own flesh and blood," and it is especially pleasant, when they are persons exemplary and energetic in the discharge of the public duties of their exalted station, to find that their human feelings and sympathies remain warm and fresh as though no such divinity did hedge them about, and that they are quite willing to confess so much. It is this revelation which gives to the Queen's Highland Journal its peculiar charm, and has evoked so wide and hearty a response among its multitudinous readers. And we can well imagine that for the great multitude of Christians of various nations, who look up to the successor of St. Peter as their spiritual father and pastor, this little collection of papal poems will have something of the same significance and attraction, and that they will recognize in it the "touch of nature" which makes Pope and peasant kin. For those among them who are scholars and keenly alive to the importance of enlisting scholarship in the service of religion, it will of course possess a further interest as coming from such a quarter. But to the ordinary Catholic, who cares little for such matters, and has been accustomed to gaze in distant awe, as at an infallible but impersonal oracle, at the mysterious presence enthroned in the Vatican, it may be expected to convey something of the impression produced on Dr Arnold's boys at Rugby, according to his biographer, as they whispered to each other in accents of half-incredulous admiration, "Why, he calls us fellows."

SCHOOL MANAGERS.

As a nation we rather pride ourselves on our genius for administration, yet certain administrative curiosities have been developed in our midst which could not well be matched for unwisdom by anything that can be found in the countries which we are so fond of tutoring. The statement that we are now about to make may seem incredible to many people, but it is true all the same. The London School Board employs 4,500 teachers.

The average salary of the head-masters is . .	272	15	0
" " " head mistresses is .	182	3	0
" " " assistant-mistresses is .	94	0	3

These salaries are undoubtedly good, and a head-mastership under the Board is one of the prizes of the teaching profession. There are 300 head-masters, 590 head-mistresses, and in all about 3,600 assistants. For the financial year which ends with this month the amount estimated by the Board to be paid for teachers' salaries is 580,000*l.*, but we imagine that the estimate is rather high. Take the amount at 550,000*l.*, and it will be seen that the persons who appoint the teaching staff have an enormous amount of patronage at their disposal. Every post that falls vacant is eagerly sought after, and we have no doubt that, if an advertisement were issued to-day inviting applications for the mastership of any given school under the Board, the committee would receive at least four hundred applications during next week. The choice of a teacher is a difficult task, which may have momentous results. If we consider the mischief that may be wrought by a single incompetent schoolmaster, it is evident that no amount of caution can be reckoned as exaggerated when the fate of several hundred young children is in question. There is no work so wearing as that of elementary teaching, there is no work that requires special aptitudes and special training to such a degree, and there is no work that is nearly so hard to gauge. Before a man is fit to judge whether a teacher is good or bad, he must have acquired a certain indefinable skill which only comes by long practice or long observation. A schoolmaster may be full of knowledge and yet be a mere dreary bungler in school, while another man whose culture is narrow may be able to impart the little he knows like a consummate artist. A good elementary teacher must have healthy physique, and perfect temper; his patience must never for a moment give way, for, if he once shows that he can be ruffled, his influence is gone; he must work with absolute quietude, because the least sign of fussiness is fatal to discipline; he must have learned by years of practice a hundred little devices like the "short cuts" employed by a crack Cambridge mathematician. If he is too familiar his lads secretly despise him; if he is too distant he cannot make his youngsters like him, and a man who is not liked may as well give up the trade of teaching. A good school is a fine sight; a bad school is a dangerous nuisance.

Now let us see what kind of men and women are set by the London Board to decide whether teachers have or have not the qualities which we have described as fitting a man to conduct a school with success. The ten divisions of London are split up into groups, and the schools in each group are under the control of a committee of managers. These managers are chosen by the members of the Board, and the mode of selection is not a little droll. The Dissenting member picks out a Dissenter, the Church member picks out a Churchman, and it is very easy to imagine the kind of committees which are pitchforked together by this interesting arrangement. It is not too much to say that there are districts of London in which no teacher can possibly obtain an appointment unless he belongs to one or other religious sect which happens to hold the majority of the committee for the group. Educational qualifications are not taken into account at all in choosing these remarkable "managers." An illiterate grocer who happens to have made himself active in canvassing during an election has his vanity gratified by an appointment to a committee. Let us choose two representative bodies of managers, and the public may then see in what hands the educational destinies of London are placed. The first committee consisted of a bricklayer, a bootmaker, a chemist, the chemist's wife, a lawyer's clerk, a relieving officer, and two ladies. The second consisted of a pork-butcher and his wife, a general dealer, a registrar of births, an undertaker, a livery-stable keeper, a stationer, and a money-lender who did business in a small way. One lady member of the Board lately appointed a chimney-sweep as school manager. The chimney-sweep was doubtless a public-spirited man, useful at elections, and enthusiastic in the cause of education. We do not of course know what studies he pursued during the intervals when he was not practising his salutary labours; yet surely his training hardly fitted him to measure the qualities of teachers. Under the New Code graduates of Oxford, Cambridge, and London are permitted to apply for schools under the Board, and the difficult London degree is quite commonly possessed by the teachers. At the risk of using words appropriate to an Enemy of the People, we are bound to say that a chimney-sweep is not (on the doctrine of chances) likely to be an efficient critic of University scholars.

Cultured ladies and gentlemen occasionally serve on a committee, but they are few in number, and the great army of ignorant busybodies is most strongly represented. Funny but humiliating stories appear from time to time in the educational and other journals. "I hope, sir," said one beaming and bland authority, "that you teach these boys the proper pronounciation of the Haitches. Boys, do you pronounce your Haitches." The quick little fellows were much amused by this address. A chairman of one of the committees of managers in a very important district may be congratulated on having made the shortest speech on record. At a public meeting the president inquired, "Who seconds this motion?" The school manager arose, and said, "Me." A teacher once took the returns for his school before the managing committee. The chairman gazed with apprehension on the card, which showed that for the first week the percentage had been 96·04, while for the second week it was 96·8. The intrusion of the decimal point represented nothing to him, and he said with dignity, "How, sir, do you account for this extraordinary and culpable decrease?" Another excellent man objected to the teaching of physiology. He feared lest religion might suffer, and he observed with stern emphasis, "I don't believe the Creator meant children to know so much about their own insides. We're turning out thirty thousand atheists every year."

Now these persons, who would be excellently useful if they were set to look after buildings or furniture, are not permitted to order the expenditure of a farthing. As an evening journal lately observed, they cannot order a new pane of glass or a penny-worth of paint; their function is to appoint the teachers who are to shape the minds and lives of half a million children. It is hard to believe, but such is the fact.

The result is that, although many good appointments are made, yet the amount of blundering and jobbery is distressing. Vain and ignorant persons are put in a position where vanity and ignorance find daily solace. Let us suppose that a new teacher is to be chosen. Canvassing is supposed to disqualify any candidate, but canvassing goes on, and always will go on. An illiterate butcher or grocer finds himself in the delightful position of being courted by men and women of education. Could any stronger bait be held out to petty natures? The wife of the pork-butcher whom we mentioned above may not be quite sure about the long words in a reading-book, yet her interest may be solicited by a clever University man, or by a skilful teacher of twenty years' experience. The canvassing goes merrily on, and the selection is generally decided long before the final meeting takes place; but candidates are brought up from all parts of the country at the ratepayers' expense, and the committee-man's greatest moment comes. One by one the ladies and gentlemen are summoned from the ante-room and stand at the foot of the table where the pork-butcher and the grocer and the others sit in dignity. The pleasure of "heckling" an educated man is keenly appreciated, and, as some of the candidates are nervous, the committee have great fun. Here are some specimen questions which were lately published:—"Do you object to the use of tobacco?" "How would you cure a sulky child?" "Do you read novels?" "Do you consider novels as proper reading for a teacher of youth?" "How is it that you passed 98·1 per cent. in 1877 and 97·9 in 1878?" And all this time, let it be remembered, the inquisitors have not the slightest notion as to whether the man before them can or cannot teach. If the sensible example of certain provincial Boards were followed, if members went to different schools and saw the applicants actually at work, there would be a chance for good teachers. As it is, the suave person who makes gentle answers, the bold one who has no nerves to speak of, may be appointed, while a nervous man who is an excellent teacher may be thrown out, even if the selection happens not to be pre-arranged. It is sometimes said of a badgered candidate, "His presence is not good." We know what is the Abstract Grocer's idea of a "presence." The most ludicrous and shameful results arise from this senseless system. Not many months ago, two University graduates, two men who had taken all the honours possible in their training colleges, and two very successful teachers, were rejected in favour of a man who had taken the last position on his college list and held it against all comers. The winning candidate was a member of a chapel attended by four out of seven of the committee, and the majority took their own way. It has happened that, in a single night, appointments worth over a thousand a year have been made by a small knot of persons of whom hardly one could have passed the examination set to children of ten in an average Board school. Small bodies of uncultured and obscure people spread over the whole of London choose the essential portions of the vast educational machinery erected by the Board, and such people take narrow views of their duties as responsible managers just as they take narrow views of everything in life. So it has come about that good teachers in the provinces rarely think it worth while to apply now for London situations. The general impression in the country is that the farce of advertising for teachers might just as well be done away with, since the best appointments are decided by ignoble local jobbery before ever the advertisement has appeared. It must be stated that the nominations of the district committees must be ratified by a committee of the central Board; but this means nothing. When the local committees have sent up their nominations, then the persons nominated attend at the central office. Sometimes thirty, sometimes forty, sometimes sixty or more teachers appear at the Board offices, and have their appointments settled in a single afternoon. They pass rapidly through a room, answer a few hurried questions, and scuttle out again. The process is necessarily slovenly, and the members of the Board must deplore their own want of acquaintance with the individuals whom they thus send away to responsible employments as rapidly as a shepherd pushes a flock into the sheep-wash. This kind of thing should be stopped at once. Of course the necessity for local self-government will be pleaded as soon as it is proposed to abolish the local committees. We find no fault with local self-government; we only say that, in the particular instance which we have discussed, certain local self-governors are unfit for their office—and mischievously unfit. What should we say if we read in a book of travels such a statement as the following?—"The naval service of (say) Lapitta is very expensively kept up, and the organization is most complicated. The mode adopted in choosing naval officers would be considered strange in our own land; but the inhabitants appear to think it quite natural. Supposing that a navigating lieutenant is required, then the selection is made from a body of men who hold certificates, granted by the State, for nautical astronomy, navigation, and practical seamanship. The candidates appear before a committee composed of a tailor, a plasterer, a clergyman, a confectioner, and a newspaper editor. By leaving the selection to men who are totally ignorant of navigation, it is believed that impartiality is secured. The committee have nothing to do with ships' stores: their function is to appoint officers on whose skill the lives of sailors depend." We should reckon this a curious way of managing business; but, seriously speaking, how far does our caricature differ from the actual state of things which exists in London?

The Board should choose an "Appointments Committee," made up partly of the Board's own members and partly of representatives from the various local districts. The money muddled away on the travelling expenses of candidates might be spent in paying the expenses of inspectors whose duty it should be to visit the applicants in various parts of the country and report formally on their work. Local jobbery would thus be avoided; a fair chance would be given to good men; and a ludicrous scandal might, once and for all, be ended.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN RELATIONS.

WE lately placed before our readers a summary sketch of the internal political condition of Japan. We propose now to complete our survey by drawing attention with equal brevity to the most salient features of her external affairs, believing that the time has come when politicians and men of business alike should awake to the reality of our potential interests in that distant country. The foreign policy of the Japanese Empire may be regarded under two distinct heads, corresponding respectively to her position as an Asiatic Power and her relations with the Western world. There is one preliminary observation, however, which applies to both sets of foreign relations alike—namely, that until some thirty years ago she may be said almost to have succeeded in not having any. The exclusiveness which repelled the "Western barbarian" from her shores had been strictly maintained for nearly three centuries. Of the causes which induced this policy, suffice it here to say that the simultaneous proscription of foreigners and Christians where before both had been tolerated is attributed by history to the necessity imposed upon the Government of safeguarding the public welfare from the political intrigues of Jesuit missionaries. Native Christians remained under the ban until a few years ago; and the only exception to the rule excluding aliens was in the annual reception of a single Dutch ship at the port of Nagasaki, and the settlement there of a few Dutch traders, confined almost as prisoners upon a strip of land in the harbour, and subjected to such indignities that the mind revolts from the greed of gain that could induce free men to submit to such a life. During this period, moreover, Japanese subjects leaving their native land returned at peril of their lives; and official regulations, coupled with the unsuitability for any but coasting voyages of the native junk (said to have been specially designed with this object), succeeded in restricting intercourse with the mainland opposite to such occasional ventures as authority chose to permit. But since 1854 the treaties have opened several ports and the two principal cities of the Empire to foreign residence and commerce; and, more recently, the policy of the present Government and the adoption of Western models in shipbuilding have made the Japanese people themselves practically free to go where they will.

Ever since the invasion of Korea at the close of the sixteenth century (which, without conferring any benefit on the invaders, appears, from recent accounts, to have left a permanent blight upon the peninsular kingdom) Japan undertook no foreign military expedition of any kind until some ten or twelve years ago. The opening of the country to European trade and the revolution of 1868, which aroused the people from the lethargy of ages, awoke the Government at the same time to the position of their country as an Asiatic Power. Among the material accessories of European science, eagerly caught at and turned to account, sea-going ships and steam navigation made a foreign policy in Asia both possible and necessary. Together with a mercantile marine there has naturally grown up also a sea-going navy on European lines, while for transport the Government has made provision by retaining rights over the fleets of subsidized steamship Companies. All this is in accordance with the appropriate development of an island Empire. Her insular position, corresponding somewhat closely with that of Great Britain in this hemisphere, points to similar capabilities in like directions; and modern Japanese are fond of calling their country the "England of the East," a healthy aspiration which may help to bring about some portion of its own fulfilment. But it was not to be expected that Japan could operate in this extended sphere of political activity without exciting some sense of uneasiness in her neighbour—one cannot speak of neighbours in the plural, for, with the exception of Russia, of which presently, China is practically Japan's only neighbour. The natural antagonism arising from geographical contiguity has of late years been accentuated by the diametrically opposed attitude towards Occidentalism inspired by the genius of either people. China, remaining wrapped in old exclusiveness, looks on at the headlong career of her neighbour with dismay, coupled with contempt for what she views as treason to the cause of Oriental civilization. Japan, believing heart and soul in the superiority of the new lights, contemns in her turn the obtuseness or obstinacy of the half-torpid giant at her gates. Occasions have not been wanting for bringing these feelings into prominence. China has had, or thought she had, practical grounds to fear the newly-aroused activity of Japan in the seas that wash the shores of both. Three times within the last twelve years the two nations have been in danger of going to war. On the first of these occasions, when Japan sent a considerable force to the large island of Formosa, over portions of which China has unquestioned territorial rights, with the ostensible object of exacting reparation from a savage tribe of natives for the murder of some shipwrecked sailors, the just susceptibilities of China were not unnaturally touched—though probably, if the truth were told, internal rather than external politics would be found to have afforded the real motive of the expedition. On the second occasion, the assumption by the Central Government of Japan of direct control over the Loochoo Islands, for three hundred years administered as a subordinate fief by the Prince of Satsuma, but where, nevertheless, China put forward, as is her wont, certain shadowy rights, barred by three centuries of prescription; and again, not two years ago, when, in the course of a domestic insurrection, a mob attacked the Japanese Legation in Korea, in which kingdom also China claims, perhaps with better show of reason, some rights of suzerainty—on these two occasions an impartial retrospect shows Japan to have in no way exceeded her rights, or even her plain and simple duty. Indeed, on the last-named occasion, the Ministers of the Mikado, in circumstances of great national aggravation, and in the face of a provocative attitude and assumption of authority on the part of China, displayed a most exemplary coolness and moderation; and, by maintaining throughout the crisis a spirit of dignified conciliation, avoided the collision which the action of China, for once headlong and inconsiderate, was quite calculated to produce. But neither country is really in a position to inflict any serious blow upon the other; and a consciousness of this fact has no doubt helped diplomacy on both sides to keep the peace so far. On both sides of the sea, however, the power to assume the offensive is growing, and will grow. Fortunately Korea, the natural bone of contention, by entering into treaty relations with the European Powers, will practically be neutralized. And, Korea apart, it is really difficult to see any substantial ground of contention between the nations, unless China some day determines to have the Loochoo Islands by force, the southernmost of which, nearest to her geographically, and strategically important, Japan has already offered to cede to close the controversy.

The only other neighbour affecting Japan's position as an Asiatic State is Russia. All this century, and occasionally before it, Russia has been feeling Japan's northern boundaries. Not many years ago the large island of Saghalin—containing coal—which is an extension of the Japanese geographical system in a north-westerly direction to the mouth of the Amoor, was ceded or acknowledged to belong to Russia in exchange for the Kurile Islands, the north-eastern horn of the same group, which, however, Japan had some reason for believing belonged to her already. The story certainly recalls a well-known fable. But though Saghalin had coal, it had not a good harbour; and a good harbour, free from ice all the year round, is the primary need of Russia in the Pacific, without which she can never be, as she evidently intends to be, the commanding naval power in those waters. Now the northernmost of the main islands of Japan, Yezo, has excellent harbours, and, though always an integral part of the Empire, Yezo is politically, at all events, an outlying portion, only partially settled by Japanese immigrants; popularly and officially it is called a colony. We do not suppose for a moment that Russian statesmen have ever contemplated the deliberate appropriation of Hakodaté or any other harbour in Yezo or out of it. But it is certainly significant that that spot, and the northern island generally, separated by a narrow strait only from the now undisputed Russian territory of Saghalin, has for many years past been the scene of the most active propaganda of the Orthodox Church. Enormous sums have been spent in this pious work, and the converts are reckoned by thousands. Missionaries of the Greek Church in those parts are not left to their own unaided efforts, but have the direct official support of the representatives of the Russian Government in Japan. Their headquarters in the capital, whence the work in Yezo is directed, have been constituted, by the cleverness of a former Russian envoy, an outlying part of the Legation, and enjoy all immunities and privileges accordingly. It seems a remote stake to manœuvre for; but we know Russian diplomacy to be prescient and patient, and perhaps it did not seem so remote when the earliest moves were made; yet it cannot be doubted that, if the opportunity should ever arise, it would greatly facilitate the achievement of a sudden coup to be able to reckon upon the good-will of a few thousand intelligent natives on the spot. Meanwhile, as Russia is steadily pushing her coast-line on the mainland further and further south into the neighbourhood of some very useful harbours on the outlying confines of Korea, well away from the lines and centres of trade in which England and other Powers are interested, it is not improbable that the coveted acquisition may be made before very long in that direction, and the evangelization of Yezo be left to the missionary zeal of other Churches. And as, besides Russia, there is no Western Power likely to come into collision with Japan—the action of the French Republic being, of course, for the present omitted from calculation in all parts of the world—there is fair ground for hoping that the country may be left free to work out its destiny in peace.

But even amidst the blessings of peace, there are yet obstacles to Japan's development arising from causes external to herself. Though war with a Western State may be out of the question, there is between Japan and the European Powers collectively a perpetual diplomatic struggle. When the country was opened thirty years ago treaties were made on the bases common to the relations of Europe with Oriental States. The main features of these, by which all the treaty Powers are practically placed on the same footing, are the control by the treaty-imposing Power of the tariff of the Oriental State, and the exemption of foreign subjects, under the system known by the name of ex-territoriality, from the jurisdiction of native judges and magistrates. Such arrangements, not only useful but necessary at the outset of foreign intercourse, and, in Mahommedan and some other countries always, are at the present day neither necessary nor useful in Japan. The conditions are widely different; religious intolerance is unknown, and race antipathy, always confined to the official classes, has given place, among them too, to an earnest desire to cultivate the most friendly relations with the people and Governments of foreign nations. Of the two points at which the existing treaty relations press heavily upon the administration of government in Japan, the inability of an exchequer, sadly deficient in specie returns, to collect an adequate customs revenue, by reason of a tariff arbitrarily fixed by those who had the power to impose their will, is a real and very obvious grievance. The other great trouble is found in the restrictions placed upon the exercise by the Government of control over the ports and places set apart for foreign residence, whereby not only foreigners themselves, but frequently also Japanese subjects in their employment, and others, are placed beyond the reach of police measures, and often of law in any shape whatever. The abuses arising from this cause are manifold and serious, as may well be supposed, though they would have been less had the practice of foreign officials followed even the lines of restriction warranted by the treaties themselves; but this has not been the case. The chief practical difficulty lies in this—that, foreign offenders being justiciable in their own and not in the territorial courts, its own legislation is for each nationality the sole criterion of an offence. As regards the majority of offences—probably all the class of offences against individuals—our own law is sufficient. But in the case of offences against the State, and against local, police, and municipal regulations, our own law has necessarily no application in Japan; and as our officials dispute the application to foreign residents of Japanese law of any kind, or for any purpose, there is a large class of cases, and those of the kind causing most hindrance to municipal administration, wherein foreign residents are thus amenable to no law whatever. One or two of the foreign Ministers, our own included, have a limited power of legislating ad hoc in special cases for the governance of their nationals. But this power, or the method of its exercise, has in effect tended only further to confuse the chaotic anarchy existing amidst the conflict of some sixteen or seventeen different jurisdictions. The present condition can be described only as one of deadlock.

But to all their efforts to obtain some amelioration of this state of things the Japanese Government have hitherto received no response but an unargumentative non possumus. In the matter of the tariff we have now the authority of the Queen's Speech for believing that some modification of it may be expected to result from the diplomatic conference on the whole subject of Treaty Revision held in Tokio in the spring of 1882. But on the difficult question of jurisdiction there seems less chance of agreement. The fact is, no solution can work that recognizes the continuance of the separate jurisdictions. The laws of Japan and the administration of justice, remodelled on the lines of Western jurisprudence, may soon be safely allowed to supersede the old troublesome and expensive anomalies of ex-territorial jurisdiction. Formerly it was Japan who refused to open her territory freely to all comers. To-day she offers to open the whole country to foreign residence, trade, and commerce, upon precisely the same terms as one European country is open to the subjects of another—nay more, her Government is prepared for a time to give special guarantees, ensuring the satisfactory fulfilment of its own obligations towards all dependent on its protection. Our own Government and others hesitate to accept the offer—partly on account of anticipated difficulties in the case of a similar proposal being made by China, a case widely distinguishable, but equally perhaps in deference to those who represent the shortsighted views prevalent among the existing communities in the open ports. Whether their interests would suffer or not—and we believe they would be the first gainers—it must not be forgotten that the interests of those small communities are by no means commensurate with those of the British commercial classes generally. Officials long resident abroad are apt to overlook this distinction; and their opinions therefore are not always to be so absolutely relied upon as it might at first sight appear they ought to be. That the complete opening of Japan to foreign enterprise and capital would be an unmixed advantage to us, and would lead to an enormous increase in the volume of our trade, now insignificant, with that country, cannot admit of question. It lies with our Foreign Office to make or mar the opportunity; where England leads the other Governments will follow. It will be a pity if local prejudices and shortsightedness are allowed, to the detriment of our own national interests, to retard indefinitely the progress and development of Japan.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS—MR. COWEN'S SONG RECITAL.

THE concert at the Crystal Palace last Saturday began with the Overture "King David," by Sir George Macfarren. It was performed for the first time at these concerts. This work is too well known to demand detailed criticism; it is only necessary to say here that this hearing quite confirmed the opinion that it is a work not only of a scholarly technical musician, but of one having a true gift of melody. Perhaps the most important point in the concert was the first appearance at the Crystal Palace of Miss Emily Shinner, a very young violinist, who, we may at once say, made her mark before a highly critical audience. She first played Spohr's Concerto in E Minor, No. 7, for violin and orchestra, and at once it was evident that she was an artist of great promise and something more than promise. When her first nervousness had worn off, she displayed great sensibility, a broad, decided, and always artist-like method of phrasing, and in the contrasts afforded by the three movements great flexibility of style. Later in the afternoon she played a Sarabaud and Tambourine by Leclair, and, with Miss Agnes Miller at the piano, Nos. 1 and 2 of the first set of Hungarian dances of Brahms. Throughout this varied music, much of which is written for purposes of display, whilst showing the most excellent technique, both in manipulation and intonation, her first thought was always for the music. In addition to these merits, she throughout her performance displayed a grip and power such as is rarely heard except in an artist who has had experience as a chef d'attaque. There can be but little doubt that, if Miss Shinner continues to work in the future as earnestly as she has obviously worked in the past, she has a fine career before her. The Symphony No. 7, in E, of Schubert, completed by John Francis Barnett, was also performed. Here, as in the orchestral parts of the Concerto, we found a marvellous improvement in the band, which has now well reached the high standard which Mr. Manns has set before us in past seasons.

The only absolute novelties were three movements out of four of the "Scènes Poétiques" of B. Godard, a very pleasing and tuneful trifle. Mr. Edward Lloyd, who was the vocalist, sang "Oh, wondrous beauty past compare," from The Magic Flute of Mozart, and "Soft airs around me play," from Euryanthe, Weber, and sang them so well, and with such strong dramatic feeling, that it was impossible to avoid regretting that Mr. Lloyd is only to be heard in the concert-room, and never on the stage. The whole programme seemed to be arranged to give rest to the audience in what is about the middle of the second half of the season, all the numbers, apparently, having been chosen for their suave melodic beauty.

Following the example now becoming general among artists, Mr. F. H. Cowen gave a Song Recital at the Steinway Hall on Wednesday comprised entirely of his own compositions. Mr. Cowen's songs are better known to musicians and to the more fastidious lovers of music than to the public who like their songs to be sweet things and easy; the greater number of his songs appeal with more force to the refined and cultured ear than to the general, while the accompaniments of many of them demand something more than average intelligence and execution. Most of the twelve new songs introduced on the present occasion are thoroughly worthy of Mr. Cowen's reputation. In the "Sunlight and Shadow" series is a quaint and beautiful melody, "Sweetest eyes were ever seen," admirably sung by Miss Mary Davies; "My love is late," also sung by Miss Davies; and "There's none like thee," rendered with inimitable passion by Mr. Santley. "The Snowstorm," a descriptive song in the same album, and dramatically rendered by Mme. Antoinette Stirling, is inferior to these. In a second series of "Six New Songs," however, are three equal to anything Mr. Cowen has composed. No. 2, "A Lullaby," and No. 4, "Because," both given with excellent effect by Miss Edith Santley, possess the beauty of form, the passionate exultation, the simple direct force, common to the best among old English songs. The languor and grace of the lullaby, the suavity and glowing ardour of the lovely melody in the No. 4, are eloquent with genuine inspiration. The last-named song fully realizes the poetic ideal—"perfect music unto noble words." No. 5, "Fantasia," sung by Miss Carlotta Elliot, is full of distinction, antique in character, and piquant in effect. Miss De Fonblanque sang with finished art and delicate expression several favourite songs, the touching and tender "Better Far," "Alas," and "I think of all thou art to me."
